As for the first point, Rivlin acknowledged that a personal-income-tax-rate reduction raises the relative price of leisure, and that work effort will increase as people substitute income for leisure. This is known in economics as the "substitution effect," and it works to increase supply. However, Rivlin also said:

"It is also theoretically arguable that when a tax cut provides people with more after-tax income, many of them will reduce effort through what is called the income effect. For most people, leisure has some positive value, and it may even be a 'luxury' good; these people could respond to a tax reduction by reducing their working hours, benefiting from more leisure time and still maintaining their after-tax income. For other people who like their work, there may be little or no labor supply response to the income or the substitution effect. In much of the United States economy, work weeks are fixed, leaving little possibility for individuals to make marginal adjustments in hours of work."

In other words, CBO believes that the "income effect" works to decrease supply.

Rivlin then went on to say that it was an empirical question whether the "income effect" offset the "substitution effect," referred to a narrow range of studies that left the question unresolved, and concluded: "In the range of policy options that we have been dealing with, I think the assumption that changes in marginal tax rates have no quantitatively significant effect on labor supply is quite plausible."

But the concept of a targeted or desired level of income unaffected by the cost of acquiring such income is foreign to the price-theoretical perspective of economic science. Rivlin's idea that people respond to a cut in income-tax rates by maintaining their existing income levels while enjoying more leisure implies that, if their tax rates went up, they would work harder in order to maintain their desired income level. Lester Thurow has actually employed this reasoning to argue for a wealth tax. According to Thurow, a wealth tax is a costless way to raise revenues because the "income effect" runs counter to and dominates the "substitution effect." He assumes that people have a targeted level of wealth, irrespective of the cost of acquiring it. Therefore, he says, a tax on wealth will cause people to work harder in order to maintain, after tax, their desired wealth level.

Note the perverse ways in which people respond to incentives and disincentives according to the Rivlin-Thurow line of argument: When tax rates go down and the relative price of leisure rises, people demand more leisure; when tax rates go up and the relative price of leisure falls, people demand less leisure. In economics, any time the "income effect" works counter to the "substitution effect," we have the relatively rare case of what is called an "inferior good" (i.e., people purchase less of it as their income rises). Since income is command over all goods, Rivlin's argument implies that all goods are inferior goods: A tax cut will cause people to purchase only more leisure, not more income (i.e., goods). What kind of people are these? Well, the only kind of people who fit this kind of economic analysis are people who respond to a monetary incentive in perverse ways.

Perhaps Rivlin merely meant to say that lower tax rates would allow people to have a little more income for a little less work. Even so, as long as she maintains that the "income effect" works counter to the "substitution effect," her argument carries the implication that goods in general are inferior.

A PERVERSE LOGIC

Whatever the weight one assigns this point, there is a more fundamental defect in her argument. Notice the stunning inconsistency: People respond to a tax-rate reduction by reducing their working hours . . . and still maintaining their after-tax income." But it is impossible for people in the aggregate to reduce their work effort and maintain the same level of aggregate real income! If people respond to tax cuts by working less, real GNP would fall, and it would be impossible to increase real disposable income, spending, and demand in the aggregate. Rivlin's argument is directed against the effectiveness of incentives in raising aggregate output, but if she were correct, it would mean that Keynesian fiscal policy also is ineffective!

The fatal error in the Rivlin-Thurow argument can be put this way: It derives from trying to aggregate a series of partial equilibrium analyses (individual responses to a change in relative prices) and, in the aggregate, ignoring the general equilibrium effects.

There are various ways a non-economist can grasp this point. Assume that the government cuts taxes and maintains a balanced budget by reducing spending. In this case, the higher income accorded the taxpayers whose rates are reduced must be matched by a negative impact on the incomes of recipients of government spending. Some or all of these may be the same people. Assume, for example, that both the tax burden and government spending are evenly distributed. In this case the "income effect" (the substitution of leisure for work) "nets out" for each individual. Since the aggregate income effect is zero, it cannot offset the "substitution effect" (the substitution of work for leisure).

If taxes are cut and government spending is unchanged (resulting in a budget deficit), the nominal disposable income of taxpayers as a group will rise relative to the nominal disposable income of the recipients of government spending as a group. The former will be able to bid real resources away from the latter. The real income gains of the former will be matched by the real income losses of the latter. Since the bidding will raise prices, the real income loss might be suffered by individuals who hold money. Regardless of who loses and who gains, the individual income effects "net out," leaving only the "substitution effects," which unambiguously increase work effort.

There can be no aggregate "income effect" unless the impact of incentives is to raise real aggregate income. Economic theory makes it perfectly clear that a tax-rate reduction will increase work effort and total output.

In the final analysis, Rivlin's argument is not that the supply-side incentive effects are unimportant, but the equally false argument that their impact is perverse—that is, only a tax-rate increase can produce a rise in real national income! She may not actually believe any such thing, of course—but that is where her reasoning leads her.

FROM ECONOMICS TO POLITICS

An economist might see the flaw in the Rivlin-Thurow argument, but it is not obvious to politicians. Take something simple, like Rivlin's assertion that a fixed work-week precludes adjustment of the labor supply to tax-rate changes. To an economist her assertion is obviously false, but to the politician it sounds reasonable enough. He will not realize that the "adjustments" will be reflected in absenteeism rates, turnover rates, the average duration of unemployment, labor negotiations for shorter work-weeks and more paid vacations rather than higher wages, and in the quality and intensity of work. Nor will he think of the entrepreneur who, because of high tax rates, loses his incentive to innovate—to make the economy itself (all of us) more productive.

Besides, one has to have an idealistic view of government to believe that politicians even want to know. The Keynesian concept of the economy is that of an unstable private sector that must be stabilized by fiscal and monetary policies of the government. This view has served as a ramp for the expansion of the interests of government. It has also served the interests of economists by transforming them from ivory-tower denizens to public-spirited social activists, a transformation which has much increased their power and enlivened their life styles. Unemployment can always be said to be too high. And the rate of economic growth can always be found to be below "potential." This means that there is always a "scientific" economic reason for expanding government spending programs that enlarge the constituencies of the Congress and of the Federal bureaucracy. From the standpoint of the private interests of policy makers, Keynesian economic policy will always be judged a success.

To write about all of the problems of econometrics and economic policy would require a book, not an article, but one other important problem must be mentioned in closing. Professor Robert Lucas has demonstrated that the standard econometric models assume that the structure of the economy remains invariant under wide variations in policy paths. What this means is that the models assume that people do not learn. But people do learn, and their expectations change as they experience various policies: They may not repeat the same behavior in response to the same policy at different times. Therefore, the policy simulation may always misinform the policy makers. This is not an optimistic note on which to end an article about public policy in a country that believes we need a great deal of it. But our faith in public policy has exceeded our knowledge, and we will find out that, in this area, there is no such thing as free faith.

FOOTNOTES

[1] Theoretically, the effect on work effort depends on the present value of the Social Security benefits and taxes. If the increased tax means increased future benefits, the employee's work decision will take into account his increased future income, as well as his reduced current income. However, the recent changes in the Social Security law raised taxes and reduced benefits as a proportion of pay before retirement. As the Wall Street Journal put it, "the extra money will go to pay people now or soon to be on the retirement rolls, not to finance your own high living in the 21st century" (February 6, 1978).

[2] According to staff in the Office of Management and Budget, there have recently been changes in the model, but one can still get the perverse result because a reduction in the tax rate directly and substantially reduces multi-unit housing starts.●

EXECUTIVE BRANCH SHOULD ADVISE CONGRESS ON PROGRESS OF LAW OF THE SEA NEGOTIATIONS

The SPEAKER. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. DERWINSKI) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Speaker, I believe we need a straightforward congressional oversight initiative requiring the executive branch to keep Congress apprised, on a timely basis, of what is transpiring at the ongoing Law of the Sea negotiations. The talks are exceedingly complex and cover a wide variety of topics. For Congress to practice meaningful oversight over these talks—and exercise its mutually shared responsibility with the executive branch to see to it that the national interest is being fully protected—it is imperative that we gather as much information as we can on the significant issues being debated at the Law of the Sea Conference.

It is essential that we get that kind of information and be in a position to evaluate intelligently the merits of treaty proposals—many of which impact heavily upon the future security of this Nation.

I believe that it is in the national interest of the United States to have access to hard mineral resources which is independent of the export policies of foreign countries. On account of such national interest, and on account of the responsibility of both the Congress and the executive branch to assure that any proposed provisions for inclusion in an international agreement which are made or accepted by the United States are in accordance with such national interests, it follows that the U.S. Ambassador to the Conference on the Law of the Sea should report to the Congress, on a timely basis or upon the request of an appropriate committee of the Congress, with respect to any proposed provisions made at such conference for inclusion in an international agreement.

We must know of the access of the United States or of U.S. citizens to the hard mineral resources of the deep seabed, including the extent to which U.S. citizens would be required to operate foreign ships and foreign processing plants as a condition of access to such resources.

We should know the degree to which provisions in such international agreement might impair the security of supply of the United States of hard mineral resources of the deep seabed.

We should know the voting rights and the status of the United States in a proposed International Seabed Authority, particularly with respect to policy decisions and decisions concerning the award, suspension, or termination of contracts to U.S. citizens.

What about the control of production or prices of minerals found in the deep seabed, including hydrocarbons?

What about the ability of the United States and of U.S. citizens to appeal final decisions of the proposed International Seabed Authority to a fair and impartial body for the settlement of disputes?

Another dispute is the transfer of technology among countries which may be required by the proposed International Seabed Authority.

What about proposals for taxation of or other methods of collecting revenue from U.S. citizens by the proposed International Seabed Authority?

What about obligations of the United States to make contributions to the proposed International Seabed Authority and its mining operations?

To sum it up, Mr. Speaker, I believe it is important that the executive branch consistently, fully, and properly report to the Congress on developments affecting deep seabed mining. This would be in the long-term interests of American capital that must be marshaled for this effort, our basic national interest, and above all, the interests of the American consumer who must not be forgotten at this point.●

PANAMA URGES UNITED STATES TO GIVE UP GUANTANAMO NAVAL BASE IN CUBA

The SPEAKER. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. FLOOD) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, for the military and naval protection of the Caribbean, there are three strategic points in its defense triangle: the U.S. Naval Base at Guantanamo, Cuba, the naval facilities in Puerto Rico, and the Panama Canal. Aside from the huge investments required for their acquisition, construction and development, their importance for hemispheric security has been, and still is, recognized by renowned strategists, historians, and geo-politicians.

In the course of my addresses over many years in the Congress on Isthmian Canal and related policy questions, I have made various predictions that later eventuated along the lines outlined. Whatever satisfactions there may have been in having been right are, indeed, sterile ones. (H. Doc. No. 474, 89th Congress and subsequent addresses.)

Among those predictions repeatedly made was that giving up U.S. sovereign control over the U.S. Canal Zone would inevitably lead to demands for the surrender of the U.S. Naval Base in Guantanamo. Cuba, and to the loss of Puerto Rico, both of which would be major steps in making the Caribbean a Red lake.

The latest news from the isthmus is that the pro-Soviet Revolutionary Government of Panama, now exulting over its recent treaty victory in the U.S. Senate, has called upon the United States, in a formal policy document, to "give up" its Guantanamo Naval Base and to bring about self-determination for Puerto Rico.

To such demands, I would say that the time has come for the United States to stop cringing before threats of any kind and to act the part of a great power, especially in the Caribbean.

In this connection, I would invite the attention of all Members of the Congress to the momentous address on June 10, 1978, by former President Arnulfo Arias to the people of Panama upon his return to his homeland after nearly 10 years of exile. In that speech, he warned of the "great battle that began in the Middle East, is underway in Africa, and now menaces Nicaragua, El Salvador, and Panama," with increasing use of force and threats on Central American coasts. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, July 19, 1978, page 21815; July 20, page 22077; and July 25, page 22696; contain the full text of the Arias address.)

Mr. Speaker, because the Associated Press dispatch upon which much of the foregoing remarks are based, as published in the Washington Star, and an editorial in Human Events should be of high interest to all Members of the Congress as well as to the Nation at large, I quote both as parts of my remarks:

[From the Washington Star, July 20, 1978]

PANAMA URGES U.S. TO QUIT GUANTANAMO

PANAMA CITY, PANAMA.—Panama called yesterday for the United States to give up its Guantanamo naval base in Cuba, self-determination for Puerto Rico and return of all occupied Arab lands by Israel.

The government made the points in a 14-page document intended to lay the basis for its future foreign policy.

"The centerpiece of our foreign policy has been the canal. Now that an agreement has been reached with the United States, we felt we needed to redefine our foreign policy," Foreign Minister Nicolas Gonzalez Revilla said in an interview.

The document also supports respect for human rights and condemns all intervention in the affairs of other nations. Gonzalez Revilla said it "also recognizes Panamanian support of some independence struggles that exist in the world."

[From Human Events, July 29, 1978]

PANAMA KNIFES U.S.

Remember when the State Department and all those who favored giving the Panama Canal to Panama suggested that such a gesture would buy their friendship? Well, last week the Panamanian government called for the U.S. to give up its Guantanamo naval base in Cuba and give self-determination to Puerto Rico (as if it didn't have it). The Torrijos government also asked Israel to yield all occupied Arab lands.

The points were made in a 14-page document intended to lay the groundwork for a future foreign policy. "The centerpiece of our foreign policy has been the canal," noted Foreign Minister Nicolas Gonzalez Revilla. "Now that an agreement has been reached with the United States, we felt we needed to redefine our foreign policy." Apparently, it is redefining it against the U.S.●

LAW OF THE SEA NEGOTIATIONS AND THE DEEP SEABED MINING BILL

The SPEAKER. Under a previous order of the House, the gentlewoman from New Jersey (Mrs. MEYNER) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mrs. MEYNER. Mr. Speaker, I am deeply concerned about the implications of H.R. 12988, the substitute Deep Seabed Hard Minerals Resources Act, for the Law of the Sea Conference, which will be convening again next month. I share the dismay of many observers at the slow pace of the negotiations. I understand the reasoning of Ambassador Elliot Richardson and others that passage, or at least consideration, of this measure could help to quicken the Conference's deliberations.

However, I feel that this bill could have a destructive effect on those important negotiations. The difficulties that the diplomats have encountered are understandable; they are attempting to reach a consensus on what kind of legal regime to establish over two-thirds of the surface of the globe. It would be tragic if the chances for success were to be scuttled by our haste to underwrite exploitation of the seabed.

Clearly, the final form of this bill matters a great deal. I urge my colleagues in Congress and the President to evaluate all of the provisions of this bill with regard to their potential effect on the Law of the Sea negotiations. The oceans are indeed the "common heritage of mankind." We must act in that spirit. I urge a vote against H.R. 12988.●

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

(By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows to:)

Mr. RODINO (at the request of Mr. WRIGHT), for today, on account of illness in the family.

Mr. RISENHOOVER (at the request of Mr. WRIGHT), until 10:30 a.m. today, on account of official business.

SPECIAL ORDERS GRANTED

By unanimous consent, permission to address the House, following the legislative program and any special orders heretofore entered, was granted to:

(The following Members (at the request of Mr. HANSEN) to revise and extend their remarks and include extraneous material:)

Mr. ANDERSON of Illinois, for 1 hour, today.

Mr. ROUSSELOT, for 30 minutes, today.

Mr. KEMP, for 20 minutes, today.

Mr. DERWINSKI, for 5 minutes, today.

(The following Members (at the request of Mr. TUCKER) to revise and extend their remarks and include extraneous material:)

Mr. ANNUNZIO, for 5 minutes, today.

Mr. GONZALEZ, for 5 minutes, today.

Mr. PEPPER, for 5 minutes, today.

Mr. BINGHAM, for 5 minutes, today.

Mr. FLOOD, for 5 minutes, today.

Mrs. MEYNER, for 5 minutes, today.

SENATE BILL REFERRED

A bill of the Senate of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and, under the rule, referred as follows:

S. 3153. An act to settle Indian land claims within the State of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED

Mr. THOMPSON, from the Committee on House Administration, reported that that committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the House of the following title, which was thereupon signed by the Speaker:

H.R. 11877. An act to authorize supplemental appropriations for fiscal year 1978, and to authorize appropriations for fiscal year 1979, for the Peace Corps, and to make certain changes in the Peace Corps Act.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT

Mr. THOMPSON, from the Committee on House Administration, reported that that committee did on the following dates present to the President, for his approval, bills and joint resolutions of the House of the following titles:

On July 24, 1978:

H.R. 1751. For the relief of Lucy Davao Jara Graham;

H.R. 2555. For the relief of Michelle Lagrosa Sese;

H.R. 2945. For the relief of Mrs. Amelia Doria Nicholson;

H.R. 3995. For the relief of Habib Haddad;

H.R. 4607. For the relief of William Mok;

H.R. 5928. For the relief of Miss Coralia Raposo;

H.R. 11504. To amend the Consolidated Farm and Rural Development Act, provide an economic emergency loan program for farmers and ranchers, extend the Emergency Livestock Credit Act of 1974, and for other purposes; and

H.J. Res. 945. Making an urgent appropriation for the black lung program of the Department of Labor, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1978.

On July 25, 1978:

H.R. 1420. For the relief of Umberto Ruffolo;

H.R. 10569. To amend the Alcohol and Drug Abuse Education Act to extend the authorizations and appropriations for carrying out the provisions of such act, and for other purposes;

H.R. 12933. Making appropriations for the Department of Transportation and related agencies for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1979, and for other purposes; and

H.J. Res. 1024. Making urgent supplemental appropriations for the Department of Agriculture, Agricultural Stabilization and Conservation Service, and for other purposes for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1978.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. TUCKER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 9 o'clock and 9 minutes p.m.), the House adjourned until Thursday, July 27, 1978, at 10 o'clock a.m.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

4646. A letter from the Assistant Secretary of the Air Force (Manpower, Reserve Affairs and Installations), transmitting a draft of proposed legislation to further amend the act of August 29, 1974 (Public Law 93–397), as amended (10 U.S.C. 8202 note), relating to the authorized numbers for the grades of lieutenant colonel and colonel in the Air Force; to the Committee on Armed Services.

4647. A letter from the President and Chairman, Export-Import Bank of the United States, transmitting a report on the export expansion facility program for the quarter ended June 30, 1978, pursuant to Public Law 90–390; to the Committee on Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs.

4648. A letter from the Chairman, Council of the District of Columbia, transmitting a copy of Council Act No. 2–232, "To authorize the expenditure of funds by Council Members for official purposes," pursuant to section 602(c) of Public Law 93–198; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

4649. A letter from the Chairman and the members, Federal Election Commission, urging action to exempt the Commission and its staff from collective bargaining with, and representation of employees by, labor unions which maintain political action committees or which endorse or support Federal candidates; to the Committee on House Administration.

4651. A letter from the Director, Defense Security Assistance Agency, transmitting notice of Navy's intention to offer to sell certain defense equipment to the United Kingdom (transmittal No. 78–65), pursuant to section 36(b) of the Arms Export Control Act; to the Committee on International Relations.

4652. A letter from the Director, Defense Security Assistance Agency, transmitting a report on the impact on U.S. readiness of the Navy's proposed sale of certain defense equipment to the United Kingdom (transmittal No. 78–65), pursuant to section 813 of Public Law 94–106; to the Committee on Armed Services.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS

Under clause 2 of rule XIII, reports of committees were delivered to the Clerk for printing and reference to the proper calendar, as follows:

Mr. DODD: Committee on Rules. House Resolution 1286. Resolution providing for the consideration of H.R. 12514. A bill to amend the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 and the Arms Export Control Act to authorize international security assistance programs for fiscal year 1979, and for other purposes (Rept. No. 95–1392). Referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. PEPPER: Committee on Rules. House Resolution 1287. Resolution providing for the consideration of H.R. 9486. A bill to authorize a contribution by the United States to the Tin Buffer Stock established under the Fifth International Tin Agreement (Rept. No. 95–1393). Referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. MURPHY of Illinois: Committee on Rules. House Resolution 1288. Resolution providing for the consideration of H.R. 11711. A bill to improve the operation of the adjustment assistance programs for workers and firms under the Trade Act of 1974 (Rept. No. 95–1394). Referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. RODINO: Committee on the Judiciary. H.R. 10965. A bill to revise, codify, and enact without substantive change the Interstate Commerce Act and related laws as subtitle IV of title 49, United States Code, "Transportation"; with amendment (Rept. No. 95–1395). Referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union.

Mr. BROOKS: Committee on Government Operations. House Resolution 1201. Resolution to disapprove Reorganization Plan No. 2 transmitted by the President on May 23, 1978 (Rept. No. 95–1396). Referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union.

REPORTED BILLS SEQUENTIALLY REFERRED

Under clause 5 of rule X, bills and reports were delivered to the Clerk for printing, and bills referred as follows:

Mr. RODINO: Committee on the Judiciary. H.R. 11942. A bill to restore effective enforcement of the antitrust laws (Rept. No. 95–1397, pt. I). Referred to the Committee on International Relations for a period ending not later than August 11, 1978, for consideration of such provisions in section 3 of said bill and amendment as fall within the jurisdiction of that committee under clause 1(k), rule X.

PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS

Under clause 5 of rule X and clause 4 of rule XXII, public bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. CARR:

H.R. 13602. A bill to provide that motor vehicle stickers issued by any State to provide special parking rights for the handicapped shall be honored in the District of Columbia in the same manner as any such motor vehicle sticker issued by the government of the District of Columbia; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. DOWNEY (for himself, Mr. BEDELL, Mr. CARR, Mr. CORNWELL, Mr. DRINAN, Mr. EDGAR, Mr. EILBERG, Mr. FITHIAN, Mr. HANNAFORD, Mr. HUGHES, Mr. LAFALCE, Mr. PANETTA, Mr. PIKE, Mr. STARK, and Mr. WHITLEY):

H.R. 13603. A bill to amend chapter 5 of title 37, United States Code, to review the special pay structure relating to medical officers of the uniformed services; to the Committee on Armed Services.

By Mr. EDWARDS of Alabama (for himself and Mr. STOKES):

H.R. 13604. A bill to amend the Railroad Retirement Act of 1974 to provide spouses' and widows' benefits for certain divorced persons; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. FUQUA:

H.R. 13605. A bill to amend title XVI of the Social Security Act to provide that SSI benefits which are due an individual who dies without leaving an eligible spouse shall be paid to the person or persons who paid the expenses of such individual's last illness and burial; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. HORTON (for himself, Mr. FARY, Mr. FISH, Mr. LAGOMARSINO, Mrs. LLOYD of Tennessee, Mr. MURPHY of Pennsylvania, Mr. PEPPER, Mr. ROE, Mr. PATTERSON of California, Mr. YOUNG of Florida, and Mr. WINN):

H.R. 13606. A bill to amend title 39 of the United States Code for the purpose of establishing a new procedure for fixing rates and classes of mail, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service.

By Mr. KASTENMEIER:

H.R. 13607. A bill to amend title 28, United States Code, to provide for the holding of court for the Southern District of New York in White Plains, N.Y., to provide for the holding of court for the Western District of Pennsylvania in Johnstown, Pa., and further, to establish a Lufkin Division in the Eastern District of Texas, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. LENT:

H.R. 13608. A bill to amend the Social Security Act and the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to provide for Federal participation in the costs of the old-age, survivors, and disability insurance program and the medicare program, with appropriate reductions in social security taxes to reflect such participation, and with a substantial increase in the amount of an individual's annual earnings which may be counted for benefit and tax purposes; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mrs. SPELLMAN (for herself, Mr. BENJAMIN, Mr. BRODHEAD, Mr. EVANS of Georgia, Mr. GIAIMO, Mr. HANSEN, Mr. HEFTEL, Mr. HUGHES, Mr. JACOBS, Mr. JENRETTE, Mr. MANN, Mr. PREYER, Mr. ROONEY, and Mr. STARK):

H.R. 13609. A bill to assist cities and States by amending section 5136 of the Revised Statutes, as amended, with respect to the authority of national banks to underwrite and deal in securities issued by State and local governments, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs.

By Mr. STEIGER (for himself, Mr. CONABLE, and Mr. MIKVA):

H.R. 13610. A bill to suspend the duty on freight cars until the close of June 30, 1980; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. ROGERS (for himself, Mr. PREYER, Mr. SCHEUER, Mr. WAXMAN, Mr. FLORIO, Mr. MAGUIRE, Mr. MARKEY, Mr. OTTINGER, Mr. WALGREN, Mr. CARTER, Mr. MADIGAN, and Ms. MIKULSKI):

H.R. 13611. A bill to strengthen and improve the early and periodic screening, diagnosis, and treatment program, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. MAHON:

H.J. Res. 1088. Joint resolution providing financial assistance for the city of New York; to the Committee on Appropriations.

By Mr. CLEVELAND (for himself and Mr. D'AMOURS):

H. Con. Res. 671. Concurrent resolution expressing the sense of Congress that all remaining proceedings with respect to the Seabrook Nuclear Station project should be expedited and that all licensing and permitting procedures for the construction and operation of nuclear generating stations should be reviewed and modified to improve the efficiency of such procedures; to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of rule XXII,

522. The SPEAKER presented a petition of Sam D. Rains, Austin, Tex., relative to the Internal Revenue Service, which was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

AMENDMENTS

Under clause 6 of rule XXIII, proposed amendments were submitted as follows:

H.R. 12005

By Mr. COLLINS of Texas:

—Page 14, line 18, add the following new section:

"SEC. 28. No sums authorized to be appropriated by this Act shall be used to bring any sort of action to require directly or indirectly the transportation of any student to a school other than the school which is nearest the student's home, except for a student requiring special education as a result of being mentally or physically handicapped."

A TIP ON INFLATION FIGHTING

HON. DON EDWARDS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 26, 1978

● Mr. EDWARDS of California. Mr. Speaker, a recent Los Angeles Times editorial explored the possible benefits of an inflation-fighting program based on a tax-based incomes policy; or TIP. A TIP program uses tax reductions and tax penalties to induce noninflationary behavior in both business and labor. It encourages business to moderate price increases and employees to moderate their wage demands.

I have introduced legislation, House Resolution 1257, calling upon the Ways and Means Committee to explore the various TIP proposals that have been made, and I would certainly welcome the cosponsorship of my colleagues on this proposal.

I believe that the Los Angeles Times editorial offers a lucid explanation of the possible benefits and of the problems to be worked out in developing a tax-based incomes policy, and I wanted to call it to the attention of my colleagues. The editorial follows:

[From the Los Angeles Times, July 25, 1978]

A TIP ON INFLATION FIGHTING

Just a few days before agreement was reached on terms of a new pay-and-benefits contract for more than 570,000 postal workers, a union official observed that, "With the railroad workers getting 35% (for three years), it is awfully tough for our leaders to show restraint" in wage demands.

As it turned out, the postal union did show restraint. But the comment underscored a problem that is threatening to make a shambles of President Carter's anti-inflation program—and is forcing the Administration to consider a new approach called tax-based incomes policy, or TIP.

TIP proposals come in all shapes and sizes. Basically, however, all would use tax cuts, penalties or some combination of both to induce employers and unions to keep wage increases within acceptable limits.

The idea dates back at least seven years, but until recent months did not attract serious attention. In April, some of the country's top economists attended a meeting on the subject at the Brookings Institution. Since then both Treasury Secretary W. Michael Blumenthal and Charles L. Schultze, the President's chief economic adviser, have confirmed that the Administration is studying TIP as a possible means of breathing new life into the Carter ani-inflation program.

This year's performance of the U.S. economy has been quite different than what the Administration expected six months ago. The good news has been a big drop in unemployment. But this has been offset by a surge of inflation well beyond what the President's economic advisers expected.

As Carter recognized in his anti-inflation program, inflation has many fathers, only one of which is high wages. There is a need to reform the tax structure to encourage the sort of investments that will result in higher productivity. Needless or excessive federal regulations that add to business costs and are passed on to consumers should be eliminated. Protectionist pressures from high-cost U.S. industries must be held in check. So must government spending.

Because wages are such a substantial portion of business costs, however, it will be very difficult to control inflation if wage increases exceed the rate of inflation plus about another 2% representing annual productivity gains—or about 8%.

The Administration, in practice, wants workers in highly unionized industries to settle for slightly less on grounds that they have fared better than the average worker in past contracts, and thus have less catching up to do.

The real crunch will come in 1979, which will be a heavy bargaining year. But leaders of unions whose contracts come up for renewal then will find it difficult to show restraint if a precedent of plainly inflationary wage settlements is set this year. And that is precisely what is happening.

Last March the coal miners won a contract for a 37% increase in pay and benefits over three years. A few days ago four major rail unions and the big railroads agreed on a pay package of roughly the same magnitude. More inflated settlements may be in the offing.

Enter TIP, which is aimed at changing an economic framework in which business frequently acquiesces in inflationary wage settlements because it can pass on the costs to consumers anyway.

The simplest form of tax-based incomes policy which offer a tax cut to companies that keep wage increases below a guideline figure—say 6% or 7%—and impose a tax surcharge on those who don't. Any company willing to pay that penalty would remain entirely free to break the guideline.

In theory, workers would gain from such a system, too, because of their fundamental self-interest in conquering inflation so pay increases won't be eaten up by higher living costs. Many experts are convinced, however, that to make TIP work it would be necessary to give workers a direct stake in restraint by extending the lure of tax cuts for good behavior to them, too.

Obviously, TIP would pose immense administrative problems. It isn't clear, either, how the opposition of union leaders could be overcome. But a growing legion of economists is convinced that it is nonetheless the best hope of avoiding runaway inflation on the one hand or corruption-breeding, ultimately counterproductive wage-price controls on the other.

We're not convinced the idea will fly. But we welcome the Administration's pragmatic willingness to take a closer look.●

ENERGY: WHERE WE STAND

HON. LEE H. HAMILTON

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 26, 1978

● Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to insert my Washington Report for Wednesday, July 26, into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

ENERGY: WHERE WE STAND

More than 16 months ago President Carter asked Congress for an energy program, but there is no program yet. So far, Congress has failed dismally in its efforts to forge a national energy policy.

The energy crunch is real, but we tend to be skeptical about it when we see that energy is still readily available. Prospects for the future, however, are not so bright. Worldwide demand for oil will begin to run up against the limits of production sometime in the 1980s. This could bring on interruptions in supply and sharp increased prices. In the early years of this decade a series of events, including a war in the Middle East, an Arab oil embargo and a spate of panic buying of oil by Western nations, showed us how quickly a crisis could come upon us, but until we experience a shortage firsthand the adverse trends in energy supply and demand do not seem to impress us.

Among the experts there is a surprising consensus on the energy crunch. World demand for oil produced by the OPEC nations averages some 28 to 31 million barrels a day, with OPEC capacity at 33 million barrels a day. But 10 years from now the demand for OPEC oil will average at least 42 to 45 million barrels a day, with a maximum OPEC capacity by then of 45 million barrels a day. That supply will meet demand assumes that OPEC nations will produce to capacity, which is by no means clear. An extremely tight supply of oil could have grave economic effects. High inflation, a deep cut in investment and a steep decline in growth and employment would be just a few. The political effects could also be serious. Conflict among nations would arise as they struggled to maintain their economic positions. The oil-producing states—especially Saudi Arabia—would dominate the world economy. The United States and other industrialized countries would be placed in a precarious position.

The energy problem remains unresolved because we approach it from so many different perspectives. Many people spend their time looking for villains and conspirators—the oil companies, the federal bureaucrats, the environmentalists and so forth. Some people are concerned that rising energy prices will bring windfall profits to the oil producers. Others want the market to determine prices since higher prices would induce greater conservation and production. Still others worry about the threat to the environment from nuclear reactors and coal-fired industrial facilities. There are those who want to rely on traditional sources of energy and those who want crash programs to develop new sources. Finally, our perception of the energy problem is distorted by regional biases. The different perspectives are often strongly held, leaving little room for consensus-building and reasonable compromise. The attempt to get an energy bill through Congress becomes politically explosive and technically complex. With no agreement on energy in the country, there is no agreement on energy in Congress. It has simply not been possible to get the popular mandate necessary for enactment of comprehensive energy legislation.

Nonetheless, the requirements of an energy program are clear. It should emphasize increased conservation and domestic production of energy. It should stress long-term alternatives to oil and natural gas, such as alcohol fuel and solar power. It should be a mixture of measures to promote conservation and production of energy around the world in as many places as possible.

The five-part energy plan now before Congress would be a modest start. The first part of the package would require industries and electric utilities—with many exceptions—to use coal as their primary fuel. Coal, of course, is the nation's most abundant energy resource. The second section of the package—relatively non-controversial as now drafted—would change procedures for setting utility rates. The third part contains a variety of conservation initiatives, but at the moment it is stalled on the issue of automobiles that "guzzle" gasoline. The fourth section—to revise controls on the price of natural gas—has been the main stumbling block. It would remove most controls by 1985, but its complexity might make it a nightmare to implement. The basic argument over this provision has gone on between those who want the market to set the price and those who seek to protect consumers from rapid price increases. The fifth and most controversial part of the package is the crude oil equalization tax, intended to slow imports by raising domestic oil prices. Its status, however, is uncertain at the present time. As the House and Senate continue to haggle over the bill, congressional observers are saying that it has no better than an even chance of final approval. If the bill is not approved in the next few months, the entire legislative process will have to begin again in January when the new Congress convenes.

The time has come to enact an energy bill, but whatever happens to this particular bill the nation will need another and then another. We must be prepared for a long, patient effort both to conserve energy and to increase production.●

FRANCISCAN SISTERS OF THE POOR

HON. DOUGLAS APPLEGATE

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 26, 1978

● Mr. APPLEGATE. Mr. Speaker, on December 1 of last year, I had the privilege of addressing this House on a matter of great significance to the area I represent, the 18th Congressional District of Ohio. The event was the presentation of the Proverello Medal Award given annually on Founder's Day at the College of Steubenville, to the Franciscan Sisters of the Poor. These three sisters typified the meaning of the medal which is awarded to those persons who best serve their fellow men in the spirit of St. Francis of Assissi.

The three sisters who have served this order for so long, Sister Nathanael, Sister Rosamunda, and Sister Evangeline, are leaving the order now and will be reassigned. They will surely be missed, because of what they have done for so many people.

The sisters have touched the lives of the poor, the tired, the hungry, and the depressed. They have been there when they were needed for whatever purpose. When they began their work in Steubenville, there were none of the various welfare agencies which now exist. They clothed, fed, and sheltered the poor of the area. The sisters also arranged for employment for jobless fathers and mothers and counseled the children of those families; counseled them so that they might have a chance to escape the deadening cycle of poverty.

The order will be continued, even after the three sisters' departure, by Sister Mary Louise of Marietta, Ohio.

On behalf of all those whose hearts they have touched, I bid the sisters farewell and wish them success in all future endeavors.●

CAPTIVE NATIONS WEEK

HON. JOHN J. RHODES

OF ARIZONA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 18, 1978

● Mr. RHODES. Mr. Speaker, in 1959, President Dwight D. Eisenhower signed into law Captive Nations Week legislation. For nearly two decades, this observance has been a reminder to those of us who live in freedom that world communism continues its determination to oppress peoples everywhere.

Captive Nations Week helps keep alive the hopes of those whose homelands have been overrun by the tyranny of the Soviet Union. During this time, when communism is revealing its ugly underside in the trials and persecutions of dissidents, we all should be grateful that we live in freedom here, and we should renew our determination to turn back the forces of oppression by helping those who wish to remain free.

Captive Nations Week should also remind us that vigilance is the price of freedom, that we cannot afford to allow our defenses to weaken in a perilous world beset by communism aggression. We also must be alert here at home, so that our precious freedoms do not slip away under the blandishments and false security of paternalistic government.

Although the flame of freedom is dim in those nations conquered by communism, Captive Nations Week nourishes that flame, and keeps it burning in the hearts and minds of those who have fled repression. It is a signal to those who remain as captives of communism that we are aware of their plight and that we care.●

CALIFORNIA CONSERVATION CORPS MOVES AHEAD

HON. ROBERT L. LEGGETT

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 26, 1978

● Mr. LEGGETT. Mr. Speaker, as my colleagues are aware, during the decade between 1934 and 1943 several million young Americans served in the national Civilian Conservation Corps (CCC). The CCC provided hope to a large number of unemployed in a time when jobs and money were scarce, and public confidence in our economic system was shaken.

In July of 1976, the State of California initiated a new and exciting project, the California Conservation Corps (CCC), to address similar though less intense economic hardships. With a primary goal of alleviating the horrendous level of unemployment among California's young people, this program provides young men and women with meaningful employment opportunities through public service, while at the same time allowing them to contribute to the conservation of California's natural beauty.

Concerned with protecting our greatest potential asset—young people—this modern statewide version of the old national CCC has taken unemployed youths and placed them in a productive environment, allowing these corpsmen to work with their hands on the land, in applying newly acquired knowledge and developing skills. In this way, the Corps provides a practical educational experience of great value to the more than 1,000 young persons who participate for 12-month periods. Their valuable training in the CCC program is preparing these previously unemployed, unskilled individuals for permanent, worthwhile jobs after graduation from the program.

The cornerstone of this program's success can be seen in the present CCC's recruitment plan. The most intensive recruitment efforts are appropriately aimed at minority and low-income communities where opportunities are most lacking. The marked success of the California Conservation Corps in reaching out for a representative cross section of unemployed young people is clear in view of the fact that about 40 percent of those provided jobs since the program's inception have been females, with minorities constituting about 36 percent of the total.

In providing young people with a year of useful employment and exposure to rural and wilderness areas, the California Conservation Corps has rapidly come to be seen by all associated with it as exhibiting the same spirit characteristic of the national CCC of the 1930's. The similarities between the two CCC's and their achievements are not surprising, however, with the people responsible for organizing California's new Corps having wisely sought the advice and help of some corpsmen from the earlier program.

One such man, Jack Vincent of West Sacramento, is a good friend of mine. In 1934 Jack was teaching in Wisconsin when he was loaned to the CCC for 1 year to assist in the educational and recreational phase of that program. His many contributions proved so valuable that the year turned into 6, until the onset of the war ended his term of service. It is no wonder then that Jack's experience has enabled him to provide invaluable insight and to direct his unequaled energy toward the development of the new CCC program. The decision by this California organization to bring Jack Vincent on board has unquestionably provided the CCC with a source of experienced guidance.

Despite the fact that it is too early to see the full benefits of the California Conservation Corps, the old and new CCC's appear to be remarkably alike in their achievements, even though they were created in very different times. Although these programs were created primarily to combat unemployment, we have learned that equal value lies elsewhere. As a key to our future, concerned young citizens have been able to learn, grow, and contribute to the preservation of natural assets while developing self-discipline and self-direction.

In my view, there is an excellent case to be made for expanding and continuing indefinitely the California Conservation Corps and for creating similar organizations in other States. The value of the educational experience for corps members clearly justifies the need for continued support for these kinds of programs.

As my colleagues are aware, we in Congress have already initiated the Young Adult Conservation Corps as part of the Youth Employment and Demonstration Project Act signed into law last August. I am hopeful that this program will be as successful as the two CCC's were before it and trust that my colleagues will see fit to insure continued support of this program.●

PARAQUAT ON POT

HON. EDWARD J. DERWINSKI

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 26, 1978

● Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Speaker, in a most timely and, I believe, logical article appearing in the Washington Star of July 20, Malcolm Lawrence discusses the subject of U.S. support of the Mexican program of aerial spraying of paraquat to eradicate marihuana plants. Mr. Lawrence is a former State Department Foreign Service officer who served as a special assistant for international narcotics control. I believe that his commentary should be read thoroughly and objectively. The article follows:

PARAQUAT ON POT? WHY NOT?

(By Malcolm Lawrence)

What did the media give us as one of the lead news items over the July 4 weekend?

Answer: Those fun-loving, pot-smoking Yippies in yet another of their fatuous protests in the nation's capital.

The Yippies have, of course, become the frontline tool of the National Organization for the Reform of Marijuana Laws (NORML), a lobby group seeking to halt U.S. government technical and financial support of the Mexican government's program to eradicate marijuana plants through aerial spraying of the herbicide paraquat.

NORML, the Playboy-backed pro-pot organization, claims that the use of paraquat is a serious health hazard for the millions of Americans who depend on Mexican pot.

NORML's campaign is an outlandish propaganda play for sympathy toward persons who are obviously distributing and using marijuana illegally. But it is much more than that.

A ruling in favor of NORML could only enhance the further growth of the marijuana market in the United States, driving consumption of pot to lower and lower age levels. More important, it would also bring about a sharp rise in heroin abuse.

For the past five years, Mexican opium has been the main source of heroin found on our streets and in the veins of our youth. The Mexican eradication program, to which the U.S. is making a major contribution, is aimed at opium crops located in the remote mountain regions of Mexico. Marijuana happens to grow in the same fields and is consequently sprayed with paraquat along with the opium plants.

Withdrawal of U.S. support would lead to a serious setback in our cooperative program with Mexico and would bring about a renewed surge in the flow of heroin into our country, far in excess of that experienced during 1969–72.

The United States will continue to be the primary target for Mexican heroin traffickers. The incentive to curtail such trafficking is more in our interest than in Mexico's. The Mexican government would not and could not do the job alone.

But can the line be held?

Unfortunately, the Carter administration has become solidly infiltrated by the pro-marijuana lobby, and it can safely be assumed that the NORML-Yippies campaign against paraquat has the blessings—whether they admit it or not—of the top drug abuse advisers in the White House.

And the prospects are even more ominous. As President Carter looks at the advisers around him, he sees people who want to free up not just marijuana, but heroin, cocaine and other dangerous drugs as well.

It should be made clear to the American public that the NORML crusade against paraquat is but another signal that the Carter forces are giving up the battle against drugs, that they are employing defusing techniques designed to embrace and obtain social acceptance of all drugs rather than curtail the problem of drug abuse.

Let's not open the door to these dangerous substances.

I would wager that the bulk of Americans would say, "Paraquat on pot? Why not?"

The knowledge that a harmful drug is made worse by a harmful chemical can be a pretty effective deterrent. Maybe the marijuana culture will slowly drift away if the potheads are convinced that something is wrong with their crutch. Then maybe NORML, the Yippies, and the pro-marijuana drug experts in the White House will leave us alone and quit trying to force pot and other harmful substances down our throats.

I am firmly convinced that there are two types of people who want to free up marijuana: those who use it and those who expect to profit from the trade—financially or politically.

Fortunately, these people are still in the minority, and this is as it should be until all the facts are in on this highly controversial and dangerous substance.●

SAFETY MEASURES FOR NUCLEAR EXPORTS

HON. JOHN J. CAVANAUGH

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 26, 1978

● Mr. CAVANAUGH. Mr. Speaker, I am introducing today an amendment to H.R. 12157, the Export-Import Bank reauthorization bill. This legislation will be on the floor Thursday, July 27, 1978. My amendment to the 5-year reauthorization is designed to provide support for our nuclear exports.

My amendment will provide access by Export-Import Bank and the Congress to the expertise of the Nuclear Regulatory Commission in evaluating the safety and feasibility of any extension of Ex-Im financing for exports of nuclear reactor facilities.

If this procedure is adopted, the benefit to our export program will be significant. Export-Import Bank would be in a stronger position to assert that we are not only reliable suppliers, but reliable suppliers of reliable exports.

My amendment does not require that NRC become involved in the internal affairs of a foreign government prior to the export contract authorization. It only asks that NRC avail Ex-Im of knowledge which is within NRC's experience.

The importance of this amendment cannot be underestimated.

First. If we are going to increase our exports, the reliability of those exports must be assured. This fact is so incontrovertible that I would be amazed to hear expressed the view that this amendment would eliminate our ability to compete for world markets in nuclear facilities.

Second. If the Export-Import Bank credits are to be repaid, we must determine, as well as possible, that nuclear reactors erected in foreign countries will be safe and operational. Without this attempt we are merely grabbing at foreign contracts which will not benefit those countries and will cost the American taxpayers through tremendous losses to Ex-Im. The only ones to benefit from this type of grab now, worry tomorrow, approach would be the American industries supplying the equipment. They would be paid regardless of the outcome.

An example of this scenario has already occurred. The loan of more than $600 million by Ex-Im to the Philippines has already resulted in an Ex-Im outlay of $52,660,000. The Philippines reactor was begun, but work was halted when the site was found to be in the vicinity of five active volcanoes. If the plant never becomes operational it is unlikely the Philippines will repay Ex-Im.

Third. This amendment does not ask Ex-Im to do anything they do not attempt to do now. The latest loan application for a nuclear reactor to South Korea was presented to Congress with a safety analysis incorporated. While it is encouraging to see for the first time a mention of the safety analysis done in connection with nuclear exports, that analysis would have more weight if trained engineers had helped in its preparation. The past chairman of Ex-Im admitted that their engineers do not have the expertise nor do they take the time to thoroughly investigate these loans. I contend this is no way for a lending institution to reliably grant a loan.

Fourth. The Banking Committee, during its markup of this legislation, decided not to accept my amendment, but to wait for the NRC staff study which was to show what NRC would be capable of providing Ex-Im. This study has now been completed and the results indicate that NRC is, indeed, capable of providing the information to Ex-Im required by my amendment.

We must not allow further delays in acceptance of this amendment. If we do not pass it today, we will suffer the consequences for at least 5 more years. I do not believe we can risk that loss to the Treasury.

The amendment follows:

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. CAVANAUGH TO H.R. 12157

Section . Section 2(b)(3) of the Export-Import Bank Act of 1945 is further amended by inserting at the end thereof the following:

(C) in the case of any transaction involving the sale of a nuclear reactor, an evaluation based upon an analysis prepared by the Nuclear Regulatory Commission (i) describing the nuclear regulatory organization and practices of the recipient country, and (ii) indicating the extent to which the Health and Safety standards adopted and implemented by the recipient country are consistent with those established by the Nuclear Regulatory Commission, and, where applicable, with International Atomic Energy Agency's standards and recommendations.●

WOMEN AND GUN CONTROL

HON. ELIZABETH HOLTZMAN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 26, 1978

● Ms. HOLTZMAN. Mr. Speaker, many of my House colleagues and I have long been dismayed at the failure of Congress to enact strict gun control laws. While the proliferation of handguns continues unabated, and the number of crimes involving guns continues to increase, Congress has not addressed the issue in any meaningful fashion and has even opposed some minor initiatives sought by the executive branch.

A recent article in the St. Louis Globe-Democrat reports the results of a WomenPoll survey which found that 74 percent of the women questioned favored stricter gun control legislation.

I commend this excellent article to my colleagues' attention; until more of us are elected, I hope you will at least take our views into account.

The text follows:

WOMEN FAVOR STRICTER GUN CONTROL LAWS

One of the bumper stickers displayed by some people opposed to gun control legislation reads "If all guns are outlawed, then only the outlaws will have guns."

But according to the WomenPoll national telephone survey, three out of four women interviewed do not agree.

In response to the question "Do you feel that Congress should pass stricter or more liberal laws regarding gun control?" 74 percent of the women surveyed said Congress should pass stricter laws.

Thirteen percent believed gun control laws should remain exactly as they are and 9 percent wanted a liberalization of current restrictions on firearms. Four percent had no opinion.

The greatest support for stronger gun controls came from respondents at both ends of the age scale. Eighty percent of the youngest group interviewed—18 to 24 years old—and 83 percent of those older than 65 wanted stronger controls.

"For too many years I've heard the gun people say that 'Guns don't kill people, people kill people. That's true enough, but we license cars—and drivers, not cars, kill people. Anyway, guns are a lot more dangerous, and I've never heard of anyone committing a robbery by pointing a car at the victim," said Hilda S., a manager of a fast-food restaurant in Chicago. The need for stronger licensing and registration was a theme heard frequently by the WomenPoll interviewers.

Another comment often expressed was that there is too much government control of our private lives already . . . but stricter gun control laws are still necessary.

Anne W., a mother of two children in elementary school near Seattle, told WomenPoll, "There are more laws on the books now than could ever be enforced, and I think we should exchange about 90 percent of them for really effective ways to cut down the number of guns people have."

In terms of the different sections of the United States, women in the East showed the strongest support for more gun control legislation. Eighty percent of the respondents there voted for stricter laws.

Least support, but still a sizable majority of 69 percent, was found among women in the Midwest.

The percentage was 74 in the South and 71 in the West.

Patricia R., a college student in Georgia, believed there was a strong case for no additional gun laws.

"Right now there are enough laws that could be used to control illegal guns, but they're just not enforced . . . you really don't need new laws. If you pass even more laws, they would be disregarded too, and there would only be more disrespect for law enforcement in general."

But for Pete and Jean Shields, more laws are definitely needed. After their 23-year-old son was shot and killed four years ago by the "Zebra killer" in San Francisco, they became very much involved in the whole issue of gun controls. Shields is now chairman of the National Council to Control Handguns, based in Washington, and Mrs. Shields is a volunteer worker for the group.

In an interview with WomenPoll, Mrs. Shields noted that, "I have felt that the gun control issue will be turned around by the women of this country, not the men . . . and your survey results confirm this. And in order for it to be turned around, women have to express their opinions when they vote and write their congressman . . . they have to become active to get it done. They can't just be a passive majority."

WHAT DO YOU THINK SHOULD BE DONE WITH GUN CONTROL LAWS?

TURKISH ARMS EMBARGO

HON. NEWTON I. STEERS, JR.

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 26, 1978

● Mr. STEERS. Mr. Speaker, in the near future, the House will be voting on the question of whether or not the Turkish arms embargo should be lifted.

This is a most complex issue and for many weeks, I was undecided as to how best approach this problem that will affect the strength of NATO, U.S. relations with both Greece and Turkey, and the problem on Cyprus. I have come to view the lifting of the embargo, at this time, not to be in the best interest of this country, unless future developments indicate a change in the Cyprus problem.

Many of my feelings on this subject were included in a recent editorial that appeared in the New York Times—July 22—and I would like to present this editorial to my colleagues for their attention.

The editorial follows:

CYPRUS AND THE SENATE

The Senate is about to vote on whether to continue the limitations on arms sales to Turkey. They were imposed after Ankara used American-supplied weapons to occupy two-fifths of Cyprus in 1974, in violation of a Congressional prohibition. We have argued in the past that the limits should be kept until Turkey indicates it will withdraw its forces. We still think so.

Few controversies are as vexing as the feud between the half million Greek Cypriots and the 120,000 Turkish Cypriots over how they will coexist on their island. Their centuries-old quarrel has reached into American politics. The Turks and Turkish Cypriots and their American sympathizers contend that national pride forbids concessions on Cyprus as long as the "embargo" stands. Direfully, they predict that maintaining last year's $175-million limit on arms sales will drive Turkey out of NATO, perhaps even into Moscow's arms. But it would be no gain for the West to purchase Turkish goodwill at the price of Greek resentment.

When Jimmy Carter was a candidate for President he held that the restriction on arms sales should stand until Ankara withdrew the force that enables Turkish Cypriots, with 20 percent of the island's population, to occupy roughly 40 percent of its territory. This spring, however, he urged that the embargo be lifted. Administration spokesmen maintain that once it is lifted, Ankara will make generous diplomatic proposals. But the Government of Prime Minister Bulent Ecevit has so far given no sign that it is prepared to risk the domestic consequences of offering the concessions needed to reach an accommodation. The vague proposal put forward by the Turkish Cypriots on Thursday for resettling some Greek refugees is welcome but scarcely sufficient. The Turkish concessions need to be territorial.

Where Greek Cypriots go wrong is in insisting that their preponderance in numbers also entitles them to the kind of predominance they enjoyed under the island's 1960 constitution. If the Turkish Cypriots would yield significantly on territory, they could more credibly insist on a constitution that provides for virtually autonomous states for the two communities, linking them only for a minimum of such "federal" functions as conducting foreign affairs and issuing currency.

Greek Cypriots denounce this idea as a mere division of the island. Even if this were true, there would be no alternative; nothing except good will can force the two communities to work together. Because ending Turkey's occupation remains an essential first step toward creating an atmosphere of trust, Congress should not yet relax the restrictions on arms sales. It should make clear to the Greek Cypriots, however, that the United States intends to help them reclaim their farms and villages but not to restore their domination of the Turkish population.●

UNITED STATES NEEDS ERA NOW

HON. DON EDWARDS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 26, 1978

● Mr. EDWARDS of California. Mr. Speaker, the time is past due for equal rights for all Americans. If the 1970's are to be recorded in history as the decade which carried the progressive changes of the sixties to fruition, the Equal Rights Amendment must be passed as soon as possible.

Women are not equal to men under the law in this country. For an example, a job position list and salary breakdown in virtually any place of employment will show that women are rarely at the top, or even given the chance to obtain that status. Our laissez-faire system of problems ironing themselves out is quite simply, failing.

The following Los Angeles Times editorial is a provocative survey of why the United States needs the ERA now. It points out that there must be no time limit on equality for women. We cannot rely on the Supreme Court—the Congress must act immediately. An extension for ERA ratification, which constitutional interpretation decidedly favors, brings the issue of sexual justice to the fore in the consciences of our elected government representatives. Do we or do we not believe women should be equal in rights and opportunities to men? If we do, then a vote for extension is not a dilemma in our Nation's capital. It is that simple.

ERA: IT WILL MAKE A DIFFERENCE

Shrouding the national debate over the Equal Rights Amendment is the rhetorical smokescreen of arguments that women already have equal rights, and so ERA is superflous. Those who argue that point are either innocently ignorant of the law or hypocritically hiding their true belief that women don't deserve coverage by the U.S. Constitution.

ERA is necessary—and not just to provide a symbolic boost to the women's movement. Restating the legal gaps ERA would fill takes on new urgency as the House and Senate near action on extending the amendment's ratification deadline. Extension, which we support, cleared one procedural hurdle last week on a 19–15 House Judiciary Committee vote. The measure should come before the full house next month. Passage is considered likely there but questionable in the Senate.

ERA is necessary because the Supreme Court has not consistently applied the 14th Amendment to sex discrimination, because many cases of sex discrimination are allowed under existing law and because some equal rights laws already on the books don't work.

In 1973, Justice Lewis F. Powell Jr., explained one reason the court was not ready to view sex discrimination as requiring the same strict judicial scrutiny it gives race discrimination under the 14th Amendment—the one that guarantees equal protection under the law. Writing in Frontiero v. Richardson, a case involving military dependence benefits, Powell indicated the court was waiting until the states made the major political decision on ratifying ERA. If the votes had existed then to interpret the 14th Amendment as fully covering sex discrimination, presumably Powell would have said so and ERA would not in fact be necessary.

More recently, in the Bakke case, Powell said racial discrimination poses more of a problem than sex discrimination because the former has a more "tragic history." In saying so in a Supreme Court opinion, Powell reaffirmed a legal nicety making proof more difficult in sex discrimination cases than in racial discrimination cases. Powell also appears to be setting up a tragedy scale on which to base elimination of discrimination. That race discrimination has been a brutal blot on this country's history does not make sex discrimination less deserving of eradication.

Existing laws are not enough. For example, Title IX of the 1972 Education Amendments banning sex discrimination has loopholes in its coverage. Enforcement of the law as it touches on athletic programs began only this past Friday because of deadlines for compliance allowed under 1975 federal regulations. Even so, the remedy is cutting off federal aid, not addressing an individual's grievance. So far, it is also not clear whether individuals have a right to sue under Title IX; ERA would give it to them.

Nor does existing law guarantee access to public schools. Last year the Supreme Court upheld a lower court action denying Susan Vorsheimer admission to Philadelphia's top public academic high school for boys because she is a girl.

The Supreme Court has also delivered inconsistent opinions on any sex discrimination involved in handling pregnancy leaves. Denial of disability benefits to pregnant women isn't discriminatory, the court has said, while denial of seniority after a pregnancy leave can be.

In the area of family law, some states still do not recognize the contributions to a marriage of a non-wage-earning wife. State equal rights amendments in Maryland and Pennsylvania have, however, been interpreted as striking down the presumption that all a couple's joint property really belongs to the man.

Finally, a look at income figures indicates the Equal Pay Act isn't working. Statistics for men and women of the same education or in the same job show consistent earnings gaps. In general, women working full time in 1976 earned an average of $8,312; men averaged $13,859.

The present piecemeal approach to equal rights means women must know specific laws to gain redress for any discrimination. If employers or employes haven't heard of Executive Order 11240, they will have heard of ERA and the national policy it expounds.

ERA will also be permanent. What Congress and state legislatures give in terms of rights, they can take away or allow bureaucrats to erode through law enforcement.

ERA advocates have learned the hard way what economic and social forces loom against them. Perhaps that's been a valuable lesson in recognizing reality and developing the skills to cope with it. Now they're ready, evidence in hand, to make the final assault on the citadels of confusion. They need the time to put women in the Constitution for all time.●

FED UP WITH TAXES? WHAT WOULD YOU CUT?

HON. RICHARD BOLLING

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 26, 1978

● Mr. BOLLING. Mr. Speaker, Clayton Fritchey's column which appeared in the Washington Post of July 1 is worth reading. His unidentified friend has some good thoughts which are more than just imaginative.

The column follows:

[From the Washington Post, July 1, 1978]

"FED UP WITH TAXES?" "WHAT WOULD YOU CUT?"

(By Clayton Fritchey)

(A congressman friend of mine likes to indulge in imaginary letters to his constituents. This, in response to a flood of anti-tax mail generated by Proposition 13, is his latest effort.)

Dear Constituent:

Thank you for the "message." You say you are "fed up with big government, big spending, big taxes." I don't blame you. But before I rush into action, I need a little guidance on your priorities. Am I, for example, to consider your latest communication as canceling previous messages you have sent me in behalf of bigger and better federal services?

I will certainly do everything I can to get you, simultaneously, both reduced taxes and increased services, but in case this is not feasible, I would appreciate some clarification on just what services you want eliminated in order to carry out your tax-cut instructions.

The Pentagon budget, of course, offers the single biggest opportunity for savings, but I know you don't want to trifle with the security of the United States. I remember how upset you were when I tried to save some billions by opposing the B1 bomber, additional nuclear carriers and ever larger Trident submarines. I've learned my lesson, so don't worry, I am not going to offend you and other patriotic constituents by trimming the defense budget, which this year will climb to $126 billion and surpass $150 billion by 1980 or so. Nevertheless, as you wired me, we've got to stand up to the Russians.

You don't need to be concerned, either, over my trying to trim Social Security benefits. I agree with you that in the past they have been much too meager, and I am glad that you approved of my efforts to put the Social Security system on a sounder basis. This, of course, is going to cost about $200 billion extra over the next few years, but, as you say, the American people are entitled to protection in their old age.

Some of my constituents think it's time to abolish our expensive unemployment-compensation system, which has been costing around $20 billion a year, but I remember a touching letter from you saying how this system had saved the family of your brother-in-law when he was laid off, so I guess we better keep that going, huh?

I've been getting mail from city dwellers who think we ought to crack down on agriculture supports, but apparently they don't realize that America has the most efficient and cheapest farm and food system in the world. If the government let our agriculture collapse, the cost would be astronomical in both money and misery.

Our interstate highway system, admittedly the finest in the world, is immensely costly, but every time we in Congress try to cut it back we get a flood of protests from the taxpayers. It's the same with environmental protection, industrial safety and public health. A glance around the world shows you can't reduce public health standards without reducing life expectancy.

Like you, I am a war veteran, so I share your view that veterans benefits, large as they are, should be still larger. You are on target when you say the GI bill of rights, which put millions of veterans through college, has been a splendid national investment.

Over the years, I find that many of my constituents believe their taxes could be cut if we "cleaned up" the welfare rolls and got rid of the "bums." Actually, around 90 percent of the welfare dollar goes to children and the mothers who must look after them. Even if federal aid was abolished altogether, it would produce only a minor tax cut.

A lot of people, especially the middle classes, seem to think that high taxes are depriving them of the pleasantries of life. Only today, however, I received a report showing that Americans spent $160 billion last year for "leisure and recreation," and this huge figure is expected to exceed $300 billion a year by 1985.

Yet President Carter and the Congress are now shying away from a national health program on the ground of cost. Is it possible that the richest country on earth cannot afford the kind of health care that nearly all other advanced nations adopted long ago?

I have two other clippings in front of me. One reports the closing of summer schools because of the "tax revolt"; the other reports the opening of more big gambling casinos, where the public is throwing away millions of dollars each day.

Congress will soon cut the income tax by at least $15 billion. This is on top of tax cuts of $20.4 billion in 1977, $27.6 billion in 1976, $28.6 billion in 1975, and $11.4 billion in 1971. If the rates of 15 years ago were still in effect, U.S. taxpayers would be in a state of shock.

Few seem to realize that Americans already enjoy, with minor exceptions, the lowest taxes in the developed world. The latest data show that the total tax bill for U.S. citizens is merely equal to 29.6 percent of the national output. In West Germany it is 36 percent, in Britain 37.4 percent, in France 39.1 percent, ranging upward to 50.9 percent in Sweden. The only major country with a rate lower than the United States is Japan.

In closing, I would like to thank you for calling my attention to the new Kemp-Roth bill to cut income taxes by one-third. The sponsors claim it would stimulate the economy and generate enough new federal revenue to make up for the cut. Why not, then, cut taxes by two-thirds or abolish them altogether? It can be done. The Hottentots have done it.

Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes, who preferred our society to the Hottentots, once said that he was glad to pay taxes. They were, he said, his "investment in civilization." To tell the truth, Dear Constituent, that's the way your congressman feels, too.●

A CHANCE FOR DEMOCRACY IN RHODESIA?

HON. ROBERT J. LAGOMARSINO

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 26, 1978

● Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to the attention of my colleagues the following commentary by Kenneth H. Towsey which appeared in the Washington Post on Saturday, July 15, 1978. This editorial provides cogent argument for lifting the economic sanctions now imposed by the West upon Rhodesia.

The Rhodesians are making considerable progress toward a resolution of their racial dilemma. The interim agreement negotiated by Ian Smith with the moderate black leaders provides for a transition to black majority rule with protection for the white minority—in other words a constitutional democracy. Yet still the Western sanctions continue. Now the West insists that a just settlement cannot be reached without the participation of the Marxist "Popular Front." But, the "Popular Front" is trained and supplied by the Soviets and Cubans, and has waged a campaign of terror against the Rhodesian population.

The curious aspect of this situation is that the West should treat seriously the claims of justice put forth by the avowed enemies of constitutional democracy, who place their reliance upon the bullet rather than the ballot. What appears to be occurring is that the West is unable to make judgments as to the validity of the conflicting claims of justice put forward in this instance, so it treats all claims as having equal dignity. As a result the "case" of the Marxist terrorists is treated as being equal in validity to the claims made by those who would abide by the constitutional process and the rule of law.

The very heart of politics is the conflict between differing views of justice. For politics not to lead to tragedy, reasonable men must be able to distinguish between good and bad, true and false claims made on behalf of justice.

Abraham Lincoln told a parable to illustrate this point:

A wolf had a sheep by the throat, but is driven away by the shepherd. The sheep praises the shepherd as his savior, while the wolf curses him for the same action.

In the case of Rhodesia, the wolf has the sheep by the throat, while the shepherd, beset by moral confusion, takes his leave—advising as he departs, that the sheep and the wolf sit down and reason together.

Only the most obtuse can fail to see that extremists in Africa and elsewhere are drawing the appropriate conclusion from the West's actions in Rhodesia: Might does indeed make right, provided that it can be masked with a claim of justice—no matter how fraudulent the claim.

The editorial follows:

A CHANCE FOR DEMOCRACY IN RHODESIA?

(By Kenneth H. Towsey)

In the last week of June the U.S. Senate voted down a proposal by Sen. Jesse Helms (R-N.C.) to revoke sanctions against Rhodesia. It was a close vote—48–42. And so an opportunity was narrowly lost to give a much needed shot in the arm to what promises to be something unique in Africa—a Western-oriented, multiracial, multiparty state, based on free democratic elections. Those characteristics are guaranteed by the constitutional agreement concluded in Salisbury on March 3 between Prime Minister Ian Smith and the leaders of three political groups, which between them represent, in the judgment of most observers, the overwhelming majority of the Rhodesian people, black and white.

The agreement satisfies the principles of majority rule—a vote for everyone over 18—and self-determination; it was put together by Rhodesians for Rhodesians. Those criteria have been consistently upheld by successive American administrations as essential conditions of political respectability and prerequisites of recognition. A predominantly black transitional government has assumed office, released political detainees, sanctified previously banned political parties (including the internal branches of parties conducting warfare against the state) and set about the processes of organizing elections and of eliminating the remaining traces of racial discrimination.

It is fair to say that Rhodesia has done everything that the Western world asked of it. What is Rhodesia asking of the Western world in return?

Nothing very special. No handouts. No military assistance in contending with her enemies. Only a normalization of relations; the same treatment that the Western world accords to virtually every other member of the international community, including some whose record on human rights makes Rhodesia look like a paragon of political virtue. Rhodesia is looking only for a lifting of the burden of sanctions that would inject new life into the economy, improve the quality of life of the people, boost their morale, remove the uncertainty created by current Western mugwumpery and fortify the country's defenses against its external enemies.

To withhold support for the constitutional agreement, at least to the extent of revoking sanctions, is to victimize the transitional government in its endeavors to promote the democratic objectives of the agreement and to serve the best interests of the Rhodesian people. It creates an unequal struggle. There are no comparable restraints on the forces that oppose the transitional government and want to destroy the agreement. Those forces are armed, trained, indoctrinated and subsidized by the Soviets and the Cubans. There will be no let-up in that support for as long as the client forces appear capable of winning a battlefield victory over government forces hamstrung by the West's continuing hostility.

The Times of London made the point in a recent editorial: "Sanctions are no more neutral now than when they were first leveled against the Smith government. They are working against the government of the day in Salisbury now as then. But the major opponent of the present Salisbury regime is not now the legal government in Whitehall, but the Popular Front's two guerrilla armies. It logically follows that the effect of sanctions now is to help the Popular Front, and strengthen its armed attack against Bishop Muzorewa, Mr. Sithole and Chief Chirau as much as against Mr. Smith and the white power structure . . . So the choice must be made soon; it is not made, then it is made in favour of the Patriotic Front, and for a black state eventually imposed by violence after a civil and perhaps tribal war. We have no doubt that the choice ought to be to support the group which does offer the hope of a viable and relatively democratic black-ruled state."

A former foreign secretary in a British Labour government, Lord George-Brown, is even more preemptory in his plea for quick support for the transitional government: "Let us come off the fence—or rather get back to the right side of it—over Rhodesia/Zimbabwe. We must now recognize and accept the internal settlement there and the multiracial government it has brought to Salisbury. If either or both Mr. Nkomo and Mr. Mugabe wishes in peace to join in, well and good. But recognition and the ending of sanctions cannot be made to wait any longer on that. International support of all kinds must be organized now to ensure a genuine chance of survival for this new African state—which will be unique in Africa in its plural democratic and multiracial character."

Myths have entered into the Rhodesian argument that ought to be dispelled. Some critics of the constitutional agreement have suggested that it is flawed because it excludes the Patriotic Front. There has been no exclusion. To the contrary, the door was and remains open to participation by the Patriotic Front, provided they come in peace and accept the verdict of the ballot box in impartially observed elections to be held before the end of the year. The Patriotic Front have chosen to exclude themselves. It speaks for their lack of confidence in the ballot box that they prefer to shoot their way into power, or extravagantly demand control of the instrumentalities of government in any run-up to elections. Their intransigence is fed, of course, by continuing support from their Soviet and Cuban patrons and by the unwillingness of the West to give the transitional government the support to which it lays a legitimate claim.

Helms's proposition promises to redress the balance of disadvantage, and by doing so to give the Patriotic Front an incentive to lay down the tools of barbarism and to test their strength at the ballot box on the same conditions as other contenders for political office in the new Zimbabwe.

Basically, most white and black Rhodesians are saying to Americans: "Won't you give democracy a chance?" ●

IMPLICATIONS OF BAKKE CASE

HON. EDWARD J. DERWINSKI

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 26, 1978

● Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Speaker, the Bakke case has provoked more reviews, interpretations, and commentary than any other Supreme Court decision in recent years. Obviously, there seems to be a different understanding by everyone, thus causing a multiplicity in judgments.

However, I commend to the Members an editorial by columnist Michael Novak in the Washington Star of July 16 which discusses the implications of the various interpretations of this case:

[From the Washington Star, July 16, 1978]

TAINTED AFFIRMATIVE ACTION

(By Michael Novak)

It is amazing how brilliant the Supreme Court looks when it agrees with your own recommendations. In its large, bold outlines, the Supreme Court on "Bakke" did follow the reasoning I set forth in earlier columns; namely, that there are two different kinds of affirmative action, one to be rejected and one (although cautiously) to be accepted. The Davis plan, I wrote, was racist because it permitted "integrated but unequal" admissions—it accepted far lower standards for minority students than for whites. So, initially, I was pleased by "Bakke." My own judgment—for Bakke and also for affirmative action—was vindicated.

Still, there were disturbing signs in their written opinions that the justices are not as sharp about the many kinds of affirmative action as they ought to be, and that some of them, at least, are nourishing illusions future generations will reject. These are not just harmless illusions; they are racist illusions.

Justice Powell, for example, explicitly cited the Harvard plan as a model for other schools. But, as an article in The American Spectator (February 1978) and another in Commentary (May, with letters in July) show, the Harvard plan heaps up mountains of dishonesty, fakery and suspect standards. There is one kind of affirmative action—and one kind only—of which a liberal mind should approve: the diligent search at additional expense and concentrated effort, for minority candidates of standard caliber, who might otherwise be overlooked.

The Supreme Court—like almost everybody else—has failed to come to terms with the major fact now before the nation. That fact is that at every social and economic level, black students are not performing up to the same standard as whites, even when poverty is not at issue. The deans of the University of California professional schools noted candidly in their brief that poverty could not supplant race as the basis for affirmative action, since many black students are not poor, but even so need special standards.

The dimensions of this fundamental inequality come out in such figures as these: In 1974 (the last year for which figures are available), fewer than 40 per cent of black law graduates passed the bar exams, whereas the proportion for whites was about double that.

In 1976, according to the Law School Admissions Test, required of virtually all applicants to law school, a nationwide total of 4,122 white students scored above 700. In the entire country, only seven blacks scored above 700.

To have a realistic chance of being admitted into the top law schools, a white student would need to score near 700 and have a 3.5 grade average. It cannot be due to poverty alone that there was not even one black candidate for each of the top twelve law schools who was a test-score peer of the other students.

At lower levels, the proportions are similar. A full 20 per cent of white applicants (no matter the spread between the poor and the affluent) scored above 600; but only 2 per cent of black applicants did. Worse, there is considerable evidence that such aptitude tests are biased in favor of blacks, in the precise sense that blacks consistently, on average, receive somewhat lower subsequent grades than whites who had identical aptitudes. Blacks do not do as well as expected. This is a situation difficult for the liberal heart to face.

Partisans of double-standard affirmative action programs seem to think that it is not racist to permit blacks to meet a low academic standard. Future generations are not likely to judge "integrated but unequal" so favorably. The professional degrees being won by black affirmative action students are now publicly tainted. Privately, informally, among people who know, appropriate recognition of reality is being made. Justice Blackmun may think that the only way to defeat racism is to take race into account with a double standard, but that ploy is not likely to be regarded favorably by future generations.

For reasons as yet unclear—probably for reasons having to do with a low self-image, and with pre-modern or rural cultural traditions—black students, on average, are now in a position to compete with whites. Still, individuals can and do break free from past limitations in the space of a single generation. Affirmative action based upon locating those and only those truly competitive individuals is an honest program. Anything less than that is inherently racist. The Davis program was not racist because it was based upon a quota. It was racist because it set a separate and unequal standard for blacks. The double standard is inherently duplicitous. It destroys the very possibility of publicly recognized equality.●

COUNTRY ELGIBILITY FOR EXPORT-IMPORT CREDIT

HON. JOHN J. CAVANAUGH

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 26, 1978

● Mr. CAVANAUGH. Mr. Speaker, I am introducing an amendment to H.R. 12157, the Export-Import Reauthorization Act. My amendment will remove the antiquated prohibitions placed on the Export-Import Bank's extension of credit and allow the Bank to trade with every country in the world, except those expressly prohibited by the President or Congress.

In establishing this procedure, we would be open to a reevaluation of our foreign trade policy. This reevaluation has already begun. We have participated in a lengthy debate on the merits of the Tsongas amendment which prohibits future extensions of credit or loan guarantees to South Africa. The inclusion of this amendment in the Export-Import charter is totally consistent with the intent of my amendment.

In offering this amendment, I am not insisting, or even advocating, that we completely eliminate all trade barriers. I do believe that our huge trade deficits (about $30 billion a year), the continuing devaluation of the dollar, and our struggle against another recession, demand that we use every method possible to strengthen our export program. It is also true that the existing prohibitions on country eligibility in the Ex-Im charter were established almost two decades ago. Both our foreign policy and world economic conditions have changed greatly since that time. I feel it is imperative that we begin now a reevaluation of our trade policies.

It was pointed out this week during hearings of the Subcommittee on International Trade, Investment and Monetary Policy that our old ideas of withholding trade from countries as a punishment for actions which displease us might not have served any purpose, but to cause us to lose export markets. It has been shown that Japan and West Germany have been actively pursuing the very markets which are closed to us by the existing Ex-Im charter. We cannot allow our exporters to continue being out-maneuvered by these aggressive trading competitors.

The intent of my amendment was reported out of the Senate Banking Committee as the Stevenson amendment. Senator Stevenson prohibits Ex-Im extensions of credit to all countries except those expressly determined to be eligible by the President. While the intent of this amendment is compatible with mine, the Stevenson amendment would, however, establish costly, time-consuming and ambiguous procedures. In a letter to the Senate Banking Committee concerning this amendment, Secretary of State, Cyrus Vance, stated this procedure would create serious foreign policy problems in the compilation of the list and would undermine the effectiveness of the Bank at a time when we do desperately need help expanding our exports. My amendment, on the other hand, provides a workable procedure.

I urge your support of this amendment and your participation in a thorough discussion of our goals in determining a foreign trade policy.

We need to provide our Nation a new, flexible basis for determining which countries ought to be eligible to receive Bank-supported exports with active participation in criteria setting. This process will insure that any prohibitions are consistent with our national interests.

It must also be recognized that my amendment does not affect in any way the applicability of the Trade Act of 1974 in determining the eligibility of nonmarket countries for most-favored nations treatment or other credit programs. My amendment is limited solely determining eligibility for Bank credit programs.

The amendment follows:

AMENDMENT TO H.R. 12157 OFFERED BY MR. CAVANAUGH

SECTION . Section 2(b)(2) is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 2(b)(2) The Bank in the exercise of its functions shall not guarantee, insure, or extend credit, or participate in any extension of credit:

(A) in connection with the purchase or lease of any product by any country, agency, or national thereof, which the President or Congress determines would not be in the national interest; or

(B) in connection with the purchase or lease of any product by any other foreign country, or agency or national thereof, if the product to be purchased or leased by such other country, agency or national is to the knowledge of the Bank, principally for use in, or sale or lease to a country which the President determines would not be in the national interest. Any determination made under this section shall be reported to the Congress not later than thirty days following the date of such determination; or

(C) as otherwise provided in this section.".●

A DIALOG ON REGULATION

HON. ROBERT H. MICHEL

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 26, 1978

● Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Speaker, I recently received a copy of an imaginary dialog between a loan officer of a bank and a loan applicant. This dialog tells more about the nature and the excesses of Federal regulation than many scholarly studies. I hope you will take the time to read it because although it is a tongue-in-cheek approach, the subject is serious and I am told by those who know about these things that there is "more truth than fiction in the message it contains."

Here, then, is a copy of the dialog:

LOAN OFFICER. "Good morning . . ."

LOAN APPLICANT. "Good morning. I'm here to apply for a loan, the purpose of which I choose not to divulge. You do not have the right to remain silent, anything you say or can do will be held against you in a court of law under the Truth in Lending Act, the Fair Credit Reporting Act, the Fair Credit Billing Act, the Real Estate Settlement Procedures Act, the Equal Credit Opportunity Act, the Civil Rights Act, and the State and Local Commissions thereof. Also, the Consumer Protection Act, the Privacy Act, the Federal Trade Commission Holder in Due Course Regulation, the proposed Unfair and Deceptive Credit Practices Regulation or under one or more of the regulations issued by the Departments of the Treasury, Housing and Urban Development, Health, Education and Welfare, Defense, Labor, Army, Navy, Federal Reserve Board, Internal Revenue Service, Security and Exchange Commission, Social Security Administration and the Office of Economic Opportunity. You have the right to talk to a lawyer and have him present while you are being questioned about my loan application, but it is doubtful that he can protect you from all of the above-mentioned regulations and regulatory agencies. For your information, buddy, you don't mind me calling you buddy, do you, you cannot use established credit criteria such as my ability to repay, collateral, stability of employment, personal habits, alcoholism for instance, past credit experience, or general credit ratings to approve or deny my application. You must use the criteria developed by Congress and the above agencies in their infinite wisdom. If your credit scoring system rejects me, you must reveal the weights given to each item on my application, especially the lack of a savings account. I have a dollar in my pocket to open such an account which will allow your computer to score me high on it. When I become delinquent, you cannot discuss this with me unless I bring it up first, and, remember, I am still holding the Federal Bankruptcy Act and its proposed amendments in reserve." ●

MRS. JANIE HENDRY QUYNN DELAPLAINE

HON. GOODLOE E. BYRON

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 26, 1978

● Mr. BYRON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to honor the memory of one of Frederick, Md.'s most outstanding citizens, Mrs. Janie Hendry Quynn Delaplaine.

Born in Ijamsville and a relative of Barbara Fritchie, Mrs. Delaplaine gave much of her time and talents to better the community of Frederick. She maintained one of the most beautiful gardens in the area, while still finding time to be an active member of many civic clubs. She was a supporter of Hood College and a past president of the Hood College Alumnae Association.

Her passing will be felt by all who knew and loved her and I know you will join me in extending the official sympathies of the House in honor of this patriotic American woman.

An article for the Post, Frederick, Md., follows:

MRS. WM. T. DELAPLAINE DIES—WAS "MISS JANIE"

Mrs. Janie Hendry Quynn Delaplaine, one of Frederick's most prominent women and a relative of Barbara Fritchie, died Tuesday, July 18, at her residence, 273 Dill Avenue. She had been ill for some time.

Mrs. Delaplaine was the wife of the late William Theodore Delaplaine, who was the president and manager of the Frederick News-Post from August 15, 1955, until his death April 18, 1964. Mr. Delaplaine was the third son of the founder of The News, William T. Delaplaine.

(Funeral arrangements, under the direction of Robert E. Dailey & Son Funeral Home, will be announced Wednesday).

Mrs. Delaplaine was born in Ijamsville, January 9, 1888, a daughter of the late Charles Williams and Harriete Eleanor Williams Quynn. She was the last of her immediate family.

She was a life-long member of the Evangelical Reformed United Church of Christ. She was graduated from the Woman's College of Frederick, later known as Hood College, in the Class of 1908. She was an ardent supporter of Hood and had remained active in the Hood Alumnae Association.

Mrs. Delaplaine was a founder and charter member of the Frederick Garden Club, a member of the Board of Directors of the Frederick Memorial Hospital, the Historical Society, the Frederick Art Club, the Salvation Army Auxiliary, and a past president of the Hood College Alumnae Association.

Survivors include her daughter, Mrs. Martin L. (Natalie) Bowers Jr. of West Chester, Pa.; two grandchildren, Martin F. Bowers and Miss Jane Elizabeth Bowers, both of West Chester; two nieces, Mrs. Samuel P. (Virginia-Quynn) Grant of North Carolina and Mrs. Myron W. (Frances Ann Delaplaine) Randall of Braddock Heights, and two nephews, Jack T. Quynn of Frederick and George B. Delaplaine Jr., publisher of the Frederick News-Post.

Mrs. Delaplaine was predeceased by two children—a son, Lt. William T. Delaplaine III, a Navy pilot killed in World War II, and a daughter, Miss Eleanor Frances Delaplaine.

Her son was killed in April 1943 in a plane crash with three other pilots and eight airmen. On May 1, 1949, the Delaplaines dedicated the airport building in Frederick in his name.

Her daughter died suddenly Oct. 22, 1938, and a garden on the Hood campus near bears a memorial plaque in her honor.

Mrs. Delaplaine was an artist, and had studied art under Miss Florence Doub, founder of the Frederick Art Club.

She was also a noted gardener, and maintained at her home one of the outstanding gardens in the city.

Jane Quynn and William Delaplaine were married Nov. 15, 1916, and had taken an anniversay cruise the year before his death.

She dedicated the Physicians Lounge at Frederick Memorial Hospital in her husband's name. She also had established scholarship funds at both Hood College and Washington and Lee University.

She had a life-long association with Hood and had known personally all of its presidents.

It is requested that flowers be omitted and expressions of sympathy be made to the Alumnae Association of Hood College in memory of Mrs. Delaplaine.●

CINCINNATI ENQUIRER OPPOSES CUTS IN WORLD BANK FUNDING

HON. MATTHEW F. McHUGH

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 26, 1978

● Mr. McHUGH. Mr. Speaker, the foreign assistance appropriations bill will soon come before the House for consideration. As every Member is aware by now, numerous amendments will be offered to reduce funding and to restrict how our assistance may be used in a variety of ways.

I am opposed to these amendments, Mr. Speaker, and I have been encouraged by the fact that so many thoughtful and responsible newspapers across the Nation have indicated their opposition to them as well. For example, a recent editorial in the Cincinnati Enquirer called congressional attempts to slash American funding of the World Bank "tragic and ironic." The Cincinnati Enquirer pointed out that the World Bank not only has never suffered a loan loss in its 32-year history, but actually turns a profit while aiding poorer nations on a "politics-free" economic basis.

For the benefit of those Members who may not have seen this editorial, I am including it in the RECORD at this point.

THE WORLD BANK IN JEOPARDY

(By Robert Webb)

Congress could be about to kill one international organization—the World Bank—that actually works.

It might not be a fast death. The bank wouldn't shut its doors tomorrow.

But if the election-year hysteria fired by Proposition 13 bears its bitterest fruit, the slow death could start when the House takes up the foreign-aid budget next week. For many members, sensing only that voters are fed up with high government spending, see in proposed funds for the World Bank a safe place to cut.

What most of their constituents won't realize, they may assume, is that such budget surgery almost certainly will be counterproductive. Funds denied agricultural projects in India, Pakistan or Bangladesh, say, not only would take food from the mouths of the destitute millions of those countries. The denial would have its consequences on the need to raise living standards for the impoverished countries for the benefit of all countries.

Just as increased spending power in the American South improved markets for the industrial North, so will enrichment of the developing countries mean new buying power for goods made in the United States. And a denial or sharp cut in the $800 million pending as the U.S. commitment for the fifth replenishment of the World Bank's "soft loan" window, the International Development Association (IDA), would also be a slap at such IDA members as Israel, South Korea, the Republic of China on Taiwan, Cyprus, Egypt and Lebanon.

Hard-to-measure but near-certain international political repercussions could also flow from whacks beyond the $1.09 billion the House Appropriations Committee cut from the $3.5 billion sought for the World Bank and the regional development banks (such as the one for Latin America). The cuts would come, moreover, at a time of increasing U.S. dependency on the countries reliant on the banks for many major imports.

As columnist James Reston noted recently, "The United States now depends on developing countries for 45 percent of its oil, 85 percent of its bauxite, 93 percent of its tin, 59 percent of its zinc ore and 36 percent of its iron ore." He also pointed to the $29 billion in goods the United States shipped in 1975 to the nonoil developing countries.

Another slant on the U.S. stake in the aid appropriations comes from Ralph A. Dungan, executive director for the United States on the board of the Inter-American Development Bank (IDB). "As I see it, the logic of the U.S. participation is composed of a mixture of direct economic self-interest, a more general political interest, the cost-effectiveness of this form of economic cooperation and the deep impulse, so typically American, to share the bounty with which we are blessed as a nation," he wrote. ". . . It is estimated that the United States has supplied about 47 percent of the goods and services purchased with the proceeds of loans since the bank began operations in 1959."

Ohio firms are involved in a wide range of IDB activities. Thus they are among 106 U.S. suppliers providing goods and services in a $2.7-million IDB loan to El Salvador to expand and improve water supply and sewerage facilities. Ohio interests are also in a $4.1-million IDB loan project to supply potable water to the Dominican Republic.

American firms, too, are obviously and heavily engaged in provision of services and supplies for World Bank-financed projects globally. The bank, moreover, has a prime credit rating, and has never suffered a loan loss in its 32-year history. It annually turns a profit ($275 million in 1975), which is plowed back into bank loans or IDA credits.

While government aided, the development banks operate pretty much like the one where you keep your own account. Only they may be tougher on their borrowers. Member countries of the World Bank vote proportionate to their shares in the banks. Overall, U.S. shares average 25%, easily the largest. The U.S. share of the most recent replenishment of the World Bank was 18.3%, its IDA component, 31.4%.

The American share, moreover, triggers other contributions Thus a U.S. whack at IDA would jeopardize the extent to which the other 23 donors participate. Notably, member countries in the World Bank ante up only a 10th of their capital contributions. The other nine-tenths is callable only in a bank emergency.

When the House gets down to business on the World Bank and the regionals, it will also face what could be a decisive test on whether the United States will bar the use of any of its funds for Cambodia, Vietnam, Laos or Uganda. Rep. Robin Beard (R-Tenn.) has an amendment ready to attach such a prohibition. But he and other House members will be faced with legal opinions such a prohibition would violate the bank's charter and have the effect of cutting U.S. aid altogether.

At President Carter's initiative, the U.S. representative on the bank board has been instructed under a "gentleman's agreement" with Congress already to vote on a human-rights basis against aid to such countries. The Beard directive is understandable, and undoubtedly would have the sympathies of many Americans. The remedy, however, may lie more appropriately in some reasonable human-rights amendment to the bank's charter. The dilemma, in any case, is apparent.

So far, the bank board has sought by the most meticulous exmination of loan applications and project reviews to grant help solely on a politics-free economic basis. And since all loans must be repaid, nobody gets a free ride. It is not as though the United States makes a direct gift to any country when it helps development banks expand their lending power. Indeed, such support may help ease the pressure from poorer countries for direct aid.

The message from Proposition 13 was clear, of course, and ought to resound across the land. But it would be tragic, indeed ironic, to have it destroy one of government's most conservative and—for generations to come—productive operations.●

HUMAN RIGHTS VIOLATIONS IN NORTHERN IRELAND

HON. NEWTON I. STEERS, JR.

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 26, 1978

● Mr. STEERS. Mr. Speaker, the violence and turmoil in Northern Ireland is certainly one of the most tragic situations in the world today. Human rights violations are common in that region, and I would like to insert into the RECORD at this point the documentation by Amnesty International of one such violation of a human's rights:

DOCUMENTATION

CASE NO. 55

Male. Arrested during the first half of 1977 and brought to a local police station. On the following day he was transferred to Castlereagh Holding Centre where he was detained for seven days. He was then transferred to prison where he remained for several months, after which all charges against him were dropped and he was released.

He alleged to have been subjected to the following forms of maltreatment during detention in Castlereagh:

Physical maltreatment

Hair pulled out.

Beatings: diffusely all over, directly on ribs, on hips and stomach.

Kicking.

Direct head trauma with head banged against wall.

Body stepped on, hands and face stepped on while he was on the floor.

Fingers squeezed violently and wrists bent.

Arms twisted behind his back.

Physically exhausting procedures: made to stand with arms straight up in the air, to squat with arms straight out, prolonged and exhausting interrogations.

Psychological maltreatment

Threats of having his arm broken; having his child shot; of assassination.

Humiliation: forced to stand with his underpants down to his knees while being ridiculed. His family referred to in a degrading way.

Confusing procedures: interrogation alternated between physical violence and "friendly" interviews.

He claimed to have had the following symptoms immediately after the alleged maltreatment:

Cardio-pulmonary: he was bothered by tachycardia for the seven days he was in Castlereagh.

Gastrointestinal pain just after the beatings in the epigastrium, but this disappeared quickly.

During detention in Castlereagh he passed black-brown urine, which he stated he was told was due to blood in the urine.

Pains in his hands and his left fourth finger was swollen.

Numerous bruises distributed all over his body.

Headaches localized to both temples and vertex; these decreased gradually.

Shaking hands, "pins and needles" after having held the arms out straight. Pains in his elbows and his left hand. These pains later disappeared.

Psychological: He heard footsteps without knowing whether or not they were real. It does not seem likely that he was hallucinating. He stated spontaneously that he had been so desperate during detention he had tried to hurt himself by throwing himself onto the floor in order to be taken away for treatment.

He claimed to have suffered the following symptoms in the period following his detention in Castlereagh:

The symptoms of tachycardia continued for the first two months he was in prison, and then disappeared, although he still has sporadic attacks. The headache continued but became less acute. He became more irritable and erethitic. He had sleep disturbances for a certain period. His left fourth finger remained swollen for about three months. After his release from prison he drank more alcohol than previously.

Previous medical examinations

During his detention in Castlereagh, Case No. 55 was examined by several doctors who have given medical evidence of physical injuries. They found consistency between the injuries found during their examinations and the maltreatment alleged by Case No. 55 at the time. These doctors were convinced that the lesions could not have been self-inflicted.

Findings at detailed examination

This man was examined by the medical delegates approximately ten months after his arrest and detention. At the time of detailed examination he still complained of the following symptoms:

Sporadic attacks of tachycardia.

Intermittent headaches.

Increased alcohol consumption.

Increased irritability, and erethitic and quarrelsome behaviour.

Case No. 55 stated spontaneously to the medical delegates that in order to get away from interrogation he twice threw himself onto the floor. This cannot explain the injuries alleged by Case No. 55 and noted in the medical reports made at the time of detention (attached).

The medical delegates find consistency between the maltreatment alleged, the symptoms and the medical reports. The detailed examination found predominantly psychological residual signs and noted symptoms which could be ascribed to maltreatment, although the possible effects of imprisonment on his behaviour and condition are difficult to evaluate. However, on the basis of all the material presented to the mission and the medical delegates' assessment of his symptoms and reactions immediately after maltreatment, the medical delegates conclude that the detailed examination strongly corroborates the case that maltreatment took place.

MEDICAL REPORT ON CASE NO. 55 BY DR. ML

Dated during the first half of 1977.

This man was arrested during the first half of 1977 and brought to Castlereagh on the following day. I examined him on Day 9 at his solicitor's request.

Case No. 55 stated that during the previous weekend he was interrogated at intervals by members of the RUC, during which he was assaulted. He stated that he had been pulled around the room several times by his hair, that he had been punched and kicked on his arms and legs and trunk, also that his arms had been forcibly twisted up his back.

He also complained that he had been made to lie face down on the floor, and that his knees were hyperflexed, i.e., forcibly bent backwards, and he also stated that his feet were tramped on, his face was slapped, and that he was made to stand with his hands above his head for hours, and when he brought his hands down he felt a bursting of "pins and needles" sensation. Finally, he stated that he was made to make a fist with both hands and that his hands in this position were squeezed extremely tightly.

Today he complained of a feeling of numbness in both hands and of a painful left ring finger.

On examination I found that there was patchy hair loss, particularly in both temporoparietal and occipital regions.

On his left arm there were three bruises (fading) one above and two below the elbow on the flexor surface.

On his abdominal wall in the epigastrium (i.e., the top of the stomach) there was a large bruise approximately 4" x 3" (fading). There was abrasion ½" to 1" in diameter below his right knee and bruising on the front of the right leg below this (fading). There was extensive bruising along both iliac crests (more to the back than the front). Both these bruises were still quite livid. There were fading bruises on the back of his left thigh. There was slight swelling at the proximal interphalangeal joint of the left ring finger.

Conclusion: The clinical findings of hair loss and generalised body bruising are consistent with Case No. 55's history of what occurred during his interrogation.●

RED CHINESE GAVE $10 BILLION IN AID TO HANOI

HON. JOHN M. ASHBROOK

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 26, 1978

● Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Speaker, the Carter administration is treating the People's Republic of China like a newfound friend. We are moving toward full diplomatic relations with the Communist regime, even if it means dumping our longtime ally the Republic of China on Taiwan. There is also talk about the United States playing the "China card" against the Soviet Union.

I find the Carter administration's attitude somewhat strange. The Red Chinese are certainly not our friends nor can their assistance ever be counted on by the United States.

I was interested to see a recent story in the Washington Post where Communist China disclosed that in two decades it gave more than $10 billion to North Vietnam. According to China, this aid included "millions of rifles, tens of thousands of artillery pieces, over a billion rounds of bullets" and other items from ships to locomotives.

These Chinese rifles, bullets, and artillery pieces, of course, were used against us in the Vietnam war. They helped kill or maim thousands of American men. The Carter administration seems to have forgotten this as it rushes toward full diplomatic relations with Communist China.

Following is the text of the Washington Post article.

[From the Washington Post, July 28, 1978]

CHINA RELEASES AID FIGURES

HONG KONG.—In an unusual move aimed at Vietnam China has disclosed that its aid to Hanoi over more than two decades exceeded $10 billion, including "millions of rifles, tens of thousands of artillery pieces, over a billion rounds of bullets" and a variety of other items, from ships to locomotives.

China, which said the bulk of the aid consisted of free grants, ended its assistance to Hanoi earlier this month. The announcement of the amount of aid apparently was an attempt to rebut Vietnamese statements about aid value.

Vietnam, meanwhile announced it has agreed to hold talks with China over the touchy issue of ethnic Chinese living in Vietnam, which helped trigger the recent enmity between the two former allies.

UNITED STATES ARMS TRADE POLICIES IN THE WESTERN HEMISPHERE: A GLOBAL MODEL OR A DISASTER?—PART II

HON. ROBERT J. LAGOMARSINO

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 26, 1978

● Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Speaker, the first part of former Congressman Joseph Karth's testimony before the Inter-American Subcommittee of the House International Affairs Committee (inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD July 20, 1978) argued that the U.S. policy of unilateral restraint regarding arms sales in South America failed to achieve its main objective of holding down regional arms races. Furthermore, Mr. Karth put forward the proposition that the unintended consequences of our unilateral restraint has been the erosion of U.S. political and military influence in South America. The U.S. presence, Mr. Karth argues, was actually a force of stability and moderation in regional affairs, but due to the new arms trade policy, we are less able to exercise a beneficial influence upon unfolding events. In this, the second segment of Mr. Karth's testimony, he analyzes the human rights rational underlying the policy of unilateral restraint and finds it to be misconceived. Mr. Karth also goes on to detail the economic costs to American industry of this policy in terms of sales lost to foreign competitors. The third and final installment of Mr. Karth's testimony will follow.

TESTIMONY BY JOSEPH KARTH

Mr. Chairman, let me now turn to another aspect of our current arms sales policy to Latin America, that of withholding sales and aid in order to promote the observance of human rights. The Congress has joined—indeed, has led the Administration in this regard—with results equally bleak. Concern for human rights has been a consistent theme of U. S. policy toward Latin America for many years. We used our power of persuasion and public opinion and—importantly—our influence with the military, who have inordinate political power in many of these countries.

As our influence waned, however, our policy became more rigid. With the advent of the Carter Administration, human rights observance was made a specific criteria—in certain cases and for certain selected countries for providing U. S. aid and military sales. Thus, five Latin American countries have rejected or been denied U. S. military aid based on human rights considerations. As we indicated, Brazil has renounced its long standing defense agreements with the United States and the close relationship between our two countries has deteriorated.

Congress has joined in this effort. Section 406 of the International Security Assistance Act of 1976 prohibits military assistance, security supporting assistance, military education and training, credits, guaranties, cash sales, or the provision of export licenses to Chile. Section 620B of the Foreign Assistance Act places those same restrictions on Argentina after September 30, 1978. These are absolute, stringent prohibitions. Under these provisions there are no exceptions. These are strict prohibitions. There is no provision for a Presidential exception in the interest of U. S. national security, as is the case with Communist countries (Section 620 (F)). Thus, Argentina and Chile have been singled out in legislation as human rights violators and have had penalties imposed on them through legislation far more severe than those imposed upon North Korea, and China, for example. Indeed, recent reports indicate that the U.S. is encouraging military sales to China by France and the United Kingdom. In fact, the restrictions on Argentina and Chile are even more severe than those imposed upon those paragons of human rights, Uganda, Cambodia, Vietnam, Angola, and Mozambique.

Thus, we have a clear double standard of morality in implementing U.S. arms transfer policies. First, the U.S. has little or no leverage over some of the world's most repressive regimes, those we have already mentioned—China, North Korea, Cambodia, and the Soviet Union. In cases where we do have significant influence, such as South Korea, Saudi Arabia, or the Philippines, our human rights concerns bump against other, perhaps more important, considerations such as national security or economic necessity. So the brunt of our human rights policy has fallen on those nations that are poor enough and friendly enough to need and be eligible for U.S. aid. But they are not strategically or economically important to this country. Neither are they in the forefront of human rights violation.

We are, of course, not here to defend those nations who violate the human rights of their citizens. The United States, of course, must be concerned for human rights around the world; should speak up for those rights, and should use its influence to moderate flagrant violations of human rights. Such a stance, such a concern, does our nation honor.

But concern for human rights as an element of U.S. policy was not born on January 20, 1977 with the Carter Administration. As State Department witnesses have testified concern for human rights in Latin America has been U.S. policy for the past fifteen years.

And what has been the results of this concern on the part of the U.S. with human rights in Latin America over the years? What has our policy accomplished? According to information furnished us by the State Department, in 1963, 13 Latin American countries were considered to be "clearly free" while 3 were "clearly non-free." In 1978, the figures were 15 nations "clearly free" and 7 "clearly non-free." Three other nations were characterized in 1978 as having "irregular performance" as compared to 2 in 1963. This is not a very impressive record of progress.

But the Carter Administration has added something new to human rights policy First—a huge bureaucracy has been created to translate the President's noble thought into practice. This bureaucracy, with its own vested interest in this issue to the exclusion of other considerations, now threatens to jeopardize other foreign policy/national security objectives by its attempts to implement this policy.

This human rights bureaucracy within the State Department, periodically reports on human rights conditions of other countries in order to decide whether a particular government is good enough to deserve U.S. support. This makes the U.S. appear to others as moralistic and "holier than thou". It also leads to bad policy. It's equivalent to the "shooting the horse to kill the flea" mentality.

Secondly, recent reports indicate that the human rights bureaucracy has systematically rejected almost every single request from U.S. allies for civil law-enforcement equipment including such routine items as tear gas, and handcuffs.

This is not policy, it is a mindless substitute for policy. It might be better referred to as an "ideology" of sorts.

And of course, not all nations recognize the U.S. definition of human rights and not all can afford the luxury of U.S.-type individual freedom.

In this regard, let us look at Argentina specifically. This Subcommittee stated last February, concerning Argentina:

"The present military government came to power in March 1976 in response to the manifestations of social, political and economic disorder. During the last months of the regime of Isabel Peron the country was in a state of chaos, characterized by soaring inflation and virtual anarchy. Terrorist groups of both the right and left were engaged in open warfare. The military filled a power vacuum created by Isabel Peron's inability to govern with support of the Argentine people. The state of siege under which the present government rules, was declared on November 6, 1974, by the Peron Administration in the face of the rising tide of terrorism."

When survival is at stake, some human rights must take lower priority, as our citizens of Japanese ancestry who were interned at the beginning of World War II can testify, and as the American Indian today would perhaps want to testify. Many developing countries see economic development and national security as paramount human rights while the U.S. continues to emphasize personal freedoms. Some are faced with threats to their survival from internal dissidents. A South Korea diplomat recently put it as follows: "The human rights standard varies from culture to culture, but your administration is trying to impose a unilateral standard."

Frankly, I am not really well enough informed to know whether or not our concept of human rights and morality (and when you talk about morality, you must talk about total morality) is good enough to export, or can flourish in different soil, but I do know that our foreign trade competitors are not trying to export theirs. Beyond that, if our human righs program is worth a damn, shouldn't it apply to "not buying" as well as "not selling"?

In any case, we do not help the cause of human rights by withholding economic help to the victims of human rights violations. Earlier this year, in March, a delegation from the House Committee on Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs, in a letter to the President (which I would ask be included in the record) reporting on their visit to Latin America, stated:

". . . the people of the countries we visited seem to believe that moral suasion and the power of world opinion were more effective in achieving progress toward human rights than economic sanctions imposed indirectly by the United States through its participation in multilateral lending institutions and directly by the United States through its bilateral aid and/or military sales and credit programs.

"For example, in Argentina . . . we met with three human rights groups. The repeated refrain was, "Don't use economic sanctions against our country." The most thoroughly genuine of those three groups was called the Mothers of Plaza del Mayo. . . . Even this group favored moral suasion over economic sanctions.

"Mr. President, we support your policy statements on human rights. We think the Congress may have overreacted in attempting to put these statements of principle into legislative form. . . . We believe that the Department of State has overreacted to expressions from the President and the Congress in a way that is not only detrimental to the United States but also to the people about whose human rights we are concerned."

We agree that the Congress has overreacted and would propose amendments to restrictive legislation so as to bring Chile and Argentina at least on a par with the Communist countries insofar as arms sales are concerned. These have been included at the end of this testimony.

And the State Department, of course, has overreacted. Although arms transfers to Argentina are embargoed by legislation after September 30, 1978, the bureaucrats at the State Department, clearly perceiving the intent of Congress and always relieved at not having to make independent judgments, have effectively imposed such an embargo already.

What has been the cost of our human rights policy in economic terms alone? What benefits have resulted? As Forbes Magazine recently said, "At least we ought to know in jobs what the export of our morality engenders." I agree. In recent testimony before this Subcommittee, a State Department witness stated that the overall impact on the American economy of our policies in Latin America would be "negligible, . . . though particular orders may occasionally be important to specific U.S. companies." Mr. Chairman, we are concerned with both the U.S. economy and with the fate of specific U.S. companies. We, of course, do not expect the same degree of concern from the Department of State. Their jobs and/or their futures are fairly well assured! But let us see what the Department of State considers to be of negligible economic impact. According to figures provided us by the Department—figures State Department witnesses did not feel it was necessary to divulge to this Subcommittee—the effect is far too striking to be accurately characterized as "negligible."

Argentina provides the most thoroughly documented example of the full fiscal impact of our human rights policy in application. Let me quote the information received from the State Department—but not provided this Subcommittee (and remember, these figures apply to Argentina alone):

"We calculate that sales denied to Latin nations, together with orders simply not placed by US manufacturers and suppliers who can see little merit in expending time and money on sale efforts almost certain to be denied, account for a very substantial sum. . . .

"At the moment, some 169 Munitions Control cases worth $62.5 million are being held up; two cases alone which were either denied or withdrawn account for another $8 million. Sales promotion cases which have been turned down obviously account for another significant sum which cannot be precisely measured, however, we estimate some 25 million in lost business in this category. There are over 74 FMS cases pending with an estimated value of 45.4 million. Other pending cases for major end items of equipment, military ambulances aircraft, amphibious lighters, a computerized communications system (denied on March 14) amount to another 120 million, while outstanding Export-Import Bank cases total 518 million. A gas pipeline bid was lost by an American firm after the US voted against the project in the IDB. The 30 million dollar contract went to a French firm.

"In sum, taken together, we calculate the total value of these cases at 813.519 million dollars. This figure itself may indeed be conservative since we cannot accurately calculate the cost of already discouraged business due to our widely known licensing and financing delays. It is safe to say, however, that the spin-off effect of lost business of this magnitude cannot help but influence every other potential supplier and customer in the Hemisphere."

Mr. Chairman, lost sales conservatively estimated to be $813.5 million to one country alone are not, to my mind, economically negligible. Only a myopic economic "genius" would suggest it. If only we could export some of these geniuses to our political enemies, how helpful it would be.

Mr. Chairman, these lost sales mean jobs to American workers—how many jobs does $813 million to one country in sales buy? They mean an improvement in our balance of payments, and consequent support for the dollar and lessening of inflationary pressures. And this is for firm orders that have not been approved. Not counted are orders which were not even offered to U. S. firms because of the likelihood of disapproval. In this regard, I would like to introduce into the Record a letter addressed to George Meany, President of the AFL–CIO. It is from a sales representative in Argentina for several U. S. electronic firms. He details several lost sales of some $1.4 billion in Argentina as follows:

A. Navy: 6 Navy frigates and 4 patrol boats, value U.S. $1,000,000,000.

U.S. Shipyard could not quote due to export license prohibitions on Human Rights. Germany will supply these ships.

B. Air Force: 100 inertial navigation systems for earlier purchased U.S. Aircraft (Skyhawks), value U.S. $15,000,000.

U.S. Electronics companies could not quote because of export license prohibitions on Human Rights. United Kingdom will supply these systems.

C. Other aircraft electronic components such as head-up displays, fire control sensors, transponders, etc., value U.S. $100,000,000.

Again no U.S. Company can quote. The British and Israelis will sell this equipment.

D. Navy: Laser range finders, value U.S. $12,000,000, to be bought in the U.K.

No attempt was even made to try and find out if the U.S. would sell to Argentina.

E. Army: Optical and control equipment for tanks that are being built in Argentina, value U.S. $250,000,000.

Supplier, either Germany or United Kingdom. The U.S. suppliers were not even approached.

Mr. Chairman, these lost sales, lost jobs, lost production, are not negligible to the U.S. economy. They are certainly not considered to be negligible to the British, Israeli, French, or West German economies.

And how does the denial of these sales impact on human rights in Argentina? Let us look at some specific sales which have been disapproved or are currently being held up by the Department of State:

The sale of commercial executive aircraft, configured as air ambulances, is being held up, apparently because these air ambulances are to be operated by the Argentine Navy. How the denial of this humanitarian equipment designed to save lives and readily available from other sources, helps human rights is something that cannot be comprehended by reasonable people nor justified by those of sound judgment;

The sale of belt buckles, shoes, flight coveralls, gloves, flying helmets, and survival equipment for the Argentine armed forces is being held up. This seems particularly petty;

Although the sale of A–14, P–2, and C–130 aircraft to Argentina has been approved previously, approval for training simulators and spare parts for those aircraft are now being held up; the denial of spare parts for previously furnished aircraft seems to me, Mr. Chairman, to be actually immoral. Such denial does not contribute to human rights—it merely contributes to the killing of Argentine pilots;

The sale of metal and mine detection equipment, designed to screen crowds at the recent World Cup games, was denied; human rights?

The sale of commercial aircraft to Argentina has been held up because these aircraft contain inertial navigation systems, essential to the safe operation of these aircraft. These systems are on the U.S. Munitions List, although they have previously been furnished to Argentina on other aircraft;

The sale of aircraft and helicopters to be used in the support of the Argentine Antarctic Directorate are being held up.

Hundreds of other similar examples could be cited. Indeed, it might be useful for this Committee to request a complete list from the Department of State so as to get the full scope of how Argentina is being "punished" for its internal policies.●

THE UNHAPPY HISTORY OF TRADE PROTECTIONISM

HON. JOHN J. LaFALCE

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 26, 1978

● Mr. LaFALCE. Mr. Speaker, one of the most important debates being conducted throughout the length and breadth of this country at this time concerns the future of our international trade policy. This debate is also present in every other industrialized country, as domestic industries are now facing stiff competition from imported goods.

Despite differences in vocabulary and nuance, this debate is following a classic pattern, free trade versus protectionism. While free trade and protectionism cannot be and are not absolutes, they do involve clear-cut choices between alternative policies, both in terms of the record of previous encounters between these two principles and the unfortunate consequences of a return to trade protectionism.

Our distinguished colleague, Steve Neal, authored an incisive article for the Washington Post last week, in which he skillfully analyzed the economic and political results of the infamous Smoot-Hawley Tariff of 1930. As the highly respected gentleman from North Carolina points out, that tariff helped insure that the stock market collapse of 1929 would become a deep and worldwide depression, which helped bring about World War II. I hope that all Members will carefully read his article, which follows:

THE UNHAPPY HISTORY OF TRADE PROTECTIONISM

(By Stephen L. Neal)

Before we become saturated with 1930s nostalgia, with Little Orphan Annie, "The Waltons" and art deco, we ought to review one of the hard lessons of the Great Depression: Protectionism is not the answer to our economic problems.

At a recent White House meeting, I was surprised to hear one of our leading industrialists suggest that Congress protect American industries from foreign competition by enacting legislation frighteningly similar to the Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act of 1930.

I have since heard that kind of protectionist talk increasingly from businessmen and from an alarming number of my House colleagues, who are under pressure to secure for their home-state industries quick relief from import competition.

The reasons for this sentiment are clear. Unemployment is still high. Inflation persists. Our industries face strong competition at home and abroad from the aggressive traders of Europe, Japan and the rapidly developing Third World. We are importing more foreign goods than ever, but the demand for American products overseas has been sluggish. As a result, our trade deficit exceeded $3 billion last year, and the dollar's value has been depreciating.

I am keenly aware of how those economic stresses make protectionism seem attractive. I am no purist on this issue. I have supported limited protection when I thought it was justified, particularly for the textile industry, which is highly vulnerable to competition from newly industrializing nations. But I sense that some of my colleagues are tempted to go beyond limited administrative measures that assist distressed industries on a selective basis. They would shove aside the administration's trade negotiators and legislate broader measures reminiscent of Smoot-Hawley.

Like most of those who talk protectionism today, Smoot-Hawley supporters saw themselves as prudent men acting to avert an economic crisis. President Herbert Hoover originally asked only that Congress protect farmers and a few industries. But once the bill started through Congress, the logrolling began in earnest, with members insisting that their home industries be included. No fewer than 1,250 amendments were attached to protect various products. Tariffs were raised by an average of 53 percent.

More than 1,000 economists unsuccessfully petitioned Hoover to veto the bill. So did our world trade partners, who pointed out that they would have no dollars to buy American goods if their own products were shut out here. Even before the bill had cleared Congress, the anticipation of its passage contributed to the panic precipitating the stock-market crash of 1929. Businessmen and investors sensed all too well the potential dangers of high tariff walls. Their instincts proved correct.

Foreign retaliation was swift: Our trading partners erected their own tariff walls. Within three years, our industrial exports had declined by 73 percent and our agricultural exports by 67 percent. The loss of foreign trade, of course, eliminated more jobs, closed more factories and prolonged the Depression. Even worse, the protectionist spirit spread throughout the world and contributed to the economic and political unrest that ultimately led to World War II.

The lesson was clear. President Franklin Roosevelt pushed through the Reciprocal Trade Act of 1934 to get our foreign trade moving again. And ever since, despite an occasional instance of backsliding, the United States has worked toward freer world trade.

If Smoot-Hawleyism didn't work in the 1930s, it obviously won't work in today's interrelated world economy. The United States now exports one-sixth of everything it manufacturers and one-third of its farm products. Overall, we exported some $120 billion worth of goods and services last year, and this trade supported at least 4.5 million jobs in the United States. All this is at stake, remember, when we play the protectionist game—a game always played by more than one.

Indiscriminate protectionism would have other serious consequences. It would deprive consumers of the wide choices and lower prices made available by imports. It would accelerate inflation by eliminating import competition. It would jeopardize our foreign relations and undermine a generation of efforts to build a peaceful and productive world. In particular, it would poison our relationships with the emerging countries of the Third World, who need trade to survive, to pay debts, to modernize and—significantly—to continue to be able to buy our products.

As I said, I am no purist. Free trade, like world peace, human perfection and the low-calorie banana split, is something we have to keep working toward, not something we have achieved. So long as other countries protect some of their industries, it is only common sense that we do the same—in a selective, painstaking way. We should be tough negotiators, yielding trade concessions only to those who give in return. We should vigorously oppose dubious trade practices such as the dumping of foreign products below the cost on our markets and the predatory financing schemes some countries employ to promote their exports.

If we keep trying, however, many trade barriers eventually can be eliminated by negotiations and by the working of market forces. The important thing is that we continue to move toward freer trade, inch by inch if necessary, and that we not retreat in panic to wholesale protectionism achieved by political logrolling in Congress.

History is a great teacher. We should remember its lesson on protectionism.●

THE ITALIAN-AMERICAN SPORTS HALL OF FAME

HON. HENRY J. HYDE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 26, 1978

● Mr. HYDE. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the honorary board of directors of the Italian-American Sports Hall of Fame, I am pleased to announce that this organization will be holding its second annual induction banquet in my district on September 16.

The Italian-American Sports Hall of Fame is an independent nonprofit organization. Originally formed to honor Italian-American boxing champions, it has rapidly expanded in the last year to honor all outstanding athletes of Italian heritage.

Last year's banquet, which was a huge success, honored Italian-American world boxing champions and, judging from the number of former champs who attended the affair, it was indeed, as dubbed by one writer, "the night of the living legends." Those in attendance included Lou Salica, Harry Jeffra, Willie Pep, Tommy Paul, Petey Scalzo, Sal Bartolo, Paddy DeMarco, Sammy Angott, Louis D'Ambrosio, Tippy Larkin, Tony DeMarco, Carmen Basilio, Johnny Wilson, Jake LaMotta, Joey Giardello, Melio Bettina, Joey Maxim, and Willie Pastrano.

Five former world champs were inducted into the hall of fame, including Sammy Angott, Jake LaMotta, Rocky Graziano, Carmen Basilio, and Willie Pep. Rocky Graziano was, unfortunately, unable to attend but was inducted in absentia. Primo Carnera, Rocky Marciano, and Tony Canzoneri were inducted posthumously, and Angelo Dundee was inducted as the most outstanding Italian-American boxing trainer.

At this year's ceremonies, eight more Italian-American sports heroes will be inducted into the hall of fame including Johnny Wilson and Lou Ambers, Joe and Dom DiMaggio, Gino Marchetti, Charlie Trippi, Vince Lombardi, and Eddie Arcaro.

Though the Italian-American Sports Hall of Fame is still in its infancy, enthusiasm and support for the organization has grown tremendously within the past year. I am hopeful that the dream of its cofounders, George Randazzo and Joseph Granata, to build a multipurpose complex to house the hall of fame museum as well as other sports-related facilities, will soon be realized. Such a facility would include special programs and events for young people, senior citizens, and the handicapped.

Another commendable goal of the organization is to establish a special endowment fund that would give athletic scholarships to some of tomorrow's sports heroes.

I know my colleagues in the House join me in congratulating the cofounders, directors, trustees, and supporters of the Italian-American Sports Hall of Fame for the important strides made since the organization's inception. In addition to my anticipation of the next induction banquet on September 16, I greatly look forward to the day when the Italian-American Sports Hall of Fame complex will officially open. I predict, judging from the enthusiasm engendered among its supporters, that that occasion may not be far off.●

THE CONTINUING PATTERN OF GROSS VIOLATIONS OF HUMAN RIGHTS IN ARGENTINA

HON. CHRISTOPHER J. DODD

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 26, 1978

● Mr. DODD. Mr. Speaker, last Friday, July 14, I presided over a meeting in the Rayburn Building to hear from a number of people who described their firsthand experiences in Argentina. The clear pattern of human rights violations in Argentina is sobering to hear. For the benefit of my colleagues who were not able to attend the meeting, I am submitting for the RECORD three documents. First is a description of what was said at the July 14 meeting, compiled by one of the principal participants, Father Patrick Rice. The description is not meant to be taken as a word-for-word transcript of the meeting, but it is an accurate record of what was said. Second is a factsheet on seven members of a family who have all disappeared in Argentina. Finally, I have included a letter from Matilde Herrera, the mother of three of the seven family members who have disappeared. I hope that all of my colleagues will take the time to read her eloquent and moving letter:

JULY 14 MEETING

Mr. DODD. At a time when our attention is rightfully focused on the denial of human rights in the Soviet Union, we should not forget that the human rights situation in other countries is often far worse. Argentina, in particular, presents a very tragic picture. There are some 3,500 officially recognized political prisoners in Argentina. Amnesty International estimates that the total number of people actually in detention is closer to 10,000. Even more alarming is the number of people who have simply disappeared. There are some 15,000 persons who are unaccounted for, although many are believed to be held in secret detention centers throughout the country. Many people have been killed, but their remains are never returned to their relatives for burial. Torture seems to be routine. During a recent hearing of the European Parliament on Argentina, which I attended, the human rights situation there was dramatically explained.

The purpose of this meeting today is to offer Members and their staffs the opportunity to hear about the situation in Argentina and to decide what is the proper course of action for the U.S. Congress to take. So I present to you Father Patrick Rice, a young Irish priest, who as a missionary in Argentina was imprisoned and tortured. He was one of the group who spoke so eloquently at the European Parliament.

Fr. RICE. I would like to underline the tremendous problems one faces if one has a relative or friend disappear in Argentina. There is absolutely no where and no one to turn to for information on the whereabouts of a person who has disappeared. In my own case, I was detained in October, 1976 and it was only due to the efforts of the Irish Embassy and the fact that there were no charges against me that I was finally able to leave the country. However, the person detained with me, Fátima Cabrera, a catechist, is still under a type of house arrest called restricted liberty. I would like to emphasize the fact that many priests and nuns have suffered Argentine repression first hand, especially those of us who worked among the poor or who questioned the government's human rights policies.

Among those who have disappeared for example are: Fathers Carlos Bustos, Pablo Gazzarri, and Kleber Silva and two French nuns, Alicia Domon and Leonie Duquet. There has been no official response from the Argentine government when the status of these people has been brought up, although unofficially we know that they are in secret detention centers, but one is never fully sure if they are still alive. Disappearances still continue, for example, on June 28, 1978 the well-known editor of Mercado, Julian Delgado was abducted by pro-government groups and there is as yet no explanation of his fate.

Mr. DODD. Now we shall hear from Marta Panero, a citizen of the United States, born in Philadelphia in 1957, but who has lived most of her life in Argentina. She was imprisoned and tortured in September 1976 and was released only recently in February 1978.

Ms. PANERO. I was a student of journalism in Cordoba when I was detained. A week before my sister, Maria Susana, also born in Philadelphia, was arrested. Both our fiances had been detained some weeks previously. Their names are: Luis Leiva and Daniel Oscar Sonsini. There is still no news of their whereabouts. I was taken to a house overlooking the water-dam of San Roque of Carlos Paz in the mountains of Córdoba where I was tortured together with five other prisoners from the University, some of whose names I remember, Cesar Pasamonte (20), Mr. Garcia (aged 29 and father of two children). All of them have disappeared. After two weeks of the most brutal torture, including burnings with hot coals and having snow thrown on us, I was brought by my torturers to the military camp of La Rivera where I could see the people who brought me fraternizing with the military personnel in the camp. Finally after having been in several prisons in Córdoba, in April, 1977 I was brought to Villa Devoto prison in Buenos Aires. I was accused of cooperating with the subversion in the University, but I was never charged. My sister, Maria Susana is still in prison, and I make a special appeal that she be allowed to leave the country. No charges have been filed against her and she has never even been interrogated. Conditions in prison are very bad, and we were subjected to all kinds of harassment, including very humiliating strip searches.

Mr. DODD. Alfredo Forti is 18 years old and was detained together with his mother and younger brothers in Ezeiza Airport in February, 1977. His mother has not been heard from since.

Mr. FORTI. On February 18, 1977 together with my mother Nelida Forti and my younger brothers, we boarded a flight of Aerolineas Argentinas which was going to Caracas, where my father had begun work as a doctor. Our papers had all been approved, but 10 minutes before lift-off police officers boarded the plane and ordered us off saying we were all under arrest. We were brought out of the airport, hooded (even my 8 year old brother), and put into cars. We were brought to a military establishment where we were kept in detention for one week. Finally, at midnight one night, my four brothers and I were released on the streets of Buenos Aires, but my mother remained in detention. Despite all we have done, we have heard nothing about our mother's where-abouts since that time 18 months ago.

Mr. DODD. And now Mrs. Ebe Lopez-Guerra.

Mrs. LOPEZ-GUERRA. I speak as a mother whose daughter Maria Christina Lopez-Guerra disappeared in Argentina two years ago. I speak as a member of the Herrera-Belaustegui family. Seven members of our family has disappeared in Argentina. The last was some six weeks ago in May, 1978—Julio Lareu, for whom Amnesty International has begun a campaign.

Mr. DODD. Finally, we shall hear from Ms. Ana Lajmanovich.

Ms LAJMANOVICH. My 24 year old sister, Terresa, was a student of medicine who was detained on March 22, 1977. Despite all we have done, we have not heard from her since that time. The worst suffering is not knowing if she is alive or dead. The only political activities she participated in were those of the Peronist party when that party was perfectly legal.

Mr. DODD. Are there any questions or comments?

Mr. LARRY MCDONALD. I believe that it is wrong to compare the human rights problems in Argentina with those of the Soviet Union, because in Argentina there is a legitimate problem with widespread terrorism and a weak organized government. That many people have disappeared is a tragic result of a state of near civil war in Argentina.

Mr. DODD. The majority of the thousands of people who have disappeared in Argentina have been ordinary citizens with no contact with terrorism. Since March, 1976 there has been a well organized military government in Argentina which has total control of the country. In fact President Videla himself openly admits that left-wing terrorist forces have been defeated, yet the disappearance of innocent citizens continues. Certainly, one cannot equate the human rights violations of Argentina with a nation defending itself against internal terrorism; that is simply not the case here.

Fr. RICE. I would like to emphasize that in my experience, and the experiences of other people in this room, torture in Argentina is widesperad and brutally conducted. There is widespread use of electric shocks, beatings and drenchings with water. Torture is used to extract the names of friends and acquaintances and is brutal, professional and systematic. Torture is administered to anyone with any sort of contacts with left-leaning groups, no matter how remote.

Mr. DODD. Thank you all for coming here today. I feel very strongly that if the U.S. Congress can do anything to improve the human rights climate in Argentina, it is necessary that we hear from people like yourselves who have experienced Argentine repression first hand. I commend you for your great courage and perseverance in seeing that the truth be known.

Finally, I would like to excuse the absence of Father Jesus Silva, whose brother Kleber Silva is missing in Argentina. He was unfortunately unable to get here in time. In closing, I should remind all here that since 1976, nine priests, 3 former priests and one bishop have been killed in Argentina. Ten church workers have disappeared, eight are in prison and more than forty who would normally be working in Argentina are in exile. We must never be afraid to raise our voices against these kinds of gross violations of basic human rights.

FACTSHEET: DISAPPEARANCE IN A FAMILY, ARGENTINA

Seven members of a family disappeared in Argentina in the following four incidents:

1. On the 26 of July, 1976 my daughter, María Cristina López Guerra, born 9/8/54, Identity Document (Cédula de Identidad) 7.490.828, and her husband Martín Belaústegui Herrera, born 7/27/56, Identity Document (Cédula de Identidad) 6,309.664, were taken by a group of armed men, from their home, Nicaragua 10.345, kilómetro 22.600, Ruta 8 del Partido 3 de Febrero, Provincia de Buenos Aires, Argentina. María Cristina was pregnant.

2. On the 13th of May, 1977, Valeria Belaústegui Herrera, born 2/3/53, Identity Document (Cédula de Identidad) 6.307.009, and her husband Ricardo Waisberg, born 7/15/47, Identity Document 5.130.283, disappeared. It is not known how they were taken. Their baby appeared mysteriously on the day of their disappearance in a hospital with a sign around her neck.

3. On the 30th of May, 1977, Electra Irene Lareu, born 5/17/54, Identity Document (Cédula de Identidad) 7.034.602, and her husband, Rafael José Belaústegui Herrera, born 5/30/54, Identity Document (Cédula de Identidad) 6.309.665, were taken by armed forces from the following address: Bustamante 2173, Buenos Aires, Argentina.

4. On the 29th of May, 1978, Julio Eduardo Lareu, born 7/1/27, Identity Document (Cédula de Identidad) 2.384.492, Draft Card (Libreta de Eurolamiento) 4.034.122, was taken from his home and work place, Deheza 2775, Buenos Aires, Argentina.

Mr. Julio Lareu, a carpenter, is the father of Electra Irene Lareu, who disappeared a year, less a day, before he did (see incident 2).

APPEAL

I address this appeal to all governments, to all Churches, to political parties and their leaders, and to all institutions in the world concerned with solidarity and the defense of human rights. To families all over the world, to all mothers, to all men of good will.

I do this urged by my grief as a mother, my responsibility as a grandmother and by the terrible anguish I feel faced with after the disappearance of my family over the past year. If I have not addressed public opinion before now, it was because of the hope of getting some results from the legal steps taken after the kidnapping and disappearance of all my children. In spite of following the classical means which in earlier days always produced an answer from the powers of justice this turned out to be a vain hope. The six writs of "habeas corpus" presented after the disappearance of my children had either no answer or a negative one. None of the attempts made in the Argentine Republic to obtain information as to their whereabouts bore any fruit.

On the 26th of July 1976, my youngest son was kidnapped together with his wife. Martin Belaustegui Herrera, who would have been 20 years old the following day, and Maria Cristina Lopez Guerra, 21 years of age and two months pregnant, were coming home from work that afternoon. A group of fifteen armed men in civilian clothes were waiting for them concealed in the court of their house. Once they had caught the two young people, the so-called civilians blast the door with their machine-guns and pushed them inside. The neighbours were forbidden to open their doors or windows and, as usually happens in this type of action, terror prevented any reaction from their part. The people from the neighbourhood, thus frightened, witnessed the kidnapping peeping through their closed shutters. After a while spent inside the house, the two young people were seen to be shoved out and into a car with hoods over their heads. But this was not all: a few minutes later an army truck parked in front of the house and uniformed troops looted all its contents.

Neighbours cannot avoid weeping when they talk about this. "They were very young, good kids, hardworking. Why did they take them in this way? Why did they steal every thing from their house? If they did something wrong, why not take them to court? Why don't they say anything about it?". I, too, as a mother have asked myself why for over a year. All the steps we have taken since then have been useless, we have been unable to obtain any information about the couple. If they are alive, where are they? If they have died . . . shouldn't their bodies at least be given to their desperate parents?

On the 13th May 1977, at 7 p.m. my daughter's mother-in law received a call from a clinic in the city of San Antonio de Padua, Buenos Aires State, warning her that some civilians had left there a baby-girl, a year and a half old, with a note hanging from her neck with the inscription "I am Valeria Belaustegui's daughter" and a phone number. She is the child of my daughter Valeria Belaustegui Herrera, 24 years of age, and her husband Ricardo Waiberg, 25 years of age. When baby's paternal grandmother arrived at the clinic she was informed by the staff, obviously frightened about the whole case, that the baby was extremely upset and had been given sedatives and taken to the local police station. There she was handed over to her grandmother. The child suffers from a serious nervous condition. For several nights she woke up crying and calling her parents. We don't know what happened between 5 p.m. when Valeria called the child's pediatrician to discuss a minor ailment, and 7 p.m., the time of the call from the clinic. All attempts at obtaining information concerning the whereabouts of my daughter and her husband have been unsuccessful. We don't know what happened to them, who kidnapped or arrested them, we don't know if they are alive or dead.

On the 30th May of the current year, a Joint Armed Forces procedure took place in an apartment in downtown Buenos Aires. My son, Rafael José Belaustegui Herrera, 23 years old that very day, his wife Electra Irene Lareu, also 23, and their twenty month old son were staying there with some friends. The house-owner, my son and his wife were taken handcuffed, while the baby was left with the friend's wife. Once in the street my son managed to cry out: "Lareu, Belaustegui, we are being kidnapped". Maybe a goodwilled neighbour would dare to alert their families! The search for information about my son and his wife has been completely fruitless so far. Twenty days after this event, the baby's maternal grandparents received a call from a guardian on the staff of a children's institution belonging to the Ministry of Social Welfare, saying that the child had been left there and that they could pick him up. The child is later given to the care of his grandfather by a judge. The baby is anxious and nervous, sleeps poorly and is taking time to recover from his grief.

In less than one year a whole family has disappeared. Nobody has told me what they are accused of, or where they are. I don't know if they are sick, if they are being tortured, if they are alive or dead. If they are prisoners, I know that this horror of misinformation and doubts is one of the weapons employed by the government of my country in this so-called "war" in which the lists of arrested people are not made public. I'm not addressing the Argentinian authorities because all the steps I have taken in this direction have been absolutely useless.

I simply want, in my name and in the name of those two babies who have been separated from their parents, to ask those who are in a position to get in touch with or to influence the Argentinian Government to try, with all the means in their power, to find out from the military, civil or ecclesiastical authorities if my six children are alive or dead.

If they are alive, I ask those who hold them to inform me about it and about their condition. If they have died, I hope to have the strength and the forbearance to carry on, teaching my grandchildren love for man and life, remembering the young and beautiful faces of my children, their capacity for love, their devotion to their own children, their generosity, their love for all.

I don't think I have the monopoly of pain in Argentina. I don't want you to interpret my words in this way. Maybe I have spoken as too sad a mother, but I also want to take upon myself the pain of all Argentinian mothers who are in the same circumstances. It is of utmost importance to ask the Argentina Government to publish the lists with the names of all those who have disappeared or been kidnapped, and the list of deaths.

By what right—as Christian men—have they become the inflictors, the administrators of so much pain? What is their idea of justice. Or do they think they will not have to account for the fate of 15,000 who have disappeared?

I believe that the time has come for all men with a sense of justice to ask for these lists of the men who govern the Argentine Republic.

I thank you for your attention and for any steps you take in order to alleviate our grief, our terrible uncertainty.

As an Argentinian, as a woman, as a mother, as a grandmother, thank you.

MATILDE HERRERA.●

REDTAPE SNARES U.S. FISHERMEN

HON. WILLIAM S. COHEN

OF MAINE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 26, 1978

● Mr. COHEN, Mr. Speaker, those of us who worked long and hard for the passage of legislation extending U.S. fisheries jurisdiction to 200 miles have been distressed in recent months by the many problems which have arisen as the administration has sought to enforce its numerous provisions.

We knew that enforcement would not be a simple matter, but we certainly did not intend for the administration to impose on hardworking American fishermen the unnecessarily restrictive and cumbersome regulations which have been proposed and promulgated since the act took effect.

The redtape, which is presently preventing the act from accomplishing its congressionally mandated objectives, must be eliminated if our domestic fishermen are to survive and prosper.

In the attempt to manage the vast ocean resources which the United States suddenly acquired, the Department of Commerce instituted complex regulations for the fishing industry. And in accordance with the law passed by this body, the Commerce Department regularly consults a group of scientists, whose knowledge helps the Department manage the valuable resources.

I wholeheartedly support the Department's efforts to carefully manage the Nation's marine resources. For too many years the seas have been overfished and exploited. However, if the regulations continue to infringe upon the freedom of fishermen to carry out their trade, I will certainly consider withdrawing my support for the management arrangements as presently structured. Today fishermen are burdened not only with heavy regulations; the constantly changing nature of the heavy regulations with which our fishermen must deal make consistent production impossible. What is worse, though, is that the quotas which have been established by the Commerce Department encourage waste, as fish accidentally hauled in are thrown overboard again when the quota has already been met.

Congress took a bold and important step in establishing the 200-mile limit 2 years ago. Yet it is clear that the law provided no magical solution. New problems have sprung up in the wake of the retreating foreign ships. It is now up to this body to encourage the development of a formula to manage our irreplaceable new resources, one which is acceptable not only to the ecologists, but also to those upon whom the fishing industry must ultimately rest, the fishermen themselves.

With these thoughts in mind, I respectfully insert the following article in the RECORD:

UNITED STATES FISHERMAN: REDTAPE IS OUR REAL ENEMY

(By Bill Ryan)

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.—José DeSousa, skipper of the stern trawler Gertrude C, looked out at the harbor of this old fishing town and spit out his opinion of the fishing business today.

"We're not fishermen," he said. "We're convicts. We don't know whether we're coming or going. They've taken away our freedom."

Other fishermen might put it another way, but the sentiment is the same. Talk to those up the New England and North Pacific coasts, and their hostility and frustrations spew out.

They say they are overregulated. They say they are victims of the bureaucracy or of the courts. Mention Secretary of Commerce Juanita Kreps, the head of U.S. fishermen (at least in name) and out flows a stream of invective. "The last of the hunters," as one fisherman describes his fellows, are united only in misery and in protest against the snarl of red tape that envelops them.

And yet, 1977 and 1978 were supposed to be the return to paradise for U.S. fishermen. With foreign fishing fleets driven by law out of U.S. waters, up to 200 miles off the coast, the bad days were supposedly over.

A TANGLED MESH

But the days have only gotten more bitter. Today the U.S. fishing industry is a tangled mesh involving the federal bureaucracy, fishermen cheating on laws, resentment and hatred within the industry, and a great deal of waste—of money, certainly, but also of seafood at a time when such resources are becoming more and more scarce.

Traditionally, the seas have been open hunting grounds all over the world. But in the post-World War II era, many countries, realizing the importance of offshore resources, started to "post" them, establishing jurisdictions of up to 200 miles at sea.

South American countries used 200-mile laws to zone out American tuna fishermen. Developing African countries posted their waters, sometimes as an indication of emerging nationalism. Iceland and England engaged in several "cod wars" over alleged violations of posted Icelandic waters.

Then in the mid-1960's there began a major invasion of United States offshore waters. Foreign fishing fleets—Russian, Polish, West German, East German, Spanish, Japanese—hit the East Coast, particularly the Georges Bank area off the New England coast, one of the world's richest and most fabled fishing areas. (Portuguese fishermen had been there before the pilgrims set up the first permanent New World colony at Plymouth.)

Meanwhile, with the world hungering for protein, fishing equipment had become more sophisticated, ships bigger. The fleets, particularly the Russian and Polish, had electronic equipment to detect schools of fish. Scout helicopters operated from huge "mother" ships—floating factories for processing and freezing catches brought in by teams of trawlers.

These foreign armadas would work an area until no signs of marine life remained, then move on.

The United States government watched the plunder for a decade, until Congress finally passed the Fishery Conservation and Management Act of 1976—known as the 200-mile law—effective March 1, 1977.

Pressure for the law came from the fishermen, who screamed that they couldn't compete with the foreign fleets. But the Pentagon and the State Department had both opposed the 200-mile law. For years they had used offshore American waters as international bargaining chips, and they didn't want to lose the clout.

But the law did pass. The foreign fleets were driven out and have since become almost a negligible factor. Never again would the Northwest Atlantic be pillaged of 1.3 million metric tons of fin fish and squid as in 1972, with U.S. fishermen getting less than a sixth of the haul. The fishermen thought it was now back to the days of Kipling's Captains Courageous, where hard work was rewarded and the best fishermen won. There was joy in the waterfront restaurants of Chatham, Gloucester and New Bedford, Mass.

The joy soon turned to dismay, however, then to cries of injustice that have only grown louder. The fishermen discovered a virtually impenetrable sea of red tape

Under the law, jurisdiction of the fisheries is under the U.S. Department of Commerce, advised by citizens councils—one representing each of eight designated regions stretching around the country and extending to the Pacific waters around Hawaii, American Samoa and Guam.

In most of the regions, U.S. fishermen have managed to exist with the new, sometimes incredibly complicated regulations. But in the North Pacific (Washington, Oregon and Alaska) and New England, there has been revolt, cheating and occasional violence.

The North Pacific situation involves not only stipulations on catches under the 200-mile law but an order, issued in 1974 by U.S. District Judge George H. Boldt, that certain Indian groups must be allowed to take 50 percent of Washington's allowable salmon harvest. That dispute—the white man vs. the Indians all over again—has yet to be resolved. At hearings on control of the fisheries there, metal detectors were set up to make sure none of the fishermen carried weapons.

In New England, with its waters so badly overfished for so long, fishermen now are confronted with government limitations on cod and haddock, the two biggest crops, and with constantly changing restrictions.

They claim that the bureaucracy is so hampering them that their livelihood and its charter of free enterprise are in jeopardy. They say that quotas, closures of fishing grounds and other smothering restrictions are not necessary because stocks of cod and haddock are at levels they haven't seen in 15 or 20 years, now that the foreign fishing ships have pulled out.

Listen to some of them:

Jay Lanzillo of Orleans, Mass., president of the Cape Cod Fishermen's Coalition: "We're being regulated to death. You might as well be a potato farmer."

Robert Rose of Gloucester, skipper of the 117-foot dragger Judith Lee Rose and a third-generation Portuguese-American fisherman: "We thought, with no more foreigners—great. But at least we didn't have the bureaucracy to contend with when the foreign ships were out there. We're the last of the hunters, and I just hate to see this country destroy the character of its fishermen."

Alan D. Guimond, executive secretary of the Alantic Offshore Fish and Lobster Association, the biggest fishermen's association on the East Coast: "It used to be such a bad scene out there. It was U.S. fishermen against the foreigners, and the foreigners made such a shambles out of it. The 200-mile limit was supposed to be the answer, but it isn't. It's the question. If Congress had to vote on it today, it wouldn't pass. Fishermen would oppose it."

FISH WASHED OVERBOARD

Dan Arnold, executive director of the Massachusetts Inshore Draggers Association, who left Tufts College 28 years ago because the freedom of a fisherman's life appealed to him: "There are lots of fish out there. You can't get away from them. The government's got to find a mechanism to harvest more of the fish, instead of having them washed overboard."

Washing them overboard? The fishermen say there is tremendous waste at sea. They may legally catch only certain amounts of cod, haddock and yellowtail flounder—species for which there is a ready market and the only ones for which there are quotas—after which they go after other species, such as sole, before returning to port.

But in catching sole, they also bring up cod, haddock and yellowtail flounder—deep-sea fish that die almost immediately when brought to the surface, due to pressure changes. These excess fish are washed overboard, dead. An estimated two to three times as many fish are washed overboard as are brought into port.

A great deal of the fishermen's bitterness centers on the difference between their version of how much stocks of fish are up or down and that of the ecological scientists. They say the 200-mile law is heavily weighted in favor of the scientists, whose findings they distrust.

"Why don't they come out in our boats and take a look," one fisherman says. "Instead they sit in offices and try to razzle-dazzle us with statistics."

According to the law, restrictions respecting the ecology of the sea must be based on the best scientific data possible. In the case of the Northwest Atlantic, the data are obtained from the Northeast Fisheries Center at Woods Hole, Mass. The center is part of the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration, the division of the U.S. Department of Commerce that oversees the fishermen. Some fishermen contend that—despite the advice of the eight regional citizens councils—the Commerce Department makes the ultimate decisions based on what its own cautious employees tell it.

Even within the Commerce Department there is acknowledgment that the commercial fishery regulating system has broken down since the start of the 200-mile law.

Terry Leitzell, a 36-year-old lawyer, was plucked from the State Department early this year to head a new post in the Commerce Department that makes him the czar of U.S. fisheries.

Leitzell candidly admits that the problems created by the law are extremely complex and in some cases nowhere near solution.

The North Pacific dilemma is almost unbelievable, he says, particularly regarding salmon. In addition to the disputed court ruling on Indian fishing rights, it involves federal and state jurisdictions, the spawning habits of the salmon in both American and Canadian rivers and their intermingling in the ocean (leading to recent disputes between the two countries, who each face Japanese competition for the fish on the high seas).

The other big trouble spot, the Northwest Atlantic, where the most damage is done by foreign fleets, has occupied much of Leitzell's time. He says he knows that the scientists in Commerce are not believed by the fishermen. He also says he is doing this summer what fishermen have been pleading for since the 200-mile law took effect—sending government biologists out on actual fishing boats to check stocks and "to spend more time on the docks" with the fishermen.

One big trouble with the Northwest Atlantic, says Leitzell, is that the fishing fleet there has always depended too much on cod and haddock. He says the fleet should diversify, catch other types of fish (there are some 200 species) for new markets, domestic and foreign.

Today, most of the fish consumed in the United States is imported. "We have an annual $2 million trade deficit in fish products," says Leitzell. For each dollar gained from exporting fish, we spend $6 buying fish abroad. In fact, all the fish used by the country's biggest fast-food chain is imported, mostly from Eastern European countries and South Korea.

Leitzell says he is developing ways to help U.S. fishermen move into "holes" in the foreign and domestic markets. He also wants to change government buying habits, in the military and other departments, by utilizing native fish. One very conspicuous possible market is the Department of Agriculture's subsidized ($600 million annually) school lunch program. "It has no fish in it at all," says Leitzell.

OVERREGULATION

Leitzell's optimism is not shared by all. Some question not only the present overregulation of fisheries but the entire structure of the regulating system.

Lucy Sloan, executive director of the National Federation of Fisherman, questions the original decision to put fishing under the Department of Commerce and its National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration.

"We're food producers," she says. "Putting us under Oceanic, a science-dominated agency where the fish is an object of scientific curiosity and fishermen unwanted perturbators, is like putting farmers under the Department of the Interior because wheat is grown on land. We're the only major fishing country in the world that has no ministry for agriculture and fisheries or one just for fisheries." She says she supports the President's reorganization plan to set up a department of agriculture and renewal resources.

Some think the present system will collapse of its own bureaucratic weight and because it is too costly to enforce.

"The 200-mile law talks of the greatest benefit to society," says Jacob P. Dykstra, head of the Point Judith (R.I.) Fishermen's Cooperative, "but I'm not sure anyone is benefiting. There's been too much hardship and heartache. The cure may be worse than the disease."

Dykstra has proposed to the New England Regional Fishery Management Council that no quotas be set on any species of fish but that price incentives be given on species that are normally not caught or are washed overboard. His cooperative, for example, is now marketing anglerfish overseas, where they are considered a delicacy. Dykstra thinks an incentive program on such fish would force open markets and might start to change the eating habits of Americans.

CONGRESS SLOW TO ACT

Edward J. MacLeod, a food-processing executive in Gloucester and chairman of the New England council, says Congress reacted five to 10 years too late in passing the 200-mile law. And now, well over a year after it went into effect, "an awful state of confusion" still exists.

The law is also expensive, says MacLeod. The budget for his regional council this year is $600,000. Nationally, it costs $25–$30 million to administer and enforce the law.

And the fishermen are more unhappy than ever.

In New Bedford recently, José DeSousa was preparing to take his boat and crew of three out for a week at sea. He had been reading the latest regulations and quietly cursing them.

DeSousa, 52, has been going to sea since he was 11, when he ran away from home in Portugal by sneaking aboard a Norwegian freighter.

"I remember when the Russians came," he said. "I've seen things all over the world, but I've never seen anything like that. I could count 300 ships where I was fishing, and even then I didn't stop counting. They were everywhere."

He looked down at the government paper. "But at least we were free. Now they've taken away our freedom. All I get is papers telling me where to fish, how much to fish. Now they are talking of starting times. How the hell do I know what my starting time will be? Sunday? Monday? Everything depends on the weather. It always has depended on the weather.

"When I get out there, I know I'll have to wash a lot of fish overboard. I hate to see fish with their bellies up in the water. They make conservation this way?" It was not a question.●

MOBILE HOME FINANCING

HON. LES AuCOIN

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 26, 1978

● Mr. AuCOIN. Mr. Speaker, federally chartered savings and loan associations are being prevented from competing with other financial institutions for certain mobile home loans because of outdated Federal regulations.

In 1968, Congress granted to federally chartered savings and loan associations the authority to invest in mobile home loans. Subsequently, the Federal Home Loan Bank Board developed rules governing these loans. Unfortunately, the Bank Board's regulations have not kept pace with the significant and positive changes in the construction and placement of mobile homes.

The Bank Board limits the maturity term of loans for new mobile homes to 12 years. If the mobile home is more than 900 square feet in size, the maturity term is 15 years. With single wide mobile homes now selling for an average of $20,000, it is easy to see why 12 or 15 years is not long enough. With such terms the payments on the loan easily exceed the financial capability of many potential purchasers.

The restrictions for used mobile homes are even more deplorable. The amortization period for a loan for a used mobile home is 12 years, less the age of the unit. Thus if the mobile home is 2 years old, the maximum maturity term is 10 years.

Today's mobile home is no longer mobile. It is constructed out of the same materials used in "onsite" construction and must comply with strict construction and safety standards developed and enforced by the Department of Housing and Urban Development. The HUD standards, the only national construction code, have been termed "comparable" and in certain respects "superior" to many of the local building codes for homes constructed on site.

Given this new era in mobile homes, it is incomprehensible why the Bank Board has not updated its regulations. Just last year, the Congress recognized the changes in mobile home manufacturing and placement and approved new higher loan limits and longer terms for FHA insured loans for mobile homes. Mobile homes consisting of two or more modules now can receive FHA insurance for loans with maturity terms up to 23 years.

I think it is important to do everything possible to make available decent, safe, and sanitary housing at reasonable cost to every American. Mobile homes account for nearly all of the single family detached new home sales in the under $30,000 price range. The industry is sheltering in excess of 10 million Americans.

The Bank Board is missing an important opportunity to help millions of Americans realize homeownership.●

FDA'S PROPOSED RESTRICTIONS ON ANTIBIOTICS

HON. CHARLES ROSE

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 26, 1978

● Mr. ROSE. Mr. Speaker, on Friday, July 14, 1978, the House Committee on Agriculture passed a committee resolution expressing discontent with the Food and Drug Administration's recent proposed regulations to restrict the subtherapeutic use of antibiotics in animal feeds and to require a veterinarian's order before using such compounds.

Since May of 1977 hearings by the Subcommittee on Dairy and Poultry on this issue, I have objected to FDA's continued progress on their proposed regulations. The evidence indicated the scientific community itself was in disagreement over the central issue: Whether the handling and use of antibiotics promotes antibiotic-resistant pathogens that transfer from animals to humans, and thereby increases human resistance to such compounds.

I have continued to monitor this issue and have become increasingly concerned that FDA's Commissioner Kennedy is determined to proceed toward a final rule regardless of the lack of consensus by the scientific community. Even he has acknowledged in his public remarks and background explanations that this issue is a theoretical one with only a "potential for harmful effect"; that his concern is "with the health hazard that "may arise;" and that his own Director of the Bureau of Veterinary Medicine found "the evidence submitted * * * has failed to resolve the issues conclusively * * * (43 Federal Register 14, Jan. 20, 1978, p. 3035).

Given 27 years of well-documented positive use of these compounds by food producers, I feel FDA cannot ignore known benefits, especially when inconclusive evidence of risk exists. To keep the public informed at this time, I would like to insert in the RECORD a copy of our committee resolution, cosponsored by 39 members of the House Committee on Agriculture. We request FDA Commissioner Kennedy to withhold further action on his proposed regulations until certain ongoing epidemiological and other studies are completed by the Office of Technology Assessment, the U.S. Department of Agriculture, and a recently funded National Academy of Sciences Study.

The Committee on Agriculture has spoken now on this issue with a firm voice and it is my wish that Commissioner Kennedy will listen responsibly. These are important compounds used for maintaining a healthy confinement environment, mass production, healthy food-producing animals and preventing disease. Latest USDA research reveals increasing attention on the uses of antibiotics to treat mastitis, shipping fever, salmonellosis, poultry respiratory diseases, swine dysentery and growth promotion in poultry.

Commissioner Kennedy has seen for himself the true nature of this issue when he traveled to the field to participate in three hearings during the spring of 1978. He saw the farm communities respond vigorously with objections to his present course of action. They have daily experiences with these compounds and they told him to his face his theoretical assumptions were wrong. I would hope our committee resolution would further impress upon him the sincerity of our action and our continued interest in seeing that a proper scientific basis exists for any final regulations.

The resolution follows:

RELATIVE TO THE USE OF ANTIBIOTICS IN ANIMAL FEEDS

Whereas, penicillin and tetracycline have been used in swine, cattle and poultry feeds for 27 years, since the early 1950's at low levels to assure an abundant, wholesome, and economical supply of meat and poultry products for American consumers;

Whereas, the House Committee on Agriculture has an interest in the production and marketing of agricultural commodities, welfare of Agriculture generally, and the animal industry and diseases of animals in particular, and likewise wishes to assure an abundant, wholesome, and economical supply of meat and poultry products for American consumers;

Whereas, recent regulatory action by the Food and Drug Administration proposes to restrict most uses of penicillin and tetracyclines in such feeds and also proposes to restrict the remaining uses of these drugs to a veterinarian's order;

Whereas, such proposed actions would not only endanger the continued success of mass producing such livestock and poultry for the benefit of the consumer, but would also place an impossible burden on the limited number of veterinarians who service the livestock and poultry industries;

Whereas, a large segment of the scientific community contends that the available scientific evidence does not warrant these proposed actions;

Whereas, the regulatory agency has stated that continued low-level use of penicillin and tetracycline products in animal feeds does not pose an imminent hazard to human health and that there is only a theoretical assumption of antibiotic-resistance pathogens crossing over from animals to humans;

Whereas, the proposed actions of such animal feed restrictions will cost agricultural producers over $700 million per year in increased production costs at a time when net farm income for 1978 is projected at $25–$26 billion;

Whereas, the proposed actions could also cost consumers in excess of $1 billion in higher meat and poultry prices with no apparent benefits to either producers or consumers;

Whereas, the Senate Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry and the House Committee on Agriculture, Subcommittee on Dairy and Poultry, have requested that the Office of Technology Assessment conduct a comprehensive assessment of the feed additives issues and an assessment of their impact on the dairy industry;

Whereas, the House of Representatives on June 27, 1978, voted to approve the Agriculture, Rural Development and Related Agencies Appropriation Bill for the fiscal year 1979 by a vote of 326 to 59, and included funding to provide $250,000 for a study on antibiotics in animal feed, and the Committee on Appropriations in its report on that bill urged the Food and Drug Administration to contract with the National Academy of Sciences to plan and monitor the research, and directed the agency to hold in abeyance implementation of their proposals pending the final results of such research and such evidentiary hearings as may result from the notices of opportunity for hearing that have been published by the Food and Drug Administration; and

Whereas, even though acknowledging the importance of the issue the regulatory agency has failed to provide formal evidentiary hearings and in three informal, "legislative-type" hearings held in the Spring of 1978 in Iowa, North Carolina and Texas, testimony was presented by 174 scientific, producer, doctor and veterinarian witnesses opposing these proposed actions and 15 witnesses favored them:

Therefore be it resolved, That because of its interest and concern with maintaining an abundant and safe food supply for American consumers, it is the sense of the Committee on Agriculture of the House of Representatives that these proposed restrictions on the use and distribution of penicillin and tetracycline products in animal feeds at low levels and the proposed veterinarian order should be withdrawn until:

1. Epidemiological studies are undertaken by the National Academy of Sciences under the direction of the Food and Drug Administration on the risk-benefit of antibiotics at low levels in animal feeds to humans; and

2. Additional scientific research necessary to determine the extent of any hazard involved is conducted in order that a rational risk-benefit decision can be made.

Be it further resolved, That it is the sense of the Committee on Agriculture of the House of Representatives that only when the additional scientific studies have been completed and credible cost-benefit assessments have been made—including the studies and assessments being conducted by the Secretary of Agriculture and the Office of Technology Assessment and the National Academy of Sciences—should the regulatory agency proceed with any proposed rulemaking concerning the continued low-level use of penicillin and tetracycline products in animal feeds.

And, be it further resolved, That the Chairman transmit copies of this resolution to the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare, and the Commissioner of the Food and Drug Administration, and the Secretary of Agriculture.●

BALANCE(S) OF POWER SERIES BOOK III A (IV) THEATER NUCLEAR BALANCE

HON. JOHN BRECKINRIDGE

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 26, 1978

● Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. Mr. Speaker, on Friday, July 21, I inserted into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the first part of an article entitled "Theater Nuclear Balance," by Justen Galen appearing in the January 1978 Armed Forces Journal International. The conclusion of the article follows:

COMPARATIVE VULNERABILITY

NATO inevitably suffers from the fact it is unable to strike first, and is unlikely to be able to preempt. This alone would make it far more strategically vulnerable than the Warsaw Pact. NATO also is tactically more vulnerable in many important ways:

All of NATO's nuclear strike, dispersal, and main operating air bases are highly vulnerable to Soviet ICBMs, MRBMs, and IRBMs. So are NATO's nuclear storage sites and the peacetime locations of its Pershing, Lance, and Honest John casernes. These nuclear bases and facilities are also co-located with NATO's conventional forces and critical elements of its command, control, and communications (C) system. The Warsaw Pact could probably decisively destroy NATO's military power in the Center Region in its peacetime locations with an MRBM and IRBM strike limited to NATO's main nuclear delivery and storage sites.

It seems probable that 15%–30% of NATO's men in uniform would be "bonus casualties" in such a strike and it is unlikely NATO could fight cohesively without them. Even if NATO forces were in their wartime locations, the Warsaw Pact could probably destroy most of NATO's air power and many of its weapons with a comparatively limited number of strikes.

In contrast to NATO, Warsaw Pact nuclear delivery systems are well dispersed even in peacetime. The Warsaw Pact IRBM and MRBM forces are also relatively invulnerable to NATO forces since they do not need to fear a surprise strike, are usually silo-deployed and could launch on warning against a NATO air or Polaris strike.

NATO theater nuclear forces still rely heavily on $C^3$ systems which unclassified BDM briefings indicate are vulnerable to Warsaw Pact direction-finding and targeting systems under alert or wartime conditions, but it seems likely that NATO's methods of operation and command and control create a far higher "profile" for Warsaw Pact target acquisition systems that Pact forces do for NATO.

The Warsaw Pact has a range advantage over NATO for virtually all categories of missile systems. Many Warsaw Pact delivery systems can be fired at ranges untargetable to their NATO counterparts.

The Soviet Union can effectively dominate Warsaw Pact war fighting. It can choose the moment of attack, the force concentration used, and the point of greatest vulnerability. This allows the USSR to control the initial ratio of forces used, and to achieve an optimal concentration and balance of vulnerability. The side with tactical initiative, at the battlefield level, can use it to sharply reduce its relative vulnerability.

NATO defense is organized into Corps Zones manned by individual nations. This has led to a severe imbalance of conventional capabilities between the "strong" Corps sectors held by the U.S. and Germans, and weak sectors held by the British, Belgians, and Dutch. These weak Corps sectors are all in the North and leave NATO and U.S. lines-of-communications exposed to a Soviet breakthrough.

This is often referred to as the "maldeployment problem" because NATO's forces are spread so unevenly along its border, and it is so difficult for a strong NATO Corps to rapidly reinforce or support a weak one. The "maldeployment" of conventional capabilities in these Corps sectors is minor, however, compared to their weakness in theater nuclear readiness, equipment, and force posture.

U.S. studies almost unanimously conclude that nuclear war does not provide a means of offsetting superior numbers of conventional forces. In fact, most studies which have addressed theater or Corps-wide conflicts indicate that superior conventional force numbers are even more important in nuclear war because of its more rapid development and higher attrition levels.

NATO is postured in a "forward defense" which commits most of its forward strength to positions near the border which are almost exclusively organized for defense. This "locks" each nation's forces into its Corps zone while concentrating many facilities and capabilities into attractive targets. NATO neither organizes or trains to extract forces from forward positions in the event of a Warsaw breakthrough although it has provided stronger reserve forces in recent years. This has several effects: It locks NATO into a "Maginot line" posture, it makes NATO highly vulnerable to a Soviet concentration of forces at one or two weak spots in its Corps Zones, and it provides attractive targets for a Warsaw Pact theater nuclear attack designed to produce a quick and decisive breakthrough.

NATO depends on fixed facilities for supply, $C^3$, and support. These facilities are concentrated into far fewer and far more attractive targets then Warsaw Pact forces.

NATO armies have essentially no CBR protection. They have few vehicles with CBR equipment, and most decontamination and protection units exist only on paper. CBR training is often nonexistent or ludicrous. In contrast, the Warsaw Pact is steadily improving its force-wide CBR protection and actively trains for CBR defense. The effectiveness of Warsaw Pact CBR protection is uncertain, but NATO's acute CBR vulnerability is unquestionable.

NATO must go to nuclear war publicly and deliberately. Any improvement in the readiness of its nuclear forces can be immediately transmitted by Warsaw Pact agents even if more sophisticated means of intelligence collection should fail.

Unfortunately, there is no question these weaknesses and vunerabilities are well understood by the Warsaw Pact. NATO is more than a "fish bowl"; it is a "sieve." Soviet writings focus on precisely the kind of tactical opportunities that NATO affords, and any casual reader of the press is well aware of just how many "secrets" pass through NATO's doors.

ABILITY TO USE "CONVENTIONAL" FORCES IN A THEATER NUCLEAR WAR

The same NATO emphasis on conventional forces and deterrence that shapes so much of NATO planning is also apparent in NATO's organization and training of its "conventional forces" for theater nuclear war.

As noted earlier, most NATO conventional forces have essentially no CBR protection or defense, regardless of the existence of paper units. The Warsaw Pact has created large scale CBR defense units, its army equipment is acquiring steadily better CBR shelters and $C^3$ facilities have extensive CBR protection while NATO's air units have essentially none. It should be noted, however, that while individual equipment or facilities may have good operating capability in a CBR environment, it is questionable how good either side's CBR capability would be in large scale force-on-force operations.

NATO conducts essentially no meaningful large maneuver training for high thresholds of theater nuclear war. The Warsaw Pact consistently emphasizes such training.

Any kind of NATO land force theater nuclear exercise training is unusual. Soviet writings indicate that Warsaw Pact nuclear exercise training is the rule.

It is uncertain that even half of NATO's men in uniform in the Center Region have had any meaningful training for nuclear operations, or will receive any during their period of active service. Virtually all Warsaw Pact men in uniform receive significant nuclear operations training.

The training of NATO officers for theater nuclear operations ranges from negligible to farcical. While a few dedicated officers in each nation, in SHAPE, and in the International Military Staff have done an outstanding job of preparing NATO to conduct tactical nuclear deterrence and selective strike options, the vast majority of NATO officers are unprepared for theater nuclear war. Soviet and Warsaw Pact officer training for nuclear operations in intensive and technically excellent, although experts differ over its military realism.

NATO capability to conduct theater nuclear operations differs radically by nation and Corps. There is no standardization of operations and doctrine. The Warsaw Pact is dominated by Soviet forces, and has a high degree of consistency.

No nation has ever fought a theater nuclear war. There is no way to know how well the Warsaw Pact could employ its conventional forces in a theater nuclear war. The Warsaw Pact does, however, organize to fight such wars; it makes a serious and large scale effort. NATO does not.

COMMAND AND CONTROL

There is a vast amount of literature published on NATO's planned and potential $C^3$ capability to fight a conventional war. Almost without exception, this literature makes no mention of NATO's $C^3$ capability to fight a theater nuclear war. There seems to be good reason for this:

Most NATO advances in conventional $C^3$ have the effect of further centralizing NATO $C^3$ facilities into fewer potentially lucrative targets for Warsaw Pact theater nuclear weapons. In contrast, the Warsaw Pact is steadily proliferating redundant but simpler $C^3$ systems, and reducing their vulnerability.

NATO's "advantages" in the computerization and integration of $C^3$ systems generally increase vulnerability to electro-magnetic pulses and nuclear blackout. The Soviet systems used by the Warsaw Pact have much less operational vulnerability to nuclear weapons.

NATO puts vast $C^3$ resources into precise information and targeting that have far less value in a theater nuclear environment. The Warsaw Pact seems to put resources into redundancy and central control that can operate in both conventional and nuclear environments.

NATO seems to have put little real effort into creating a system to precisely measure the size and nature of Warsaw Pact nuclear strikes or into managing a large scale or intense nuclear war. It can provide warning, and conduct strikes, but NATO does not seem to have a system that can absorb the damage inherent in a nuclear war, and develop an integrated war fighting response that integrates land and air forces, and cuts across Corps zones or boundaries. The Warsaw Pact system is technically limited in many ways, but does seem organized for nuclear war.

Each side's relative $C^3$ capability, however, is uncertain. Experts differ over the value of the Warsaw Pact $C^3$ system in a nuclear environment, and the improvements taking place in NATO's conventional $C^3$ systems may have more value in nuclear war than has yet been made publicly apparent.

COMPARATIVE IMPACT OF THEATER NUCLEAR EMPLOYABLE STRATEGIC SYSTEMS ON THE THEATER NUCLEAR BALANCE

Both the U.S. and USSR can potentially employ hundreds or thousands of strategic nuclear weapons against theater targets. Each can also counter the other's theater nuclear war fighting successes by striking the opponent's "countervalue" economic or civil population targets, or by striking selectively at targets in the USSR and U.S.

This is a massive increment to deterrence, and it is one area where a strategy of "limited nuclear options" may have had great deterrence value, even if it does not provide theater nuclear war fighting capability. The Soviet Union can never be sure of decoupling theater and strategic war because of the risks inherent in an allout strike. It can never be sure the U.S. will not ultimately trade the loss of a division for a selected number of steel mills, or an Eastern European economic center.

This is also the one area where the U.S. and NATO may have a significant temporary advantage. The U.S. still has more strategic warheads, and more accurate warheads. It can potentially use more of its strategic warheads selectively, and with less risk of somehow triggering off a strategic conflict.

This, however, is a high risk strategy and is a U.S. advantage that will probably vanish by the early 1980s Once the USSR has more warheads available for theater purposes from both its ICBM and SS-20 forces, and completes its probably ongoing improvements in accuracy and retargeting capability, it will be able to outmatch NATO even in this area of force capability.

Such shifts in the strategic balance will probably not weaken pre-conflict deterrence, but they will make any attempt to use U.S. strategic weapons in LNO war fighting simply another variant on the nuclear game of "chicken." The use of strategic forces will become a test of will, nerve, and the ability to accept damage. The will of the U.S. and its Allies to play such a game must not be underestimated, but its results would be a disastrous addition to the consequences of theater war if the USSR proved as resolute as the West.

DETERRENCE VS. DEFENSE: SOME CONCLUSIONS

Only a very few national security experts would argue that NATO and the U.S. are not maintaining a high degree of theater nuclear deterrence. The Soviet Union faces catastrophic losses in launching even the most successful nuclear attack, and its Eastern European allies face even greater risks.

NATO's problems do not leave NATO weak or exposed, and the reforms in NATO strategy introduced by former Secretary of Defense Schlesinger have extended the level of deterrence and the risks inherent in a Soviet attack.

It is also far from clear, given NATO's many weaknesses relative to the Warsaw Pact, that it is credible or purposeful to advocate that NATO create a more meaningful theater nuclear war fighting capability. Deterrence may well be all the Western democracies will ever pay for, and it may be an acceptable calculated risk.

If war comes, however, there can be little real doubt of Warsaw Pact superiority. To paraphrase a political axiom, "You can't beat something with nothing." Warsaw Pact planning and organization for theater nuclear war fighting may have many defects, but it also has an overwhelming strength: It is serious, not a charade.

NATO might, therefore, benefit from improving its deterrent capabilities, and reducing its vulnerability to a first strike even if it will never pay for serious war fighting capability. There are several ways this can be accomplished:

Deploy the new Patriot air defense system in a multiple role—as a surface-to-air missile, anti-tactical ballistic missile, and nuclear surface-to-surface missile.

This could be a potentially low cost increment to a NATO replacement of Hawk with Patriot and would present the USSR with complex targeting problems. Patriot would have some self-defense capability, high mobility, and secure and integrated C links. It could be located away from other conventional forces and facilities. It could have both land and air target acquisition capability.

And, its nuclear warheads could be safely dispersed using advanced technology PAL links, or nuclear missiles could be deployed from CONUS in a crisis or from some other sanctuary. Such a change in NATO nuclear capability would vastly raise the risks and costs inherent in even the best planned Soviet attack.

Deploy, as many of our European allies desire, large numbers of cruise missile launchers with similar advanced technology U.S. warhead controls or PAL links. These cruise missiles could also be deployed away from existing NATO military facilities, and in a highly mobile mode. They might potentially be deployed with Patriot or another advanced SAM missile. They could also be deployed with less than 400 NM ranges to meet SALT II constraints.

In fact, there are some interesting variants NATO might pursue. The non-U.S. nations in the Center Region might buy 1,500-plus-mile systems since they are not bound by SALT II. This might be tied to a direct quid pro quo. The number of NATO long-range cruise missiles might be limited to the number of Soviet SS–20 launchers, missiles, or warheads. This would sharply reduce the Soviet incentive to expand its SS–20 forces.

Re-deploy NATO missile units and nuclear storage sites to minimize co-location with other military facilities. Deliberately increase the number of targets while lowering the value of any one target. Here, however, "tamper proof" weapons would be essential. Increased vulnerability to terrorism would not be a worthwhile trade-off.

Abolish the NATO strike aircraft concept. Rely on forward dispersed missile forces in an initial phase of nuclear conflict, and fly in nuclear bombs from CONUS, as required. This would eliminate the attractiveness of NATO air bases as preemptive or first strike nuclear targets, but retain the flexibility provided by strike aircraft once war began. Hardened storage sites located remotely would provide a similar decoupling of NATO air from the quick reaction nuclear mission.

Provide improved survivable $C^3$ to use such systems effectively with restraint and to guarantee NATO's political leaders that any such improvements would not weaken their control on NATO's nuclear trigger.

Engage the Warsaw Pact in L.N.O.-oriented arms control or collateral constraint talks. Seek to convince the USSR that NATO is now serious about graduated response. Do everything possible to ensure both Soviet political and military planners understand what NATO's strategy is, and that there is a potential alternative to theater wide war.

These options would scarcely reduce the consequences of a war if one should occur. They would, however, sharply raise the potential cost of any war to the Warsaw Pact and Soviet Union. They would also modernize and revitalize NATO's theater nuclear deterrent far more effectively than enhanced radiation weapons, and be a symbol of strength rather than a symbol of strategic uncertainty. If NATO is not going to buy defense or war fighting capability, it should at least get the best possible deterrent it can afford.●

HON. CHARLES ROSE

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 26, 1978

● Mr. ROSE. Mr. Speaker, as we in Congress prepare to consider the Carter administration's attempt to end the arms embargo imposed on Turkey after its August 1974, invasion and occupation of Cyprus, I believe it most important to bear in mind the likely consequences of such a decision.

In several years during which this issue has been before Congress I have nowhere seen a more eloquent statement of the dangers involved in lifting the embargo than that offered by Messrs. Cyrus Vance and George Ball when they testified as private citizens before the House International Relations Committee on July 10, 1975.

They said at that time: that this so-called compromise (a partial lifting of the embargo) would create a wide spread impression that no nation that has acquired arms from the United States need any longer pay attention to the conditions on which those arms were made available but would feel free to use them in pursuit of its own interests, in local conflicts.

The analysis of Messrs. Vance and Ball, offered with respect to merely a partial lifting of the arms embargo, is even more compelling when the matter at issue, is, at here, the proposed total lifting of the embargo.

We have supported President Carter's stated intention to control the spread and misuse of U.S. arms abroad; the President's efforts to end the embargo, before Turkey has taken the necessary substantive actions to remedy its aggression on Cyprus, runs directly contrary to his stated policy and risks precisely the consequences suggested by Messrs. Vance and Ball.

I insert at this point in the RECORD, and commend to the attention of the colleagues, the relevant excerpts of that testimony:

STATEMENTS BY CYRUS VANCE—CYPRUS AND THE TURKISH ARMS EMBARGO

July 10, 1975, from statement before the House International Relations Committee (made jointly with George Ball).

That Turkey used the arms we provided in violation of the relevant American laws and of the express language of the bilateral agreement that governed their transfer is not in dispute. That issue has been settled by an opinion of the Comptroller General in unequivocal language.

The question now is: Should the Congress wipe out the penalties of violation, which, in express terms, would render Turkey ineligible for further American weapons until the Turkish government takes steps to purge itself by some serious move to settle its dispute with Greece and to remove its troops from Cyprus? To do so might dangerously undercut the conditions we have imposed on the use of all the arms we have provided up to this point under our various military aid and military sales programs.

. . . There is, it seems to us, grave danger that, in the highly political atmosphere that now prevails in Ankara, the Turkish Government would regard this measure (a partial lifting of the embargo) as a vindication of its past actions and as removing any pressure to make significant concessions toward a Cyprus settlement . . .

Finally, and in many ways this is the most important point, we are seriously concerned that this so-called compromise would create a widespread impression that no nation that has acquired arms from the United States need any longer pay attention to the conditions on which those arms were made available but would be free to use them in pursuit of its own interests in local conflicts.●

FLUORIDATION

HON. TIM LEE CARTER

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 26, 1978

● Mr. CARTER. Mr. Speaker, the use of fluoride in various forms is a well established and very effective means of preventing dental disease. The cost/benefit ratio for fluoride treatments is excellent.

Unfortunately there has been controversy surrounding fluoride. Consumer Reports has published a two-part article considering the issues raised by the anti-fluoridationists. In order to give wide dissemination to this information I insert this article in the RECORD.

FLUORIDATION—THE CANCER SCARE

On the evening of February 10, 1976, millions of Dutch television viewers were watching their sets with more than customary attention. News of a bribery scandal in the United States had just reached Europe, along with rumors that Prince Bernard of Holland was implicated. Those who tuned in were unaware, however, that an unrelated interview later in the newscast would soon affect many of them more directly than the scandal.

The interview involved Dean Burk, Ph.D., an American biochemist formerly with the National Cancer Institute, the Federal agency that conducts or sponsors much of the cancer research in the U.S. Dr. Burk's message was a troubling one. Adding fluoride to drinking water as a dental health measure, he asserted, was causing thousands of cancer deaths annually in the U.S. He claimed that statistical studies done by himself and another biochemist, John Yiamouyiannis, Ph.D., showed a link between fluoridation and cancer. Dr. Burk expressed no reservations about his conclusion. "Fluoridation," he told the audience, "is a form of public mass murder."

Copies of the Burk-Yiamouyiannis report had been circulated to members of the Dutch Parliament before the TV appearance. Soon after, a proposal by the Minister of Health to fluoridate all drinking-water supplies in Holland died in Parliament. By September 1976, a Royal Decree ended fluoridation in Rotterdam and other Dutch cities that had been treating their water for years.

A GROWING SENSE OF ALARM

What happened in Holland is not an isolated incident. Despite widespread endorsement of fluoridation by medical, dental, and public health officials, the practice has come under increasing attack both in the United States and abroad as a potential cause of cancer and other diseases. Three years ago, after a publicity campaign linking fluoride to cancer, Los Angeles voters defeated an ordinance to fluoridate the city's water supply. Since 1973, voters in hundreds of smaller U.S. cities and towns have taken similar action, often out of fear of cancer or other disorders attributed to fluoridation.

How valid are those fears? Is there a genuine scientific controversy surrounding the safety of fluoridation? According to Representative James J. Delaney (D., N.Y.), chairman of the powerful House Rules Committee, the answer is an emphatic "yes." A long-time opponent of fluoridation, Delaney has urged Congress to halt the practice, pending further investigation of its safety. Last fall, a subcommittee of the House's Committee on Government Operations held hearings on the issue. Drs. Burk and Yiamouyiannis testified, as did representatives of the American Dental Association, the National Cancer Institute, and authorities on fluoride research. An extensive array of scientific studies and expert commentaries on fluoridation was also presented.

What emerged from the testimony, in CU's opinion, was an unmistakable sense that millions of Americans are being grossly misled about an issue important to both their health and the cost of their dental bills. Water fluoridation is the only public-health measure that many Americans vote on directly. Yet last fall's hearings received only scant coverage by the press, except in publications that commonly run antifluoridation stories. Accordingly, in this two-part report we will tell you the facts about fluoridation—what it is, how it developed, and what it does. This month we will also examine the claims about fluoridation and cancer and consider the people behind those claims. Next month we'll take a look at other charges frequently leveled at fluoridation, including claims about allergies, birth defects, and heart disease.

ON THE TRAIL OF COLORADO STAIN

Fluorides are compounds containing the element fluorine. In its various forms, fluoride is found in practically all soils, plants, and animals, as well as in human blood, bones, and teeth. It's also present in at least trace amounts in all natural water supplies. The concentration in water varies widely, however. In the U.S., natural fluoride levels range from a high of about 8 parts per million (ppm) in areas of the Southwest to as little as 0.05 ppm in the Northeast.

Fluoridation is simply an adjustment of the natural fluoride content to about 1 ppm—a level of intake that strengthens tooth enamel and sharply reduces dental decay, especially among those exposed to fluoridated water from early childhood. The nominal 1-ppm level (actually 0.7 to 1.2 ppm, according to local conditions) isn't an arbitrary one. Its selection involved a scientific detective story complete with a twist ending.

The initial clue was uncovered early in the century by two scientists investigating a cosmetic defect. F. S. McKay and G. V. Black were trying to find out what caused a mottling of the tooth enamel, a discoloration variously known as "Colorado brown stain" and "Texas teeth." By 1916 they had narrowed the search to something in domestic water supplies. The next step was to identify the substance and get it out of the water. It took until 1931, however, before the substance was identifiable as fluoride.

Meanwhile, McKay had noticed something else. A practicing dentist, he observed that patients with mottled teeth also had remarkable resistance to tooth decay. The concern of public health officials at the time was still how to get fluoride out of the water. But McKay's observation also spurred further research by the Public Health Service to learn more about fluoride's effect on teeth.

Over the next ten years, research teams led by Dr. H. T. Dean of the Public Service studied the dental status of 7257 children in 21 cities having various levels of natural fluoride in their water. The results were unequivocal. The more fluoride in the water, the fewer dental cavities the children experienced. When the water contained approximately 1 ppm or more of fluoride, the children developed about 60 percent fewer cavities than did those who drank water with negligible fluoride content. Furthermore, at the 1-ppm level, the unattractive mottling did not occur. It was associated with levels above 2 ppm. Thus, 1 ppm of fluoride became the benchmark level.

Tooth decay was no minor health problem. During the war year of 1942 some 2,000,000 men were examined as potential members of the armed forces. Almost 10 percent of them were rejected because they didn't have 12 sound teeth in proper position out of a possible 32.

Although the potential dental advantages of fluoridation were obvious, there was a natural reluctance to add a chemical to community water supplies. In the early 1940's, there was no background of scientific data about possible side effects. There were some practical reassurances, though. People had been ingesting fluoride in food and water since the dawn of the human race. Many Southwesterners had been drinking water containing several times the 1-ppm level of fluoride for a lifetime without any discernible side effects except mottled teeth. Eventually, a few cities decided to take the chance.

THE NEWBURGH-KINGSTON EXPERIMENT

Among the pioneers was the New York State Department of Health. Before attempting any widespread introduction of fluoridation, the department proposed a long-term, controlled study of a limited group of children who would be carefully monitored by physicians. After considering various communities, the department chose the cities of Newburgh and Kingston as ideal candidates for the study.

Located some 35 miles apart near the Hudson River, both cities had populations of about 30,000 and were similar in racial, economic, and other demographic characteristics. Each also used reservoirs with water deficient in fluoride.

One city's water supply was to be fluoridated, the other not. Meanwhile, matched groups of children from the two cities were to be followed from infancy onward by means of comprehensive pediatric checkups to detect any side effects from fluoride. Special attention was to be given to growth rates, bone development, blood chemistry, the skin, the thyroid gland, vision, and hearing. Each child would also receive meticulous, regular dental exams.

In March 1944, the City Council of Newburgh agreed to participate in the study and approved the fluoridation of its water to 1 ppm. Kingston agreed to serve as the control city and use its fluoride-deficient water without change. A total of 817 children were enrolled in the Newburgh group and 711 in Kingston. Although most entered at the start of the study, several infants were added during each of the first three years to ensure having some children whose mothers were exposed to flouridated water throughout pregnancy.

The study went on for 10 years, and a majority of the children in both groups participated through the final examination. The findings can be summarized briefly: The examinations disclosed no differences of medical significance between the two groups that could even remotely be attributed to fluoride. There was one difference of dental significance, however. The Newburgh children experienced nearly 60 percent fewer cavities than the Kingston children.

Numerous studies have since confirmed the benefits of fluoridation. "Fewer cavities" means fewer costly fillings, fewer lost teeth, and, eventually, fewer dentures or partial dentures. The cost of fluoridation to a community, according to a report last year in the New England Journal of Medicine, is only about 10 to 40 cents a year per capita.

THE EVIDENCE FOR SAFETY

Since the early days of the Newburgh-Kingston project, literally thousands of scientific studies have examined the effectiveness and safety of fluoride. Virtually every doubt or question that has been raised, however scanty the evidence, has been studied in depth by one or more groups of researchers. As a dentist representing the American Dental Association noted in the House subcommittee hearings last fall, "Fluoridation may well be the most thoroughly studied community health measure of recent history."

In the late 1960's the World Health Organization accomplished the Herculean task of pulling much of the known information together. The objectives was to provide an impartial review of the scientific literature on fluoridation—a vast international aggregation of population studies, experimental research, animal studies, and clinical investigations, including human autopsy studies, clinical trials, and X-ray research.

The report, "Fluorides and Human Health," came out in 1970. It addressed numerous questions raised up to that time about the possible effects of fluoride on different organs and its alleged association to various diseases. Again, the conclusions can be summarized briefly: The study found no reliable evidence that any ill effects or symptoms resulted from drinking water fluoridated at recommended levels.

Since the report's publication, the World Health Organization has uncovered no evidence to alter its judgment. In a statement issued in 1975, the organization noted: "The only sign of physiological or pathological change in life-long users of optimally fluoridated water supplies . . . is that they suffer less from tooth decay."

THE LOYAL OPPOSITION

No amount of study, however, has managed to quiet the criticism of fluoride that has been present from the beginning. Writing in the Journal of the American Dental Association in March 1956, the commissioner of New York State's Department of Health, Dr. Herman E. Hilleboe, told of some of the troubles his agency had encountered in the early days of the Newburgh-Kingston project. Soon after the project's approval in March 1944, the local health officer in Newburgh began receiving complaints from some of the town's citizens.

Some protested that the fluoridated water was discoloring saucepans. Others complained that it was giving them digestive troubles. One woman complained to her dentist that the "fluoride water" had caused her denture to crack. "These incidents all occurred before fluoride was added to the water supply," notes Dr. Hilleboe. The complaints stopped abruptly after a Newburgh newspaper criticized the town's imaginary ills.

Despite fluoridation's success in Newburgh, protests against it elsewhere weren't collapsing so readily a decade later. The rise of "a vociferous minority," said Dr. Hilleboe, had succeeded in delaying, or even reversing, the start-up of flouridation in several areas. The opposition, he reported, came chiefly from food faddists, cultists, chiropractors, and people who misunderstood what fluoridation was. But the efforts of antifluoridationists have also been aided by the caution of various physicians, dentists, and scientists of good standing who initially questioned the safety of flouridation. Opposition has also come from other professionals and lay people who view fluoridation as a government infringement of individual freedom.

Various groups have been formed for the sole purpose of fighting fluoridation, but none has had much impact outside of its local community. Generally, the real steam behind the antifluoridation movement has come from well-funded, national, multi-issue organizations that have been able to disseminate large amounts of scare propaganda around the country. One such group is the John Birch Society. Another, up until the early 1970's, was the Rodale Press, publisher of Prevention magazine and a frequent proponent of unproved nutrition concepts. The most active and effective group today, however, is the National Health Federation, whose roots run deep into the soil of medical quackery. Those roots are worth a brief examination.

WHEN ROOSTERS HAD BAD TEETH

In the early 1950's, an organization called the Electronic Medical Foundation ran a lucrative diagnosis-by-mail service and also sold electronic treatment devices for "curing" numerous disorders. An estimated 3000 practitioners, mainly chiropractors, would send dried blood specimens from their patients to the foundation. There, the blood spot would be checked by an electronic gadget and a "diagnosis" mailed back by postcard.

This eventually aroused a certain skepticism at the U.S. Food and Drug Administration. Accordingly, the FDA arranged to send a few blood spots of its own.

The first, from a man who had lost his right leg, elicited a diagnosis of arthritis in the right foot and ankle. The blood of a dead man brought back a diagnosis of colitis, and that of a rooster resulted in a report of sinus infection and bad teeth.

The FDA inspectors also investigated the treatment devices. They found that the gadgets simply contained circuits resembling those of an electric doorbell or a small radio transmitter. None could cure anything, reports FDA historian Wallace Janssen.

In 1954 a U.S. District Court ordered the president of the firm, Fred J. Hart, to stop distributing the treatment devices. Shortly thereafter, Hart founded the National Health Federation. Hart continued to distribute the devices, however, and was subsequently prosecuted for criminal contempt and fined $500 in 1962. Between 1957 and 1963, several other officials of the NHF were convicted of misbranding dietary products with false medical claims and received fines or prison sentences. In 1963, the FDA released a report on the NHF that said in part:

"The stated purpose of the federation is to promote 'freedom of choice' in health matters. The record shows that what this frequently means is freedom to promote medical nostrums and devices which violate the law. From its inception, the federation has been a front for promoters of unproved remedies. eccentric theories and quackery."

In an updated report on the NHF issued in 1973, the FDA reiterated virtually the same judgment. Throughout its history, the NHF has crusaded against any Government interference with unproven remedies or treatments. At the same time, it has also opposed proven public-health measures—smallpox vaccination, pasteurization of milk, polio vaccination, and fluoridation of drinking-water supplies.

For the most part, the NHF's opposition to public-health measures has been a losing cause. Until recent years, even fluoridation was slowly gaining acceptance in more communities. About 105 million Americans now have fluoridated water. But in 1974 the NHF decided to mount a new national campaign to "break the back" of fluoridation efforts. It hired Dr. Yiamouyiannis to do the job.

RAISING THE SPECTER OF CANCER

The first big target was Los Angeles, whose City Council had voted in September 1974 to fluoridate the water supply. The NHF's ammunition was a study by Dr. Yiamouyiannis that purported to link fluoridation to an increase in cancer deaths. The study and a couple of publicity handouts that accompanied it were eventually reviewed by various public-health officials, including Thomas Mack, M.D., of Los Angeles, an associate professor of community medicine and an expert in cancer epidemiology. (Epidemiology is a branch of medicine that studies the incidence, causes, and control of a disease in specific populations.) The nature of the Yiamouyiannis study is apparent in an excerpt from Dr. Mack's review:

"I cannot begin without commenting on the form of the documents you sent me," Dr. Mack stated. "Despite the gravity of the question addressed, the form of these sheets is that of a propaganda flyer rather than a serious scientific effort. Specifically, there is no indication that any of the material was ever prepared for submission to a reputable scientific journal. . . . All over the documents one finds . . . conclusions emblazoned essentially in the form of slogans, without cautious interpretation or restrictions. For these reasons, the reader must immediately presume that objectivity has never been considered. . . . At the same time this bias is so pervasive and obvious, the mistaken logic so gross and naive, that the reader assumes the author to be, however competent in his Ph.D. field, totally unaware of the principles of epidemiology."

Most people are unfamiliar with the principles of epidemiology, however, and a Ph.D. degree can sometimes lend credibility even to claptrap. In Los Angeles it evidently did. The scare tactics of the NHF and other antifluoridationists scored a stunning victory over dental health.

Around the beginning of 1975, Dr. Yiamouyiannis also joined forces with Dr. Burk. Like the National Health Federation, Dr. Burk is a leading advocate of the worthless cancer drug Laetrile (consumer reports, August 1977), and he shares the NHF's aversion to fluoridation.

The collaboration produced a study claiming that 25,000 or more excess cancer deaths occur annually in U.S. cities that fluoridate their water. The assertion was based on a comparison of death rates for specific cancers in some counties that were fluoridated compared with some that were not. In July 1975, Representative Delaney entered the study into the Congressional Record and called for "an immediate suspension of all artificial fluoridation."

The National Cancer Institute reviewed the study and was unimpressed. Unlike a proper epidemiological study, it had failed to take into account widely recognized risk factors known to affect the death rate from specific types of cancers. Using the same data, the NCI reanalyzed the study, taking into account such influences as ethnic composition of the population, geographic location, socioeconomic status, and other fundamental risk factors. The purported differences in the cancer death rates promptly disappeared.

Undaunted, Drs. Burk and Yiamouyiannis bounced back with another study. This time they compared overall cancer death rates for 10 large cities that were fluoridated versus 10 large cities that were not. Again, the fluoridated cities came out second best. Over the 20-year period studied, cancer death rates in the fluoridated cities purportedly increased 10 percent more than in the unfluoridated ones. In December 1975, Representative Delaney entered the study into the Congressional Record and demanded that all fluoridation be stopped.

If anything, the new study was even more amateurish than the July entry. In the judgment of one NCI official at the House subcommittee hearings, it represented "the worst piece of work that has been done to date on fluoride." Drs. Burk and Yiamouyiannis had somehow managed to ignore the most fundamental factors involved in cancer mortality rates—age, sex, and race. Old people die from cancer more often than young people; men have a higher cancer death rate than women; and blacks a higher one than whites. Unless those factors are taken into consideration, the results of a cancer-mortality comparison would be meaningless.

When NCI scientists reanalyzed the Burk-Yiamouyiannis data, they found that the difference in the cancer death rate was due entirely to the age and racial makeup of the respective populations. Fluoridation was irrelevant.

ONWARD TO EUROPE

Rebuffed by NCI scientists, Dr. Burk took the National Health Federal studies to Holland and England. As noted earlier, the Dutch trip was a smashing success. But the British refused to panic. Both the Royal College of Physicians and Oxford University had recently completed studies of fluoridation and cancer. The Royal College of Physicians in January 1976 concluded: "There is no evidence that fluoride increases the incidence or mortality of cancer in any organ." The Oxford study reached a similar conclusion.

Moreover, British scientists had learned of the NCI's refutation of the Burk-Yiamouyiannis studies. They also were aware that an independent study conducted for the National Academy of Sciences at the University of Rochester, N.Y., had confirmed the NCI's findings.

"In the normal course of events," reported an Oxford research group, "that would have been the end of the matter. Unfortunately, however, it has not been." What the British scientists hadn't realized was that the facts were incidental.

The real goal of antifluoridation groups, explains an American Dental Association official, "is to create the illusion of a scientific controversy." The "studies" are merely the ploy. The accuracy of that judgment was evidenced by what happened next. According to an account in The Lancet, a British medical journal, Drs. Burk and Yiamouyiannis began publicizing their cancer claims in Britain. Through the assistance of the National Anti-Fluoridation Campaign, their misleading data were circulated to members of Parliament, health authorities, and water boards as evidence that fluoridation was causing many cancer deaths.

Meanwhile, the National Health Federation began claiming in the U.S. that NCI officials were concealing data, a charge that eventually had an impact in Britain. In Parliament, one member accused British health officials of misleading the public about fluoridation and of denying people the truth "because of the Official Secrets Act."

THE NCI "COVER-UP"

According to testimony at the House subcommittee hearings, the NCI refused to disclose certain information to the National Health Federation. That refusal, however, was far less sinister than some members of the British Parliament were later led to believe.

The NCI initially gave Dr. Burk a copy of the publication "U.S. Cancer Mortality by County: 1950–1969," which he later used in preparing the first Burk-Yiamouyiannis report. After the NCI reviewed that report, Dr. Yiamouyiannis asked for a copy of the NCI's analyses. Those were also dispatched. Then, according to NCI testimony, Dr. Yiamouyiannis used that information to attack the NCI's review.

Consequently, when he requested their analyses of his subsequent study, NCI officials denied the request. They pointed out that the basic sources were routine publications of the Bureau of the Census and the National Center for Health Statistics, and they told him, in effect, to do the calculations himself. "The data," said NCI's Dr. Robert N. Hoover at the hearings, "are generally available to anyone with a public library card."

To check that claim, a CU staff member visited the local public library. All but two of the volumes needed, both from 1950, were on the shelves of a suburban library within walking distance of our offices. A phone call by one if the librarians located the two remaining volumes at another nearby branch.

As a result of the charges and the wide publicity the National Health Federation gained in Britain, Drs. Richard Doll and Leo Kinlen of the Department of Regius Professor of Medicine at Oxford decided to undertake still another study. Their reason, they explained, was "to be sure about the truth of the matter, and because we feared that Burk and Yiamouyiannis's abuse of statistics might be detrimental to the future health of British children." At the same time, the Royal College of Physicians requested a formal opinion of the cancer data from the Council of the Royal Statistical Society in Britain.

The resulting studies appeared respectively in The Lancet and in the Journal of Applied Statistics in 1977. In The Lancet, Drs. Doll and Kinlen reported that none of the evidence "provides any reason to suppose that fluoridation is associated with an increase in cancer mortality, let alone causes it." The study conducted for the Royal Statistical Society, which undertook an even more comprehensive statistical analysis than the NCI or Oxford, came to the same conclusion.

Furthermore, additional studies by the NCI in 1976, the U.S. Center for Disease Control in 1977, and the National Heart, Lung and Blood Institute in 1977 each found no evidence linking fluoridation and cancer. In short, independent investigations by seven of the leading medical and scientific organizations in the English-speaking world have unanimously refuted the National Health Federation's cancer claims.

Meanwhile, other allegations against fluoride are in wide circulation. Fluoride is said to cause allergic reactions, birth defects, mutations, heart disease, and cancer in animals. We'll examine those allegations next month, in the second part of this report.●

SCIENTIFIC EXCHANGE WITH THE SOVIET UNION AND HUMAN RIGHTS: SOME CONSIDERATIONS

HON. NEWTON I. STEERS, JR.

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 26, 1978

● Mr. STEERS. Mr. Speaker, the recent trials of members of the Helsinki monitoring group in the Soviet Union have led many people to question the current status of the entire spectrum of United States-Soviet cooperative ventures. The question of scientific cooperation already has received one day of consideration during a briefing sponsored by my distinguished colleagues, Mr. HARKIN and Mr. HOLLENBECK, and will receive further hearings in the Subcommittee on Domestic and International Scientific Planning Analysis and Cooperation Subcommittee chaired by Mr. SCHEUER.

I am glad to see that this question will be getting the attention it deserves in this Congress, and I would like to present the testimony of Dr. Robert Adelstein, representing the Committee for Concerned Scientists, before Mssrs. HARKIN and HOLLENBECK's briefing on July 18.

Dr. Adelstein points out that the Soviet Union has "chosen to limit artificially" the interchange between Soviet and American scientists by controlling tightly the nature of Soviet participation, and he suggests that, "scientific exchange programs should act as a battering ram to break down the wall of isolation which the Soviet Government seeks to build around refusenik and dissident scientists."

In general, I favor the approach outlined by Dr. Adelstein, although I think that in some specific cases of scientific cooperation in which the Soviets stand to gain most, the threat and possible execution of a moratorium of cooperation should be pursued by our Government.

The statement of Dr. Robert Adelstein, representing the Committee for Concerned Scientists July 18 before a congressional briefing sponsored by Messrs. HARKIN and HOLLENBECK follows:

COMMITTEE OF CONCERNED SCIENTISTS, INC.

SCIENTIFIC EXCHANGE AND HUMAN RIGHTS—SOME CONSIDERATIONS

U.S.-Soviet scientific exchange has at its core two purposes: One political, the other scientific in nature. On the political level exchanges have been used to promote U.S. foreign policy goals in the era of detente. As Public Law 87-256, which governs exchanges, puts it, exchanges exist "to assist in the development of friendly, sympathetic and peaceful relations between the United States and the other countries of the world." It is telling in this regard that the original cooperative agreements reached at the Moscow summit in 1972 were signed for the U.S. by the Secretary of State and not by a scientific official.

At the same time exchanges are designed to serve scientific interests. It was, and is, hoped that increased collaboration would quicken the pace of scientific advancement. Exchanges are a mechanism by which ideas and knowledge useful to both countries' research efforts can be diffused.

This dual purpose for exchanges is recognized explicitly in the major bilateral agreement, the concerning scientific and technical cooperation. The agreement begins by "Recognizing that [technical] benefits can accrue to both countries from the development of cooperation in the fields of science and technology . . ." However, the agreement also takes "into consideration that such cooperation will serve to strengthen friendly relations" between the U.S. and the U.S.S.R. President Carter, Secretary Vance and other members of the administration have stated on numerous occasions that human rights is now one of the cornerstones of U.S. foreign policy. Both by word and deed the Congress too, has placed a commitment to the advancement of human freedom at the center of our foreign policy concerns. Thus the political course which this nation has chosen for itself dictates that scientific exchange be utilized to promote scientific and human rights.

In furthering the scientific goals of exchange we are led in the same direction. Exchanges play a role in scientific advancement because they enlarge the pool of knowledge on which researchers can draw. Science is after all a cumulative effort. Every scientist builds on the foundations provided by the investigations of his colleagues. Interchange is at the heart of science. Exchanges provide a formal means of carrying out this interchange.

The Soviet Union has chosen to limit artificially this interchange and thus impedes scientific progress. Only Soviet scientists who are judged to be "politically reliable" are permitted to participate in scientific exchanges. Scientists who have applied for permission to emigrate or have been outspoken in defense of human rights are prevented from taking part in collaborative efforts. They are dismissed from their positions and are denied any possibility of continuing their work officially. The doors of international conferences and exchange programs are almost always closed to them. Some of the "politically reliable" scientists with whom we are permitted to meet are fine researchers; others are not. Yet the Soviet government denies us the talents and contributions of such outstanding colleagues as Benjamin Levich, Aleksandr Lerner, Viktor Brailovsky and Naum Meiman. Unfortunately the list goes on and on. As the scientific goal of exchange programs is to increase interchange among scientists, efforts to include our ostracized Soviet colleagues in these exchanges can, and should, be a major focus of our attention.

Having established the warrant for and the importance of using exchanges to promote the scientific and human rights of our oppressed colleagues, we must now ask how that can be accomplished in concrete terms. The answer flows largely from the foregoing analysis. In sum, scientific exchange programs should act as a battering ram to break down the wall of isolation which the Soviet government seeks to build around refusenik and dissident scientists. Specifically we would recommend the following steps:

1. American participants in exchanges should be informed that it is consistent with U.S. government policy to use the exchanges to further the rights of refusenik and dissident scientists.

2. American participants should be informed of the existence of unofficial scientific seminars organized by refuseniks and dissidents. Because these seminars are a forum for the exchange of scientific knowledge, American exchangees should be encouraged to participate in them. Of course, the final decision must be left to the individual U.S. scientist. Moreover, the appropriate government agencies can direct interested individuals to private organizations like the Committee of Concerned Scientists, which have a great deal of experience in this regard.

3. When exchange delegations feel it appropriate, they should insist that participation in one of the unofficial seminars be part of their official itinerary. The U.S. governmental agencies concerned should provide the delegations with all possible assistance in this regard.

4. Where scientically appropriate, individual refusenik or dissident scientists should be invited to participate in exchange conferences.

5. When the USSR has shown continuous disregard for the concerns of American participants in particular fields of inquiry vis-a-vis scientific human freedoms, exchanges extant in that field should be halted until such time as the situation improves.

In conclusion, we favor exchanges that will be used directly to advance the cause of scientific and human rights. However, we oppose those exchanges that will cooperate with the U.S.S.R., however, unwittingly, in its efforts to ostracize and suppress our colleagues.●

CLIFFORD CASE—A STATESMAN

HON. JAMES J. HOWARD

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 26, 1978

● Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, those of us in the New Jersey congressional delegation who work with CLIFFORD CASE on State issues know what a fine legislator and Senator he is. When he leaves public office in January, CLIFFORD CASE will take with him a reputation as one of the leading statesmen ever to serve in the U.S. Senate. I would like to submit for the record an editorial that was broadcast over WNBC-TV4 recently. I think it very clearly outlines his fine character and contributions.

AN EDITORIAL—WNBC-TV4, JUNE 27, 1978

The political observers are saying that Clifford Case can blame only himself for his defeat in the New Jersey Republican primary. That he took his victory for granted, didn't campaign enough, wasn't seen on television enough, and so on.

There's probably truth in it. Though we'd like to add that the turnout, considering that this was a primary in which there were clear choices to be made—the turnout was a disgrace. If, after failing to vote in the primaries, people complain about the choice of candidate given them, they, too, have nobody to blame but themselves.

But that is history. The fact remains that when the Senate convenes next year, Senator Case will not be present. After twenty four years of office, the reason and quiet intelligence he brought to Senate debates will be gone. He is a man whose views are strongly held, but this never led him to passion, less still to a lack of courtesy. He was always ready to listen to the views of others, as I have had occasion to remember. He was kind, patient, and most important of all, wise. Those years in office did not feed and inflate his ego which is not always true of men in office.

Clifford Case served his country, his state, and, yes, his party well. He will be missed.●

THE ROLE OF SCIENTISTS IN FORMULATING A NATIONAL POLICY FOR REGULATING CARCINOGENS

HON. WILLIAM C. WAMPLER

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 26, 1978

● Mr. WAMPLER. Mr. Speaker, on June 4, our colleague, JIM MARTIN of North Carolina and one of the few authentic scientists in the Congress, made what I consider a most timely and important keynote speech in Dallas, Tex., at the 38th annual meeting of the Institute of Food Technologists. His subject was "The Role of Scientists in Formulating a National Policy for Regulating Carcinogens."

JIM MARTIN, in this speech, has dealt with one of the most important public policy issues facing the Congress. It is one that all of us have voted on but which few of us understand. In this Congress we have had to deal with the saccharin question, amendments to the pesticide act, the Toxic Substance Act, and the OSHA amendments, to name a few. We have talked about, and heard about, the Delaney clause, nitrosamines in bacon, and zero tolerance, to mention a few more. Always the bottom line has been the terrible and legitimate fear of cancer. We have received pressures from various groups to ban this or put rigid controls on that substance or that plant because it is a cancer suspect. And we have also had pressures from those who say there is no need to ban or control these substances because no one has proved that they will cause cancer and anyhow, think of the benefits of these substances. Scientists I have talked to say everybody could be a little bit right and some could be dead wrong, but the voices of science on important aspects of these issues are either ignored or not heard. As a result, the public does not know what to think or who to believe.

For these reasons, I commend JIM MARTIN'S speech to you:

THE ROLE OF SCIENTISTS IN FORMULATING A NATIONAL (RATIONAL) POLICY FOR REGULATING CARCINOGENS

(By Congressman JIM MARTIN, Republican, North Carolina)

There are many public policy issues that relate to food, its supply, its quality and price, and the technology which impacts upon all the rest. Many factors relate to agricultural productivity; such as, farm economics, fertilizer, pesticides, energy priorities and so forth. Next there is the marketing of food, caught between the necessities of price restraint and the cost of processing, packaging and delivery of food products to be chosen by a relatively free society. The current increase in the food component of the consumer price index will draw great attention from politicians and self-directed "consumer advocates" between now and the November elections.

Federal law includes another factor: that of the $20 billion allocation in the budget for food and agricultural programs. But of all the vexing policy areas related to food, none today is more vexing, none is more potentially adverse to the public interest, none is more contrary to what is actually known than the emergence of a regulatory concept whereby it is proposed to eliminate human exposure to carcinogens . . . chemicals that cause cancer.

The concept of Absolute Zero Tolerance for carcinogens is based not so much on science as on a political response to unknown fears. For the last two decades it has been the underlying regulatory principle for food additives because of the Delaney Clause. Currently, this absolutist absurdity is being considered as the guiding principle for other agencies as they turn from relatively trivial problems toward the long-overdue responsibility of regulating carcinogens.

There is wide agreement that this responsibility must be met. Cancer is the most feared of human diseases. It is the second leading fatal disease; taking 1000 American lives a day, plus causing untold suffering. A united effort must be made to reduce the exposure to its causes and to identify the real chemical (and other) culprits.

The Occupational Safety and Health Administration has begun a lengthy series of hearings on the carcinogenic exposure, and its prevention, in the workplace. The Environmental Protection Agency and the Consumer Product Safety Commission and others are following this closely, hopefully to put together a united effort, uniform so as to avoid the confusion of conflicting policies.

I am concerned that their approach to this policy response will be dominated not by scientists, not by experts who understand the capabilities and limitations of science and who can interpret the meaning of evidence; but by those trained in the fields of law and public administration. I am afraid that, if left to themselves, their lack of scientific understanding will be conveniently replaced by their penchant for organizational orderliness. The essentials of technology will be obscured behind a facade of legal technicality.

It will be easy for them to believe that one molecule of any carcinogen can alter one element of the DNA code, irreparably, thus triggering latent cancer. It will be easy for them to believe they can protect the people from cancer by banning any detectable trace of suspected chemicals. And it will be easy for them to construct and promulgate a complex of reporting requirements, disclosures, compliance procedures and the like—because that's what they do best.

It will never faze them if their priorities begin by controlling relatively remote risks, and losing sight of the relatively profound risks—so long as their system of categories and protocols are organized in an orderly way. Their emphasis will be on the derivative logic of their regulatory schemes while neglecting the fallacies of the basic premise of absolute safety.

My point is: They need help. They cannot be expected to properly interpret the premise since that is a question of scientific controversy. Therefore, it is essential that scientists, from a wide range of disciplines, assist them and the Congress in this fundamental interpretation.

That is the role of scientists in helping to formulate a national (rational) policy for regulating carcinogens. Scientists may participate at any and all levels of decisionmaking, as I have done; and there is a great need for members of our profession to get involved politically. Of course, the public will not look to scientists alone to reflect the wishes of the public; but we must look to no one else to interpret the meaning of science.

You must, therefore, get involved. If you do not, it will be left to others to bend the meaning of science so as to fit their advocacy agenda. That is what happened to Soviet biology for 30 years, dominated by the Lysenko doctrine that heredity was controlled by environmental and somatic (whole body) factors rather than by genetics.

Your Executive Committee issued a statement opposing the saccharin ban shortly after that was first proposed by F.D.A. in March of 1977. That I.F.T. statement emphasized the needs of real consumers, for whom there would be no other non-caloric artificial sweetener. It argued for allowing discretion to make an exception to the Delaney Clause Absolute if its benefits outweighed the risks, which was the essential change incorporated in a bill that I drafted and introduced with 201 co-sponsors.

Now I suggest to you that you need to do more of that. You also need to organize expert panels so as to give learned testimony in Congressional and agency hearings. Otherwise your voice will not be heard.

What do you say when the Department of Agriculture, through its consumer office, proposes to eliminate nitrites from pork products? Who will tell the people, if you don't, that this will only increase their risk of botulism, while only marginally reducing their exposure to nitrites? To be consistent and effective they must also ban leafy vegetables—and prohibit swallowing your saliva.

The excellent paper on this by CAST, the Council for Agricultural Science and Technology, points out that one day's salivary drainage pours more nitrite down your throat than a pound of bacon a day. But then, spitting is someone else's jurisdiction, not Agriculture's!

It may be that many of you don't want to get into this, hoping it will all go away or that your own particular food area will escape notice for awhile. I suggest to you that is a dangerous invitation to attrition. This absolutist foolishness must be answered; a broad-gauge assertion of its eventual impact must be put on the hearing record now; or else they will pick you off one by one.

There are, in fact, pork producers who would rather not talk about it, out of fear consumers will voluntarily switch to other foods. Well, to what can they switch?

To hamburgers and grilled steaks? They are already under fire for possible polycyclic aromatic hydrocarbons.

Will consumers switch to dried fish and grains and corn and nuts—while ignoring the irreducible 15 ppb of aflatoxin and other mycotoxins? Or will they subsist solely on leafy vegetables and eggs and dairy products—and not be told about estrogenic carcinogens? Will they ignore the calcium in dairy products, even mothers' milk?

No, I believe it is time to acknowledge that there are risks, even carcinogens, in most natural foods; and that a varied diet not relying on just a few "safe" foods is the key to nutrition and health.

Yes, it is right for government to develop evidence and limitations against substances which are dangerous at levels to which we, or groups of us, are exposed. It is wrong, however, for government to promote a phobia against chemicals in the pantry, or marketplace, or work area.

It is, in fact, "hazardous to your health" to ban anti-oxidants and anti-spoilants from approved food additives and thereby, increase the risk of botulism, dysentery and stomach cancer. We are dealing with an authoritarian socio-political movement that seeks to ban chemicals from the food supply.

After all, we must remind them: when you get right down to it, there is nothing else, at all, in food, except chemicals. We must tell people not to panic; that all those natural ingredients in nature's own food is but a mixture of Chemicals. "M-M-Mother Nature fooled you!"

Still, there are those who pharisaically attack chemicals as the basis of all our woes. How often have you read that 80 to 90 percent of all human cancer is due to what are called "environmental factors?" There is no quarrel with that estimate.

The fallacy occurs when that "80–90%" gets translated, for debate purposes, and by sleight-of-hand, into "synthetic chemicals"

You need to help get across the truth that 80–90% of all those "environmental factors" which are causing most cancer has nothing to do with industrial or synthetic chemicals, but is the burden of lifetime exposure to natural chemicals. I am referring to excessive diets of rich foods, heavy smoking, alcohol, background radiation . . . that is: your lifestyle environment.

No, we must never abandon or neglect our responsibility to protect the public and the environment from real hazards carelessly handled, nor defend those who do. But it is a disservice to frighten people into thinking that saccharin, or red dye 40, or deodorant spray, or (now) hair color somehow cause 1000 Americans to die daily from cancer. Whether or not you ban all four of those consumer items, the number of Americans who suffer to die daily from this awful scourge will still be 1000. It may even increase if tens of millions of dieters lose control, gain weight and thereby increase their risk of cancer—as well as cardiovascular disease, diabetes, hypertension.

There's nothing really magical or profound about saccharin. There are many far more important chemicals. But until F.D.A. proposed to ban this last of the artificial sweeteners, no politician (and few scientists) dared publicly to question the absolutist principle of the Delaney Clause. Why? Because the advocates of absolutism would effectively resort to what I call: "dynamic intimidation." Anyone questioning the validity of this absolute safety dogma would be terrorized and quickly wilted by the simple suggestion that "your constituents deserved better than to be represented by someone who favored a little bit of cancer!"

As for my own qualifications to speak on saccharin I found that reporters mainly wanted to know what the saccharin manufacturer, Sherwin-Williams, made in my district! Fortunately, at a critical time in my career, the answer was and is: nothing! They do make a little money through retail sales of paint. Next, I had to explain the sources of my modest research grants.

Yet the zero risk principle of the Delaney Clause is one nearly all toxicologists, analytical chemists (who can now mischievously detect a few dozen parts per trillion), most scientific learned societies, medical associations, three former F.D.A. commissioners, the present and former directors of the National Cancer Institute, the American Cancer Society, and the American Heart Association, all reject. They are joined by most consumer organizations that represent real consumers like diabetic and obese consumers (as opposed to perceptions of consumers by self-annointed advocates). All these, together with now a large majority of Congress who voted for the 18-month moratorium on saccharin, all agree that this absolutist safety principle is an idea whose-time-has-come-for-a-change!

It is time to accept the modern understanding that zero risk is impossible. Those who persist in pushing to ban every remote risk must be exposed for their allegiance to a principle that if rigorously applied would ban the food supply. Anything containing polycyclic aromatic hydrocarbons, mycotoxins, estrogens, selenium, tryptophan, and calcium would be prohibited. That would eliminate: grain, corn, leafy vegetables, nuts, eggs and dairy products, grilled or dried meat, coffee and even mother's milk.

It is time to take the regulatory ostrich head out of the sand and face up to the gathering evidence that nearly a dozen carcinogens have been shown to have dose-response curves that support the existence of a threshold below which they are not carcinogenic or have substantially lower potency. This means that only above the threshold the substance overloads the natural biological detoxification defenses or DNA-repair capabilities, or forces abnormal metabolism or irritates or abrades sensitive tissues, thus producing tumors which a one-hit from one stray molecule could never do.

It is time to respond to efforts to extend the absolutist principle of the Delaney Clause to the regulatory responsibilities of the Environmental Protection Agency, the Occupational Safety and Health Administration, and the Consumer Product Safety Commission. Before they adopt a goal to ban all chemicals, I will try to remind them: "What else is there?" (in the material world, anyway!) It will be a hot debate and you will want to follow it closely, and add your voice to it. That way we can get the attention of Congress before it's too late.

For my part, let me suggest a regulatory policy that I think makes sense. It is reasonable. It will not unnecessarily create fear and anxiety in the population. After all, since we all believe in rat tests, we should remember that anxiety, disorientation, and even spinning the little rascals in circles increases their risk of cancer.

Let me suggest that a regulatory process should have four logical steps:

First, there must be a determination whether the scientific evidence proves the substance to be carcinogenic. The kinds of categories and protocols being proposed by OSHA, EPA and CPSC afford an adequate basis for assessment of this evidence. Scientific sloppiness, of course, should not be given great validity. The critical point however is that this should not be the only step on which a regulation is based.

Second, there must then be an assessment of the potency of any carcinogen. How hot is it? While this will be imprecise, a semi-quantitative estimate can and must be made. Otherwise, we will dilute and divert our resources chasing after relatively trivial cases when there is a greater need to focus on the truly hazardous cases.

Third, the public risk should then be estimated by taking into account that potency factor and the actual exposure of the public, including specific subgroups. This would then give us an estimate, based on the best data available, translated into the expected number of human cancers per million population. While this estimate will certainly be open to argument, it will nevertheless be valuable for putting the probable risk into perspective in comparison with other risks which we accept or prohibit in this society.

Fourth, the appropriate regulatory action would be based on the degree of risk in comparison with its benefits. If the risk is slight in comparison with other acceptable, voluntary risks then no action is required. If the risk is of major proportions as with asbestos or B–naphthylamine, rigorous safeguards can be employed. If the risk is moderate, in between, then intermediate levels of regulation, such as warning labels, tax penalties, practical exposure limits and so forth might be appropriate. At the levels where regulation is called for, the substance should not be banned if its public benefits exceed its risks.

Of vital importance: this approach does allow all the best evidence to be weighed as well as the least valid (which now often dominates).

This gives us a workable policy.

1. Is it carcinogenic? At all?

2. If so, how potent is it?

3. What best estimate does that afford as to the public risk, considering the manner and extent to which we are actually exposed to it?

Finally,

4. What regulatory option is most appropriate to this risk in comparison with other ordinarily acceptable risks, and the benefits of the substance?

This is a policy which the public is more likely to support than one which bans saccharin and hair dyes while neglecting excessive smoking, eating and drinking. Free Society, after all, chooses to swim in a sea of risks. So put it in perspective.

Let's take saccharin for example. If you assume (which I don't) that humans are as sensitive at our normal low intake of saccharin (2 mg per kg of body weight, occasionally) as the male rats are at a daily 2.5 g per kg of body weight (including higher exposure in utero), then on the basis of actual consumption of saccharin by roughly one-fourth the U.S. population, you can "predict" a risk of 26 additional cases per year, or 13 per hundred million population. That (given all assumptions) would "project" 4 additional deaths per million per year. No, I'm not in favor of that, but in comparison the risk of cancer death from extra cosmic radiation exposure during one transcontinental air flight per year (w/o the peanuts!) is 12 times greater! Yes, you may have to stay in Dallas. The risk from the average exposure to medical x-ray is 240 times greater! The risk of drowning from fishing is 400 times greater! The cancer risk from improper diet is 20,000 times greater (just from natural food chemicals). By any comparison, any risk attributable to saccharin is at worst well within the range of risks which society readily finds acceptable.

So, let's keep it in perspective.

If it turns out that normal use of hair color (i.e., soaking your hair in it rather than drinking 25 bottles a day) introduces a risk comparable to an extra 15 minutes of sunbathing on your vacation (my calculation puts it less than that, if in fact there's any risk at all), then it seems to me that no public good is served by banning it or even creating much anxiety over it.

No, I am not really in favor of a little bit of cancer. I am only in favor of at least a little bit of intelligence.●

ANDREW YOUNG

HON. LOUIS STOKES

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 26, 1978

● Mr. STOKES. Mr. Speaker, last week, my colleagues in the Congressional Black Caucus and I gathered here on the floor of the House to address an impeachment effort leveled at U.S. Ambassador Andrew Young. The floor action arose over a controversial statement made by Ambassador Young to a French newspaper suggesting that the United States had hundreds, maybe even thousands of people he would call political prisoners. The press and a number of highly placed Government officials took immediate offense at the Ambassador's statement because of the dissidents trials which were being held 2 weeks ago in the Soviet Union and, no doubt, because they did not agree that the United States had political prisoners.

Mr. Speaker, I rose on that occasion, as I do now, in support of our distinguished Ambassador. I stated that even though his critics have continuously attacked his candor, none have yet stepped forward to prove his statements wrong.

In the wage of this controversy, Mr. Speaker, much has been written on the merits and demerits of the Ambassador's remarks. Two columns by the distinguished journalist William Raspberry have impressed me as being particularly thought provoking. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I commend to you and my colleagues William Raspberry's columns which appeared in the July 17 and July 19 editions of the Washington Post:

[From the Washington Post, July 17, 1978]

WAS YOUNG REALLY SO FAR OFF BASE?

(By William Raspberry)

When Carter-administration officials are through chastising Andrew Young for talking out of school about America's "political prisoners," perhaps they'll find the time to explain to the rest of us precisely where Young went wrong.

Did the U.N. ambassador lie when he told a French newspaper that there are "hundreds, maybe even thousands of people I would call political prisoners" in U.S. jails? Did he grossly exaggerate the numbers? Or was his sin merely that he told an embarrassing truth at a particularly awkward time?

The explanation is needed if we are to make sense of the president's posturing on "human rights."

For weeks now, administration officials have been long-faced and grim over the fact that Anatoly Scharansky, Alexander Ginzburg and other Soviet dissidents are facing trial—Ginzburg for anti-Soviet propaganda, Scharansky for high treason.

An American environment delegation scheduled to visit the Soviet Union was told to stay home in protest of the trials. White House and State Department officials have been talking in ominous terms of "reexamining relations" between the Soviets and the United States. The strategic arms limitation talks are threatened and the air of diplomatic crisis hangs heavy.

All this because two Russians are being tried on charges of having violated Soviet law.

Ginzburg has been convicted on the propaganda charge; Scharansky, on charges of spying for the CIA. U.S. officials say the real offense of both men was their human-rights activism.

Meanwhile, the Rev. Ben Chavis (of Wilmington 10 fame) sits in a North Carolina prison, convicted of charges that grow out of his civil-rights activism. Chavis and the others were convicted as conspirators in a wave of violence following a week of racial disturbances in Wilmington, N.C. Specifically, they were charged with arson in the firebombing of an empty store.

But Americans in the millions are convinced that their real crime was their civil-rights activism.

One of the leading witnesses against Scharansky was Sonya Lipavsky, a physician who turns out to have been both an informer for the KGB and a "volunteer" for the CIA.

The principal witness against the Wilmington 10 was a slow-witted teenager named Allan Ray Hall, now 23, who subsequently recanted his testimony, as did two other key witnesses.

But while the Carter administration is outraged at the prospective injustice against Scharansky, it has been sweetly discreet about the palpable injustice to Chavis and others.

President Carter, queried about this celebrated case, which Amnesty International cites as a human-rights violation, said he was not familiar with the details and, besides, it is a state matter. "I am against unjust imprisonment," he said.

Well, who would go on the record as favoring unjust imprisonment? And as for ignorance of the details, the view here is that Carter could have found out at least as much about Ben Chavis as he found out about Anatoly Scharansky—if he had cared as much.

His silence on Chavis and the Wilmington 10 has been ascribed to the fact that, as president, he cannot interfere in a North Carolina trial. But one would suppose that an American president would have at least as much influence on the North Carolina system as on the Soviet system.

I'd like a clearer explanation.

It's a long way from the Wilmington 10 (all of whom but Chavis will be released by October) to Andy Young's "hundreds, maybe even thousands" of U.S. political prisoners.

I would not argue too strongly in defense of the higher number—unless you take the term "political prisoner" to include those persons whose political beliefs have led them to commit ordinary crimes, as may have happened with at least some of the Soviet dissidents.

In that case, you'd have to include anti-war activists, demonstrators, tax protestors, civil-right activists, busing opponents and heaven knows who else. You'd certainly have to include Ronald L. Humphrey and David Truong, recently convicted in federal court on charges quite similar to those levied against Scharansky.

Maybe it's not for the U.N. ambassador to do it, but somebody has to demand that President Carter make some useful distinctions between our political prisoners and Russia's political prisoners. If he can't, and if he insists on keeping quiet about our own, then perhaps he ought to shut up about the whole matter of "human rights."

HOW WE VIEW OUR DISSIDENTS

(By William Raspberry)

As a general rule, it is America's liberals who are most easily moved to outrage against the excesses of our law-enforcement and intelligence agencies. Conservatives tend to take the toughminded view that the authorities must do what they must do.

But when the excesses take place in Soviet Russia, the strongest reaction comes from American conservatives. If any voice suggests that maybe the Soviets are doing only what Americans, would do under similar circumstances, that voice is likely to belong to a liberal.

It's hard to imagine a Barry Goldwater, a Bob Dole or a Robert Byrd supporting efforts to make the CIA or the FBI more accountable to Congress. Calls for limiting the covert activities—including entrapment, infiltration, wiretaps and burglaries—of these organizations nearly always come from liberals.

But let the KGB do the same thing against Russian citizens suspected of anti-government activities—as in the cases of Anatoly Scharansky and Aleksandr Ginzburg—and conservatives are likely to see it as just another example of the excesses of godless communism.

It is the conservatives who are demanding the head of U.N. Ambassador Andrew Young for daring to suggest that our own criminal-justice system is not free of political considerations.

Liberals are hardly more consistent or more virtuous. As a matter of fact, it may be misleading to talk of American reaction to official excess in liberal-conservative terminology.

Our reactions tend to be based less on ideology or on the specifics of governmental action than on our basic attitudes toward the government.

Americans right across the political spectrum are quick to denounce Soviet suppression of religion. The notion of Russian Baptists meeting in secret terror, or of Soviet Jews risking their liberty to speak their conscience, moves us to shed tears and write checks.

But when the FBI moves against the Church of Scientology, raiding its headquarters and arresting its members, we assume that the authorities must know something. No doubt they do. But isn't it just possible that the Russians see Christianity or religious Judaism as at least as great a threat to their system as Scientology is to ours?

When the Soviets bring criminal charges against their citizens who dissent from the Soviet system, we automatically see the charge as "trumped up."

But when American authorities raid the headquarters of the Republic of New Africa in Mississippi, or the Black Panthers in Chicago, we are likely to conclude that those organizations brought it upon themselves.

The point is not that the Soviet and American systems are equally bad, or that the KGB and the CIA are equally lawless, or that the Russian judicial system is no better than our own. There are tremendous differences, and in every case I can think of, the differences favor America.

But there are also similarities, and it strikes me that we might learn from those as well.

The key similarity is that both systems and the agencies that serve them are dedicated to their own preservation. They are equally inclined to move against what they perceive as threats to their respective systems.

It may be fair for us to make propaganda use of Russia's harshest efforts to contain those threats, just as it is fair for them to turn the Wilmington 10 to their own propaganda purposes. But we ought to recognize the propaganda for what it is, on both sides.

And we ought to recognize one thing more: that the principal difference between our system and theirs is recourse—through judicial appeals, through the press, through popular outcry. But the preservation of that difference requires that we also recognize the similarities between us, in particular the fact that state authority needs some built-in checks to keep it on course.

The easiest way to convert our investigative and intelligence agencies into unreasonable facsimiles of the Russians' is to give them the blank-check authority that some of our conservatives find so attractive.●

BRITAIN AND HUMAN RIGHTS

---

HON. MARIO BIAGGI

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 26, 1978

● Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, I wish to call to the attention of my colleagues an article which appeared in a recent edition of the Christian Science Monitor. Its main focus is on a new campaign being waged by British Foreign Secretary David Owen to have all British embassies in the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe monitor the human rights activities and file reports every 6 months.

While I do not disagree with the intent of this new directive I think it most interesting that the British feel free to dismiss the human rights violations which are occurring in their own province of Northern Ireland. These violations have been documented by both the European Court and Commission on Human Rights and most recently by Amnesty International. In early 1977, Britain admitted her guilt to these charges and pledged to cease. The Amnesty International report belies the validity of this pledge.

One other rather disturbing element in this article was the Soviet Union recognizing something that the United States has failed to—that there is indeed a human rights problem in Northern Ireland. It has been more than 1 month since the Amnesty report was released, yet this administration which champions itself as a leader in the pursuit of human rights has remained silent.

The message I wish to convey is simple: To be consistent and credible our concern for human rights must be universal, not selective. We should be as concerned about Northern Ireland as we are about Chile or Romania. Only then will the policy gain the respect of the world community and achieve its goal of advancing human rights around the world.

With respect to Ireland, I maintain that a cessation of human rights violations is absolutely essential to bringing peace to Ireland. I and the 110 members of the Ad Hoc Congressional Committee for Irish Affairs wish to prevail upon the British and Dublin Governments to work for improved conditions in their prisons, which are by far the most notorious havens for human rights violations. Our commitment to peace in Ireland is strong and will continue.

At this point in the RECORD I wish to insert the article entitled "British Put Envoys on Rights Vigil."

BRITISH PUT ENVOYS ON RIGHTS VIGIL

(By Alexander MacLeod)

LONDON.—British embassies in the Soviet Union and elsewhere in Eastern Europe have been ordered by Foreign Secretary David Owen to mount a "rights watch," and the Russians are bitterly angry at what they deem unwarranted interference in their affairs.

Dr. Owen's instruction to ambassadors requires them to file special six-monthly reports on the observance—or otherwise—of human rights by Communist governments.

The reports will be collated in London and used as a basis for criticism of regimes that fail to live up to commitments made in the Helsinki final act three years ago.

Soviet news media have brushed aside Dr. Owen's charge that since the Belgrade review conference on the Helsinki accords 10 members of Soviet human-rights monitoring groups have been put on trial. Instead the media accused the Foreign Secretary of operating a double standard.

Pravda mounted a particularly savage attack, saying that if Dr. Owen was really interested in human rights infringements he should look closer to home—the situation in Northern Ireland.

CARTER BACKED

But the Foreign Secretary, who backs President Carter's human rights line solidly, has said Britain will not be deterred from its new policy of keeping a close watch on the human rights record of Communist regimes.

Dr. Owen's aim is to insure that monitoring, done so far by dissident groups, does not tail off because of the current spate of trials.

A tough line of human rights in Communist countries is also being taken by the Conservative opposition leader, Margaret Thatcher.

In some ways her approach is more rigorous than Dr. Owen's, and there is speculation that the issue may produce clashes between the two main British political parties in the run-up to the general election, now expected in October.

In a weekly publicized BBC Television interview, Mrs. Thatcher said that if the U.S.S.R. and its allies continue to take severe legal action against dissidents, Britain should seek to persuade the West to take retaliatory action.

CURTAILMENTS ASKED

She proposed cuts in food shipments, trade credits, and exports of technological know-how. "I refuse to accept that the West could not mount a credible nonmilitary response to the Russians," she said, dealing with the trials of dissidents and Soviet and Cuban activities to Africa in the same breath

Mrs. Thatcher's remarks evoked sharp Soviet rebukes. Moscow Radio referred to her as a "warmonger" and returned to describing her as "the iron maiden"—an epithet first used two years ago when the Conservative Party leader expressed her opposition to Soviet policies in forthright language.

The day after Mrs. Thatcher's TV broadcast, the Soviet ambassador in London called on her at the House of Commons. It is believed he protested vehemently about her demands for retaliation against Russia and other Warsaw Pact countries over their human rights policies.●

HON. PAUL FINDLEY

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 26, 1978

● Mr. FINDLEY. Mr. Speaker, we are at a crossroads. Congress can keep the U.S. arms embargo against Turkey in place and perpetuate a failed policy and the stalemate it has created on Cyprus for over 3 years. Or, we can lift the arms embargo, thereby stimulating movement toward a Cyprus settlement.

We have already had good indications that lifting the embargo will promote a Cyprus settlement. Indeed, since President Carter announced on April 6, 1978, his intention to ask Congress to lift the arms embargo, Turkey has demonstrated a considerable willingness to negotiate on Cyprus and on other difficult issues. Lifting the embargo would further encourage the Turks and would facilitate the negotiating process for Prime Minister Ecevit whose government enjoys a bare four seat majority in Parliament. Retaining the embargo would, on the other hand, render additional Turkish concessions all the more difficult.

For the information of my colleagues, I would like to provide a brief summary of the Turkish efforts this year to negotiate on Cyprus and on other outstanding issues.

I believe that these efforts show great promise and demonstrate more hope for a resolution of the Cyprus conflict than we have seen in the years since 1974—or perhaps since 1960.

A. NEGOTIATIONS ON CYPRUS

Since April 6, 1978, when President Carter asked Congress to lift the arms embargo, the Turkish side has taken the following steps:

First. Reiterated its commitment to an independent, nonalined, bizonal Federal Republic of Cyprus.

Second. Tabled proposals on Cyprus on April 13 which U.N. Secretary-General Waldheim stated "deal with the constitutional and territorial aspects of the Cyprus problem in a concrete and substantial way."

Third. Provided, on May 22, a further elaboration of these proposals which promised Turkish-Cypriot flexibility and highlighted their willingness to:

Consider significant territorial readjustments;

Make further troop reductions;

Permit 35,000 Greek-Cypriots to return to their homes in Varosha as negotiations progress;

Find means to reopen Nicosia Airport for civilian traffic.

The Turkish-Cypriots termed these proposals "a starting point for discussions."

Fourth. On July 20, 1978, the Turkish-Cypriots proposed an interim administration for Varosha under the aegis of the United Nations as soon as intercommunal negotiations resume with planning for the resettlement to begin promptly.

Because of their length, I have not submitted the documents from which the above information was drawn for the RECORD. These documents are available, however, from the Department of State.

B. TROOP WITHDRAWALS

Since 1974, Turkey has withdrawn 41 percent of its initial force on Cyprus. In April and in July Turkey withdrew 2,050 troops from Cyprus. Prime Minister Ecevit of Turkey has stated that he will make additional troop withdrawals in the future.

In a May 22 press conference in Washington, Prime Minister Ecevit spoke of the troop withdrawals:

(Excerpt from statement of Prime Minister Ecevit before the National Press Club on May 22, 1978.)

On the other hand, in spite of the fact that a new pattern has not yet taken roots in Cyprus recently, and, therefore, complete security has not been assured, we have, contrary to the impression that is widely spread in many countries, we have for the last three years withdrawn about 16,000 troops in Cyprus and we continue to withdraw them, although, of course, it would be impossible to pull them all back before the final Cyprus state takes shape, and the security of the people is insured, but the Turkish troops are not in Cyprus to stay there. They are not invading troops, contrary to what many people think.

C. NEGOTIATIONS WITH GREECE OVER BILATERAL ISSUES IN THE AEGEAN

Differences exist between Greece and Turkey on airspace rights and the Outer Continental Shelf in the Aegean. Greece rules out its participating in the Cyprus negotiations or any discussions of that issue.

When Prime Minister Ecevit took office in January, he announced that a resolution of differences with Greece as well as of the Cyprus situation were among his top governmental priorities. His efforts have included the following:

First. He proposed a meeting between Prime Minister Caramanlis and himself which occurred in Montreux on March 9 and 10. The meeting was deemed a success. A second meeting was planned for April 14 to 16. Greece, however, postponed this meeting when it learned that President Carter planned to ask Congress to lift the arms embargo. However, Prime Ministers Ecevit and Caramanlis did confer at the end of May when both were in Washington for the NATO summit and agreed, at that time, that further meetings should take place.

Second. On July 4 and 5, the Secretaries General of the Foreign Ministries of Greece and Turkey met in Ankara to discuss bilateral issues. The two representatives issued a joint communique which described the talks as "full, sincere, and constructive" and stating that "rapprochement" on certain issues was "possible." The text of the communique follows this section.

Third. Greece has suggested a nonaggression pact with Turkey. Although Turkey had earlier resisted this approach because it considered it unnecessary for two allies, Prime Minister Ecevit has now said he will discuss it. Talks are now underway.

JOINT GREEK-TURKISH COMMUNIQUE

Following a decision by the Prime Ministers of Greece and Turkey, the secretaries general of the foreign ministries of the two countries, Ambassadors Byron Theodoroulos and Sukru Elekdag, met in Ankara on July 4 and 5, 1978.

Their meeting had the objective to continue the examination of bilateral questions already discussed by the two prime ministers during their meetings in Montreux and in Washington and to explore the possibility of a rapprochement of the views of the two sides, as put forward by the two prime ministers.

Bearing in mind the common desire of the two prime ministers to find solutions to the bilateral problems of the two countries, two secretaries general proceeded to a full, sincere and constructive examination of those problems. It was found that as to certain questions the rapprochement of such views is possible and the secretaries general have, therefore, agreed to pursue the dialogue between them. To that effect they have decided to meet again in Athens in September 1978.

D. U.S.-TURKISH PRISONER EXCHANGE TREATY

Our colleague from Michigan, HAROLD SAWYER has, to his credit, diligently worked to promote a United States-Turkish prisoner exchange treaty which would permit the return to this country of Joann McDaniel and Kathryn Zenz, two young American women incarcerated in Turkey. Because of Representative SAWYER's interest, the State Department has approached Turkey on the possibility of a treaty. Turkey has indicated its great interest and willingness to enter into a treaty. Negotiations are progressing well.

Letter from State Department Counselor Matthew Nimetz to Representative HAROLD SAWYER:

WASHINGTON, D.C.,
July 19, 1978.

Hon. HAROLD S. SAWYER,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. SAWYER: This is in reply to your letter to the President of June 29, and other recent correspondence, regarding the status of Joann McDaniel and Kathryn Zenz, two American women imprisoned in Turkey.

As you know, the United States and Turkey have agreed to commence negotiations at an early date on a prisoner transfer treaty. The treaty will provide a mechanism for Americans imprisoned in Turkey, including Ms. Zenz and Ms. McDaniel to return to the U.S. in order to serve out the remainder of the sentences imposed by the Turkish courts, subject to U.S. laws governing eligibility for parole.

As I mentioned to you during our meeting on June 29, the transfer treaty will be based on the European Convention on the International Validity of Criminal Judgments, with necessary modifications to reflect U.S. constitutional and legal requirements. We gave a draft text to the Turkish government on July 17 and proposed sending a team to Ankara with instructions to carry out the negotiations as expeditiously as possible.

The Turks seem equally anxious to reach rapidly a mutually beneficial agreement. Nonetheless, our experience in negotiating similar prisoner transfer treaties with other countries suggests that, even with the best intentions on both sides, such negotiations are not usually concluded in a few days, given the technical and legal nature of the agreement under negotiation.

We share your interest in successfully concluding negotiations at the earliest possible date, and will do everything we can to move forward rapidly. The President's efforts to lift the Turkish arms embargo have improved the tone of our relationship with Turkey in recent months. This improvement will facilitate progress on a prisoner transfer treaty and other issues.

For your information, I have enclosed a copy of the Department's July 10 press release announcing the negotiations, as well as a status report on the case of Ms. Zenz and Ms. McDaniel. I have taken the liberty of distributing copies of this letter and its attachments to your colleagues who also signed the letter to President Carter.

I hope this information will be helpful to you.

Sincerely,

MATTHEW NIMETZ.●

ABORTION AND DISCRIMINATION

HON. GEORGE MILLER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 26, 1978

● Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Speaker, as you are well aware, the issue of abortion has become extremely complex. In the Congress, we have legislated on the issue in terms of public funding. We will consider an amendment to the Civil Rights Commission Act which would prohibit the Commission from making recommendations to Congress on abortion. The Congress may vote this year on conference language regarding the abortion amendment in the pregnancy disability bill. In the latter instance, we may debate "religious" or "corporate conscience" decisions on workers' rights to seek legal abortion.

An aspect of the abortion issue which has not been discussed extensively in this Chamber is discrimination, in employment and otherwise, based upon a woman's choice to seek legal abortion, or an individual's public statement supporting the right to choose.

Ellen Leitzer, the Washington counsel for the Reproductive Freedom Project of the American Civil Liberties Union, has provided me with information on three cases where discrimination, based upon a decision on abortion, may have occurred. In the first and third cases cited by Attorney Leitzer, the ACLU is assessing the legal issues involved to determine whether litigation is in order. The second case already is the subject of legal action. I commend a description of these cases to my colleagues:

STATEMENT OF ELLEN LEITZER, ESQUIRE

In the past few weeks several abortion related incidents have come to my attention and I wish to share them with you. If you have knowledge of similar occurrences, please write me at the above address or call me at (202) 544-1681. It is important that the ACLU monitor situations in which individuals or agencies are penalized for either procuring abortions or advocating a prochoice position.

One. Ann Moe (a pseudonym) is a black woman in her late twenties who has several children and is currently separated from her husband. She was, until recently, employed as a nurse's aid by a private nursing home in a rural county in southeast Alabama. In early May, Ann Moe asked for and was granted a day off from work for medical reasons. She proceeded to obtain an abortion in Montgomery, Alabama which is approximately 90 miles from her home. Upon returning to work, her supervisor told her that "We know what you were doing, you had an abortion." She was then informed that she was fired because of the abortion.

Two. Pat Miller is an attorney who until recently was employed by the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania as an assistant attorney general. Around February 27, 1978 Pat was offered a staff attorney position with the Allegheny County Legal Services for the Elderly Program. On March 30 she accepted the offer which included taking a $4,000 cut in salary and immediately gave notice to her current employer. She was to begin her new job on May 1. On April 28 the three County Commissioners of Allegheny County approved the staff attorney position. That same night, Pat Miller, as President of the Board of Women's Health Services, Inc. (an abortion clinic), hosted the Fifth Anniversary dinner for WHS and introduced the keynote speaker, Senator Birch Bayh (D-Ind.) The following day (Saturday) Pat received a telephone call from Wayne Gerhold, Director of the Legal Services Program and her new boss, who told her not to come to work that Monday because there is "no job."

Apparently her appearance at the WHS dinner coupled with her past history of prochoice activities resulted in the refusal of two of the three county commissioners to sign her employment contract. When asked why Commissioners Tom Foerster (a prominent anti-abortion leader) and Jim Flaherty (whose brother Pete is the Democratic candidate for governor) had refused to sign her contract, the off-the-record answer was "Well, she's not exactly a prolifer." Subsequently, Wayne Gerhold resigned his position as Director for the Legal Services Program in protest and Pat is suing the Commissioners for violation of her civil rights.

Third. Three years ago Congress ordered that regional "health systems agencies" (HSA) be set up across the country in order to review all proposals for new or expanded health facilities and equipment, and to develop long-range health planning. In addition, the HSA is mandated by law to "educate and inform the general public and public officials about community health questions." The Health Systems Agency (HSA) of Northern Virginia which receives about 94 percent of its budget from the federal government recently issued a lengthy report outlining a five-year plan for health care and an annual implementation plan. The report included a recommendation that "the governor and the Virginia General Assembly approve the use of public monies for abortions for Medicaid-eligible women." On May 22, 1978, the Fairfax County (Va.) Board of Supervisors voted to cut off county funding for the HSA accusing the agency of "propagandizing" on the abortion issue. In response, the HSA board chairman claims that the agency has not taken a stand on abortion and that its recommendation is based on the argument "that since abortion is medically and legally sanctioned, it shouldn't be denied because of lack of money."

Prince William County, which jointly funds the HSA of Northern Virginia has also voted to withhold its contribution if the health agency continues to support abortion funding.●

PUERTO RICAN DAY PARADE

HON. PETER W. RODINO, JR.

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 26, 1978

● Mr. RODINO. Mr. Speaker, I want to call my colleagues' attention to a very special event that will be held in my home city of Newark this Sunday, July 30. It is the statewide Puerto Rican Day Parade, which tops a week of activities recognizing the proud heritage of Americans of Puerto Rican descent.

I am fortunate to count my circle of friends many of the Puerto Rican families residing in New Jersey's 10th Congressional District, and it gives me a great deal of satisfaction and pleasure to participate in this celebration with them.

Mr. Speaker, I join with my community in expressing a personal sense of pride in the contributions of Puerto Rican Americans. Individuals like Dr. Jose Rosario, the director of F.O.C.U.S. Ramon Aneses, Newark's deputy mayor, Tony Perez, past director of F.O.C.U.S. and now president of the Immaculate Heart of Mary Council, and Raul Davila who has put together the Puerto Rican Arts Festivals year after year are outstanding examples of leadership that has evolved from the Puerto Rican community. There are others, to be sure, and those who quickly come to mind are Miguel Rodriguez, special aide to Newark Mayor Kenneth Gibson, Fernando Zambrana, president of Newark's Advisory Council on Bilingual Education, Dr. Hilda Hidalgo, a member of the Newark Board of Education, Julio Quinones, chairperson of F.O.C.U.S., Maria Cristina Rosa, who is active in the women's caucus, and Percy Miranda, who is a member of my Newark staff.

The Puerto Rican Day Parade, now in its 16th year, is the result of the combined efforts of many hard-working leaders of the Puerto Rican community. The parade's proceeds will go toward a college scholarship fund. This year's queen, Lorraine Alemany, is an example of the beauty and charm of the Puerto Rican people. The president of the Parade Committee is Luz Miriam Hernandez, the grand marshal is Jack Horta, and the general coordinator is Miguel Sanabria. They have done an excellent job in preparing for the event, and they have received outstanding support from Jose A. Lugo, the parade's first vice president, and Dimas Montalvo, the second vice president, and Miguel Rivera, the treasurer.

Other members of the parade's executive committee who have been vitally involved with making the parade a success are Pablo Rivera, Justo de Jesus, Edwin Rivera, Jaime Munoz, Gladys B. Cancel, Fernando Zambrana and Cipriano Suarez. Frank Melendez is the Newark representative on the parade's board of directors, and the honorary chairmen of the parade include Mayor Gibson, Jose Rosario, Carlos Romero Barcelo, and New Jersey Gov. Brendan Byrne.

Since the first Puerto Rican Day parade, my good friend Marie Gonzalez has been on the scene as an integral part of the event. Marie is a member of the Newark Human Rights Commission and she is serving as the liaison between the commission and the parade.

The work of these people and many others, and also the events leading up to the parade, are very important reminders of the contributions of Puerto Rican Americans. This week in New Jersey is Puerto Rican Heritage Week, and on Monday, Mayor Gibson signed a special proclamation designating Puerto Rican Week in the city of Newark. The Spanish Repertoire Company will perform at Essex County College in Newark on Friday night, and on Saturday, the parade committee will hold a banquet with the keynote speaker being Maurice Ferre, the mayor of Miami, Fla.

Mr. Speaker, I am delighted that the city of Newark is carrying on the important tradition of the Puerto Rican Day parade because I believe it will heighten the appreciation for Puerto Rican culture in America. These citizens are mindful of the value of their heritage and I am very proud to represent them in Congress. I am sure that the 16th annual Puerto Rican Day parade will be another memorable event in the celebration of the resplendent tapestry of America's ethnic heritage.●

OAHE AUTHORIZATION NEEDED

HON. LARRY PRESSLER

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 26, 1978

● Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. Speaker, recently, I introduced a resolution in Congress calling for preservation of the existing Oahe authorization and expressing the sense of Congress that it would welcome modification to the Oahe plan.

It has been my strong belief that we should preserve the Oahe authorization, but make modifications and changes in it to make it more acceptable to our people. It cannot, of course, be acceptable to everybody, but the original Oahe plan had problems which many of our people objected to—particularly farm people along the area where the basic ditch would be dug. There were also problems with the land mitigation program and other parts of the project.

I know that this plan has been studied for years, and I know that many Members of Congress have faithfully supported it. I believe it is well worth preserving the authorization and making a major effort at coming up with a modification before we lose it.

Next March and April, we will be considering appropriations again. I am very excited about the possibility that the Governor, the legislature, the local boards, and the congressional delegation can come up with a major new plan by next March or April. I certainly am willing and eager to participate in that planning. I have been meeting with the different local boards, and I have been discussing possibilities. No one person will be able to do this, but I shall certainly continue to work and continue to assist.

A chief objective of any modification must be to get water to our eastern cities—such as Aberdeen, Redfield, Huron, and Mitchell. If we are unable to agree to commence with a canal, it has been suggested that the possible use of one or two large pipelines alongside railroad rights-of-way that run from the Missouri River eastward and westward; the possibility of using the existing pumping plant at Blunt to fill the canal to Medicine Creek, and from there transferring into one or two large pipelines running alongside the railroad right-of-way to Huron; of modifying the land mitigation program; of a Lower James addition; of canalside and alongside the Missouri irrigation; and other possible modifications—all these are needed in our State and probably could be done within the existing authorization or with slight variations in that authorization. I am sure that there are other possible modifications, and I would like to have them suggested. But, by next March or April, we must have an acceptable plan.

Mr. Speaker, at this point I insert a copy of the resolution I have introduced:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That it is the sense of Congress—

(1) that the Oahe unit, James division, Missouri River Basin project, South Dakota, is a worthwhile project but the authorized plan is in need of modifications;

(2) that Congress welcomes a modification plan from the State of South Dakota;

(3) that, although certain modifications of such project are desirable to facilitate the future development of such project, the authorization of such project under the Act entitled "An Act authorizing the construction of certain public works on rivers and harbors for flood control, and for other purposes", approved December 22, 1944 (58 Stat. 887), as modified by the Act entitled "An Act to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to construct, operate, and maintain the initial stage of the Oahe unit, James division, Missouri River Basin project, South Dakota, and for other purposes", approved August 3, 1968 (82 Stat. 624), should remain in effect.●

HOW ENACTMENT OF LOWER CAPITAL GAINS TAX RATES WOULD BENEFIT SMALL BUSINESS IN NEW YORK AND THROUGHOUT THE NATION

HON. JACK F. KEMP

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 26, 1978

● Mr. KEMP. Mr. Speaker, several weeks ago the President chose the occasion of a press conference to denounce the bill of our colleague from Wisconsin (Mr. STEIGER) to reduce the capital gains tax rate. The President attacked the legislation as only benefiting millionaires, saying that it did not provide two bits for the average American family. He threatened a veto.

I do not know whether there is much about taxes and economics that the President does not know. Or whether he was badly advised, either by his political advisers or his economic advisers. Or maybe he simply forgot. But, for whatever reason, the President was wrong, clearly wrong.

The President failed to address the critical question of the relationship between incentive and reward as that applies to taxes. He did not say that people would invest less if the reward were less.

The President failed to address the related question of the relationship between tax rates and tax revenues. That is hard to figure out, considering the information is in the public records of his Treasury Department. He did not say, for example, that the doubling of the capital gains tax rate since 1968 has reduced revenues from that tax, as a percentage of total Federal revenues, by about 40 percent. Thus, a tax increase designed to bring in additional tax revenue, worked in exactly the opposite direction. It was counter-productive. By not knowing this, the President could not then address himself to the obvious: what would happen if the rates were reduced to the 1968 level. Tax revenues would increase, of course.

The President did not talk about the effects of the unnecessarily high capital gains tax upon investment. He did not tell us that our rate of investment has dropped to one of the lowest in the industrialized, free world.

But there is one thing the President did not tell us for which he cannot be easily forgiven. I refer to his failure to tell us the truth about the importance of the Steiger legislation and what would occur as a result of its passage to small business, to the smaller businesses across this country, including New York.

There has appeared an article directed to this very point, one in the New York Post of July 19. It makes this point, and it talks in terms of New York specifically.

I quote:

For many New Yorkers, a reduction in the capital gains tax would induce them to return to more traditional capital investments, ones that would help them expand their business, produce jobs and add to the tax base of the city.

Mr. Speaker, the article follows. I hope every member of the Committee on Ways and Means, every one of my colleagues from New York State, especially New York City, reads this and thinks seriously about what we are being told here, and the implications of that for small business throughout the country.

[From the New York Post, July 19, 1978]

CAPITAL GAINS: HOW SMALL BIZ COULD BENEFIT

(By Carol Mathews)

"It's a great popular misconception that a lower capital gains tax is good only for large businesses or the wealthy. There are a lot of small business people in New York who, with an attractive capital gains tax, would say 'Yes, I can invest more money in my business and, yes, I can stay in New York.' "—Mike Durso, executive vice president, Bronx Chamber of Commerce.)

Congress is flirting with a proposal to reduce the capital gains tax from a top rate of 50 per cent to a maximum of 25 per cent. The plan has brought pained cries of "foul" from President Carter, who has labeled the cut a "huge tax windfall for millionaires," a remark that has led critics to ask how the President, himself, became a millionaire. ("Do you suppose he did it by accumulating after-tax ordinary income?" one lawyer asked sarcastically.)

There is little doubt that the lower tax on capital gains (money made from investing money in things like stocks) than on ordinary income (money received in return for work) leaves it wide open to the charge that it is a "rich person's tax."

But, then, how does someone become rich without making a sizable capital gain?

Since New York, probably more than any other U.S. city, is full of people trying to "make it" and since they feel the best way to do it is by using money to make money, it is understandable that many of them would like to see the capital gains tax reduced.

For many New Yorkers, a reduction in the capital gains tax would induce them to return to more traditional capital investments, ones that would help them expand their business, produce jobs and add to the tax base of the city.

A lowered capital gains tax would benefit the middle class as well as the wealthy, according to Stanley Herzman, president of Herzman & Co., a Manhattan manufacturer of uniforms for organizations such as the Girl Scouts.

"The rank and file are capitalists in this country, in a way. We all have a little investment, whether it be in a house, in stock, in a business, or in a hobby such as stamp collecting," he says.

And, for him, there is a whale of a difference between a top tax of 50 percent and a top of 25 percent, as proposed by Rep. William Steiger (R-Wis.) (The current 50 per cent maximum tax on capital gains applies only to money invested for less than a year. The maximum is 35 per cent on money invested for 12 months or longer.)

"I wouldn't consider selling my business if I had to pay a tax of 35 per cent. It would be too much of a burden. But I could live with a 25 per cent tax. It's more palatable, isn't it?" Herzman said.

This is not idle talk. Herzman has had several takeover offers from other companies. "But the tax weighs heavily in making my decision. So what happens? I don't sell. The business could be choked for lack of the financing that we'd get with the backing of a big company," he adds.

Since New York is really a small-business town, regardless of the hoopla about being international headquarters for the world's largest corporations, and since owners of small businesses are in effect their own "bank," any reduction in the capital gains tax could have an important impact here.

"There are thousands of small businesses in New York. When these businesses need capital, they get it from their owners. A lower capital gains tax would allow these individuals to keep more of the money they make on their investments and this, in turn, would translate into more money for their businesses, which would further help the city's tax base," said Gilbert Robinson, who heads his own public relations firm and is the former chairman of the New York Board of Trade, an organization of small businessmen.

Not every small business in New York would be helped, by any means. There are any number of small mom-and-pop stores struggling to break even, where the business is standing in the center of a financial banana peel. These families have no capital to invest, much less money to lend to their own company.

But for others, a lowering of the tax could trigger increased investment in their own business, expansion, more jobs, and a further commitment to New York.

The benefits of a lowered tax on businessmen here does not mean they welcome it uncritically. "I would resent having the capital gains tax or any other tax reduced if the government's obligation to provide services is curtailed," said Herzman. "But I would say that this tax, if lowered, would free up money and that it would filter down through the city's economy."●

TOWN THINKS AND SAVES

HON. JOHN J. RHODES

OF ARIZONA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 26, 1978

● Mr. RHODES. Mr. Speaker, at a time when the American people are beginning to question the efficacy of government, and to protest the tax burden they see increasing every day, it is refreshing to find an example of frugality and efficiency in government—such as the operations of Scottsdale, Ariz. Columnist Jack Mabley took note of the innovative government of Scottsdale in a Chicago Tribune column on July 25. Scottsdale faces many new problems, fueled by its growth as a progressive sunbelt city. I urge my colleagues to take the time to read this account of how an imaginative and practical city government holds down costs, while it provides the public with good service.

Text of the article is as follows:

TOWN THINKS—AND SAVES

(By Jack Mabley)

Garbage collectors in Scottsdale, Ariz., ride in air-conditioned cabs and listen to stereo music as they move through the city picking up trash.

Each driver is alone. He manipulates a lever in the cab that moves an arm with a hook that grabs garbage cans at the curb and dumps them into the truck. The driver collects more trash per shift than two three-man crews in conventional trucks. Homeowners pay $3.50 a month for garbage collection.

The Scottsdale city government saves about $200,000 a year from the cost of conventional garbage collection systems. Scottsdale's population is 84,000.

We have spent several weeks calling cities around the country to ask how they save money. A tax revolt is demanding that local governments spend and tax less.

It isn't enough for us to threaten: "Economize—or else!" The spenders can make a few gestures, wait till the heat dies, then go back to the spend and spend and tax and tax routine.

We have sought evidence that real economies can be made in local governmental operations without sacrifice of quality.

Happily, we found more than can be told in one column, so this report will continue after today.

Economics can work in large and small governments. Los Angeles eliminated fire alarm boxes and saves $500,000 a year previously spent answering false alarms. And fire protection is better.

Firemen in suburban Glenview do the village's printing in their free time.

Scottsdale is a good example of a medium-size government making real economies. Barbara Markiewicz, the city public information director, gave us a rundown.

Scottsdale doesn't have its own fire department. The city hires a private company to put out its fires. The city figures an annual savings of $960,000, or $12 a resident, through lower costs to the government and lower fire insurance rates for residents.

The private fire company is aided by city employees who are auxiliary fire fighters. They carry beepers so they can answer alarms. They're paid for their extra duties and collectively receive about $40,000 a year.

The police department saves money by using civilian assistants for paperwork and clerical duties.

The civilians get less pay and fewer benefits than policemen, and they free the officers for patrol and enforcement work. The program saves the city $186,000 a year.

Police communications also are managed by civilians, saving another $125,000 a year.

Scottsdale has an employee suggestion box, with successful suggesters paid a percentage of the savings resulting from their ideas. The first year brought $43,000 in economies

Another $30,000 is saved by using computer printouts of publications available in the city library, rather than maintaining a separate government library and file. The city shares computer time with the schools, saving another $150,000.

The park district hires college students part-time for some maintenance work and uses high school student volunteers in recreation activities. The high school students are not paid, but work records are kept so they can cite the experience in applying for future jobs.

Traffic signal lights became so expensive that Scottsdale began building its own.

When the cost of new fire trucks reached the $50,000 range for commercial trucks and $85,000 and up for custom jobs, the Scottsdale's private fire dapartment started building its own fire trucks, at a saving of $15,000 to $30,000 a vehicle.

They buy commercial chassis and fabricate the equipment in their own shops or subcontract for some metal work. The trucks are designed for the jobs at hand, with direct help from the firemen who will use them. They have less chrome than most fire trucks.

But they meet specifications. Scottsdale's per capital fire loss is under $6. The national average is about $13.

"The thing that sets Scottsdale apart is a willingness to take risks," said City Manager Frank Aleshire. That may be the key to any economy program. If you're imaginative and aggressive, you're going to pull some bloopers, and Scottsdale had its share. But they have character enough to ride out the lumps and bumps and profit from the successes, which are many.●

FOREIGN INVESTMENT IN AMERICAN FARMLAND

HON. JOHN M. ASHBROOK

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 26, 1978

● Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Speaker, foreign investment in American farmland is skyrocketing. Huge tracts of our finest agricultural land are passing to alien ownership.

It is now estimated that foreign purchases comprise 20 percent of land sales in certain parts of the country. The general manager of one European company which owns about 14,000 acres of midwest farmland has stated: "The enthusiasm of Europeans for American farms is unbelievable."

A few of the foreign purchases have come to light. These include the Metternich's 2,135 acre farm in Iowa, Prince Lichtenstein's farm in Texas and the Japanese Kikamo farm in Wisconsin. On the whole, however, we lack reliable statistics on the extent of foreign ownership of American farmland.

I strongly believe that the continued growth of foreign purchases poses a danger to our Nation. It threatens the family farm, the backbone of our agricultural system.

Increased competition resulting from foreign investment is driving up the price of land. The virtually unlimited financial resources of alien investors will make it difficult for American farmers to expand their acreage to help overcome rising per acre production costs. Moreover, fewer new farmers will be able to get started.

We must not allow our agricultural system to slip from the family farm to one of alien absentee owners and tenant farmers. This would be disastrous for the farmer, the farming community and the Nation.

Following is a fascinating article on foreign investment in U.S. farmland which appeared in Saturday Review:

INVASION OF THE AMERICAN HEARTLAND

(By Christopher H. Stern)

A new breed of tenant farmer in the United States opens his eyes as the sun rises on his part of the world. What he sees, whether he is in Arkansas, Texas, or California, are acres and acres of the earth's highest-yield farmland. What he cannot see is the German industrialist in Düsseldorf, the Roman Clergyman on Lake Como, or the aging Argentinian banker, one of whom owns the farm he is about to work.

Lehndorff Vermogens Vermattung, a Hamburg-based holding company, owns 14,000 acres of choice midwestern farmland. M. Thomas Lardner, Lehndorff's general manager in the United States, says that nonresident "alien" investors want American farms. "The enthusiasm of Europeans for American farms is unbelievable."

A few foreign acquisitions have received publicity: Prince Lichtenstein's 10,000-acre farm in Texas's Red River area; the Busonis' 12,000-acre Norris farm in Illinois; the Metternichs' 2,135 acres in Iowa; and the Japanese Kikamo farm in Wisconsin. However, viewed against the 340 million acres of American farmland, these purchases represent no more than a soybean in a bucket; but foreign investment in land is not limited to the acquisition of farmland. Overseas firms own 2 million acres of American forest land, hundreds of thousands of acres of coal and ranch lands, and a sizable amount of urban land. Farmland, however, is the property foreign investors are most interested in.

California is the hottest area of foreign investor activity. Anrex Corporation in San Francisco will sell $260 million worth of agricultural farms in 1977 to an assortment of Italians, Swiss, Belgians, West Germans, and Frenchmen. Says the corporation's exuberant president, Gerald Jackson, "Good farmland is selling as fast as it's available. More than eighty percent of agricultural buyers are nonresident foreigners. We get a hundred inquiries a day from interested foreigners, and right now one of the world's biggest banks and one of the biggest investment houses are standing by with fifty billion dollars of foreign capital to invest in farmland."

In New York City, Daniel Bodini, who speaks three languages, handles Eastdil Realty's foreign investors. Last year he sold 200,000 acres in the American West. This year he will sell more than twice that amount. But although other real estate companies and brokers also claim large sales to foreigners, the industry's consensus is that the big banks—particularly Northern Trust and Continental Illinois in Chicago—are doing the most spectacular business everywhere in the country.

"Foreign investors feel comfortable dealing with a bank," explains broker Davis Martin. "One hundred out of one hundred aliens who actually come looking for a U.S. farm begin by going to Northern Trust, and afterward eighty of them wander down the street to Continental." Though banks release no information, citing the fiduciary relationship they have with their clients, Northern Trust's 1976 annual report records 460,000 acres managed in 35 states. "Right now the banks couldn't be doing more farm business," says one successful Chicago broker, "and even if they've been in the business for twenty years, you can bet the overwhelming majority of their holdings are foreign because domestic owners have many better ways to manage their farms."

Davis Martin has good reason not to disparage the banks. In the Arkansas and Missouri river bottoms and in the Mississippi delta, he has handled 30 transactions worth $12 million. A competitor, Oppenheimer Industries, which sold $60 million in farms from 1974 through 1976 and will do $40 million in 1977 alone, has handled 15 to 20 farms in that region. "Foreign owners weren't too familiar with our temperate climate at first," drawls slow-talking, fast-closing broker Vardeman Moore, of Mississippi, "but they're warming to it real fast. There's a virtual land rush down here."

Foreign interest is also high in southwestern and midwestern states, but there are simply not enough large quality farms being put on the market. Henry S. Miller and Company and Interstable of Dallas each sold 15,000 acres to foreigners in 1975 and 1976. This year, they say that due to the lack of big farms they have made no sales. A few farms remain available, and foreign investors are snatching those up. Broker Fred Smith has handled 20,000 acres in the Red River area, and two-thirds of his business comes from foreign investors. San Antonio's Pleaz Naylor knows of 75,000 acres bought by foreigners in northwest Texas, but he agrees there are "a lotta lookers and little land." Complains one exasperated Chicago banker. "We can't begin to locate enough properties to please our foreign investors."

There are many reasons why foreign investors are buying American farms. "My clients are old rich families, disenchanted, nervous, or just scared out of their minds," notes Reed Oppenheimer of Oppenheimer Industries. "Many of them have had land in their families for a thousand years. They say, 'When Napoleon came, when the Prussians came, when the jewels were sold, we survived as a family because of the land.' " Brokers concur that foreigners want to salt away a place for themselves and their children and grandchildren because they fear Communism and consider America the strongest remaining bastion of free enterprise.

In a report to Congress, John Timmons, a professor of economics at Iowa State University, and Charles Curtiss, Distinguished Professor of Agriculture there, outlined the complex of incentives that are drawing foreign investors to U.S. farmland. They cited the hedge against inflation provided by the relative stability of U.S. prices and farming costs; the hope that investments in U.S. land will offer a refuge against land reform and political disorders abroad; the expectations of capital appreciation due to skyrocketing land values (witness the steady 15 to 35 percent annual rises since 1972); the tax advantages and natural advantages (access to food, materials, and farming technology) of investing in U.S. land; the fact that in terms of income and of capital appreciation, U.S. land safely balances investment portfolios; and the idea that—beyond the satisfaction, prestige, and psychic value of owning farmland in the United States—such investment may give them control of strategic resources and provide them with a base of economic and political power within the country.

Though the incentives are well-known and heavy investment is apparent, scant information exists as to the magnitude or locations of foreign ownership. This is because land-related public records, traditionally kept at the county level, are not a practical device for disclosing who owns what and where. And since market advantage runs with secrecy, real estate people are unwilling to provide much information. By and large, brokers deal and do not tell. For example,

Michael Hirsch, vice-president of Amnivest Corporation in New York City, admitted he had sold 25,000 acres of farmland to foreign investors—but quickly added that Amnivest was no longer interested in making farm acquisitions for aliens. Later, two independent brokers described being called in to Amnivest because "the company heads are extremely anxious to locate farms for foreign investors."

The foreign investors themselves insist on anonymity. Some risk prison penalties for taking large sums of money out of their countries. Others fear that being publicly identified as persons of great wealth will make them targets for criminals and political zealots. A West Coast broker told of visiting an elite Spanish hunting club where the men had hunted together for 15 years—"yet not one of them knew that each of the others was my client. They just don't talk about it."

Silent purchases are facilitated by institutionalized investment vehicles. Much of the foreign money passes through either Credit Swisse or Deutsche Bank; through Bermuda, Bahamas, or Netherlands Antilles corporations if the source is Latin-American or European; or, if the source is Asian, through Hong Kong or Taiwan corporations. The American financial intermediaries used most often are Continental Illinois and Northern Trust.

Transactions are rarely conducted principal to principal. In one deal for a 2,500-acre Kansas farm, an unnamed West German investor contacted a Canadian realty firm, which contacted a Wyoming broker, who contacted a Chicago bank, which employed a statewide Kansas broker, who in turn found a local broker. As Tom Martin, president of the Anchor Mutual Investment Fund, says of the tangle of intermediaries, "Ten years ago a guy sitting in Frankfurt would've had trouble making a buy in total secrecy. Now it's a snap of the fingers."

American reaction to the unmonitored alien ownership of U.S. farmland varies. Businessmen stress the absolute prerogative of the free market economy. They point to the significance of creating a truly international world economic order, of maintaining an international cash flow, and of the tremendous value of American land investments abroad. "The internationalization of the world is as inevitable as it is necessary," intones broker Philip Dub, "and capital is the blood of the world's body, so it has to flow freely."

The real estate brokers argue that the hostile reaction of many farmers is xenophobic or, more bluntly, racist. After all, they note, a mere 3 percent of American farms change hands each year, and farmer-to-farmer sales account for 80 percent of all transactions. At this rate, how can foreigners ever own more than a sprinkling of American farms?

Farmers reply that foreign investors have collided head on with them and with their farming communities. In the first place, they say, the unlimited capital resources of alien investors have been pitted against the farmer's instinct for expansion in what amounts to an unfair dollar dogfight. "I waited thirty-five years for my neighbor to die so I could buy his farm," says Iowa farmer Mike Denis. "When he did, it cost me an arm, a leg, and the shirt off my back."

The combined effect of this expansionist instinct and of agricultural technology has transformed the basic unit of rural communities from the small family-owned farm into the large family-owned arm. Todays' corn and soybean operator, for instance, works an average of 1,000 acres, twice as much as he could cultivate 10 years ago. Farmers are very sensitive to the decline in the number of farms (from 4 million in 1960 to 2.8 million in 1976) and to the decrease in the farm population (from 15.6 million in 1960 to 8.9 million in 1975), for they fear a concentration of ownership. Ten years ago, the size of an average farm was 210 acres; in 1977 it is 310 acres. Any investor, therefore, who threatens to further concentrate farm ownership is naturally viewed with hostility.

Foreign investors not only concentrate farm ownership but operation as well. Once a foreigner purchases a farm, an independent management service—Doane's of St. Louis, Oppenheimer's of Kansas City—or a farming subsidiary of a bank is hired. These managers then employ area farmers who, because they are already farming large land tracts, possess sophisticated farming techniques and expensive equipment. In the event that an alien's acquisition lies in a newly developed area where large-scale farming has not been practiced, an experienced farmer from a different county or state is brought in.

Local farmers are angered by the fact that absentee foreign owners are not civic-minded. Virginia farmer Ace Rudder notes that "foreigners force out people who were on the bank board and church board. These people supported local businesses while foreigners buy cheap from big dealers. In fact, the only small business growing around here is the farm brokers. And foreigners don't practice conservation 'cause it's money they have to spend, and when it's not your living, people have short arms and deep pockets."

As to the charge of farmer racism, Harold Dodd, president of the Illinois Farmers Union, replies, "We are not against the foreign investor per se; we are against any large outside nonagricultural interests owning farmland. The biggest contributory factor to our being able to outproduce any country in the world [on the average, an American farmer feeds 57 people; a Soviet farmer feeds 7] is the structure of the family farming system, which has been a hallmark of our country since its inception."

Indeed, according to the U.S. Department of Agriculture, young families have been returning to the farm in sizable numbers. In the period from 1970 through 1975, the number of persons between the ages of sixteen and thirty-four who were self-employed in agriculture increased by about one-third over the preceding five-year period. Older farmers hope these young people will foster the regeneration of the smaller family farm, but they worry that the unlimited resources of foreigners will make it impossible for young farmers to buy quality farmland at reasonable prices.

Politicians regard foreign interest in U.S. farmland in terms of politics at home and of America's position in the world. "To date," says Iowa congressman James Leach, "statistics indicate foreigners probably do not own incredible quantities of American farmland, but the trend pointing violently in that direction potentially endangers our nation." There is a general feeling that the emergence of an international economic order might promise greater world peace and prosperity, but as long as nations regard one another with the evil eye of self-interest, each—including the United States—had better guard its precious resources.

The "politics of food," aggravated by a desperate world land shortage, is destined to become a critical international issue. American agriculture provides a balance-of-payments cushion for domestic politics in the United States, as well as political leverage in international relations. The Soviet Union, Japan, and other industrial nations cannot reduce agricultural imports without drastically affecting their food supply and their political stability. Thanks to the supremacy of its agricultural sector, the United States can always curtail imports in the event of foreign exchange difficulties. More than its thermonuclear power, America's "agripower" makes it a desirable ally and a force in the world.

Many states have statutes intended to prohibit or limit alien investment in farmland. At the federal level, there are three recently passed laws that are intended to facilitate the gathering of information about foreign investment. In the words of Senator Daniel Inouye (Dem.-Hawaii), "The lack of a national information base and of adequate data on agricultural land ownership have been recognized by the Congress. . . . " But as Washington tax lawyer Paul Toulouse comments wryly, "I can't see the ropes for the icopholes in any legislation concerning foreign investment; it's just too easy to veil ownership with intermediaries, local trusts, or corporations."

It is not reassuring to hear lawmakers and others express concern about being blindfolded by a lack of information at a policy crossroads. As Economic Research Service economist Gene Wunderlich says, "Land has sufficiently unique qualities to require separate attention in direct investment policy. America has a right, an immediate and possibly urgent right, to know who owns the land."

This is especially true in view of several ominous portents. Brokers admit they are beginning to receive numerous inquiries from farmers who want to sell to foreign investors because these buyers pay 40 percent down and in fact prefer to make all-cash purchases. (One retired broker in Arizona, a state that strictly prohibits alien ownership, says he might play a little less golf so he can respond to the inquiries he is getting each week.) Many real estate companies formerly unequipped to handle foreign investors are now feverishly preparing to enter the market. One particularly troubling sign is that in the past six months Amrex's Gerald Jackson, among others, has noted the first feelers from Middle Eastern holders of petrochemical dollars seeking American farmland.

Even without new real estate brokers and an inflow of OPEC money, foreign interest in and acquisition of American farmland is like a luxury car accelerating powerfully and noiselessly. The incentives, the mechanisms, and the capacities for investment feed the momentum. In a few decades of harvesting, if no limit is assigned, foreign investment in U.S. farmland could eclipse American ownership. Then American agriculture, the nation's single greatest source of power, would pass from the hands of American citizens.●

FEDERAL OVERREGULATION

HON. EDWARD J. DERWINSKI

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 26, 1978

● Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Speaker, during the last few weeks, we continue to hear of the weakening of the dollar abroad and reports of rising inflation rates, with evidence of growing grassroots irritation with the Government.

Very appropriately, Allan C. Brownfeld, in the July 6 issue of Anaheim (Calif.) Bulletin discusses the subject of Federal overregulation. The article follows:

FEDERAL REGULATION: ENEMY OF PEOPLE

(By Allan C. Brownfeld)

The American economy is in trouble. Our problems relate not only to inflation and unemployment, which are much discussed, but also to a serious decline in productivity. The standard of living of the average American is declining each year, and the average American home can no longer be afforded by the average American family. California voters expressed the growing national desperation over expanding government and increased taxes when they voted for Prop 13. Voters in other states appear prepared to take similar action.

What more and more Americans are coming to understand, in addition, is that government regulation of business has, rather than serving the "public interest" at which it was aimed, done serious harm to that interest.

In a volume which has just been published, Regulating Business: The Search For an Optimum (Institute for Contemporary Studies, 1978), this fact is made abundantly clear. The book is the result of a lecture series during the fall of 1977 conducted at the Graduate School of Management at Northwestern University. It is a thoughtful analysis of the many problems with government regulation—both of the older, industry-by-industry type (such as the Interstate Commerce Commission and the Civil Aeronautics Board) and the new—laws dealing with health, safety, and environment—which apply nationwide.

Government regulation may pull the GNP down six to seven per cent below capacity over the next decade, says Paul MacAvoy of Yale. He states that direct price controls now apply to ten percent of the GNP, while health and safety regulation take the control factor up to 30 percent, making regulation a major factor in all major corporate decisions.

Alfred E. Kahn, chairman of the Civil Aeronautics Board, explains the route to deregulation of the airline industry which he is now trying to implement. This includes free entry to markets, greater discount fares and decreased price regulation. It has taken Americans a long time to learn that airline regulation by government has served the airlines—not the people.

In perhaps the most important essay in the collection, Paul Weaver of Fortune magazine distinguishes between the old and new forms of regulation.

While the old industrywide regulation is the social policy of "populist" and "progressive" views of the turn of the century, which transformed the economy into the mixed corporate order we know now, the new regulation is committed to allegedly "humanistic" work and is generally hostile to economic accomplishments. Since this is the case, the economic costs of new regulation may be less a factor in discussing reform than the social policy which prompts them.

Weaver writes: "The New Regulation . . . is the social policy of the new class—that rapidly growing and increasingly influential part of the upper-middle class that feels itself to be in a more or less adversary posture vis-a-vis American society, and that tends to make its vocation in the public and not-for profit sectors. . . By means of its regulatory policy the new class is. . . bringing about what Murray Weidenbaum has called 'the second managerial revolution.' The first. . . involved the displacement of the old bourgeois class by the corporate managerial class. . . The second. . . is transferring power from the managerial class to the new class, and from quasi-public institutions to fully public ones—i.e., the government."

The "new regulators," Weaver declares, do not have the best interests of society in mind—and, in fact, are harming the majority of Americans by their policies. He says that they, "seem less interested in maximizing the overall health, safety, environmental and political costs of the modern capitalist order—which is a very different thing indeed, since liberal capitalism has itself brought about. . . large improvements in the health, safety, environment, and political life. . ."

"The real animus of the new class," Weaver writes, "is not so much against business or technology as against the liberal values served by corporate capitalism and the benefits these institutions provide to the broad mass of Americans: economic growth, widespread prosperity, material satisfactions. . . The real ire of the new class. . . are directed, not merely at those in business who (in Lewis Lapham's marvelous phrase) 'go around making things without permission,' but also, and perhaps especially, at the mass of Americans who go around doing and enjoying things without our permission."

Both our freedom and our economic well being are threatened by the growing power of government regulators. Once Americans understand this fact, perhaps a Prop. 14 can be fashioned to deal with it.●

WATER IN SOUTH DAKOTA

HON. LARRY PRESSLER

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 26, 1978

● Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. Speaker, South Dakota has a new Governor. I have sent the following letter to him on our water problems:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D.C., July 25, 1978.

Hon. HARVEY WOLLMAN,
State of South Dakota,
Pierre, S. Dak.

DEAR HARVEY: First of all, my warmest congratulations on your inauguration. Harvey, you have a unique opportunity to do something in our state concerning water that the rest of us have been struggling with. Your political motivations would not be questioned if you were to propose a modified Oahe plan. Also, you live near the project area, so you are in a unique position to know a great deal about it.

Harvey, you are in a unique position to break the Oahe deadlock. I am ready to support and cooperate with you in any way. Many authorizations in Congress are changed somewhat from the time that they are appropriated. Many authorizations are for twenty to thirty years. Obviously, things change. Twenty or thirty years ago, we did not have some of the farming techniques or some of the attitudes about saving prime agricultural land that we have today. We did not have the potential for the use of plastic pipe and plastic substance type pipes that we have today. Many other things have changed. Your unique position politically may strengthen your hand to lead our state to a modified water plan that will be acceptable. Harvey, I do not think our original Oahe plan can be built, but I do think that a modified version could be. There are some exciting possibilities—such as using some of the new plastic pipeline alongside railroad rights-of-way; partial pipelines; alongside-the-Missouri and alongside-the-canal irrigation; and other changes that could bring us a united plan.

It is my firmest belief that by the time appropriations come up again—next March or April—the South Dakota governor, the state legislature, and the local boards could have agreement on some sort of modified plan. If there would be one thing that we could achieve in the next six months, it would be to break the deadlock that exists between the local conservancy boards, the state legislature, and Congress. I am ready to work with you, I am available for meetings, and I want to help. I believe that water development is so important to South Dakota, and I know you share this belief.

I do think we have to look carefully at the use of pipeline alongside railroad rights-of-way, about things such as using the present pumping plant to fill the canal to Medicine Creek, and having one or two major pipelines, at that point, running along the railroad tracks to Huron—which is virtually downhill. We have to look at the possibility of canalside irrigation; of a revised land mitigation program; of alongside-the-Missouri irrigation; the James River addition; and the possibility of using pumps along the Missouri for short pipes that might run 50 to 100 miles immediately adjacent to the Missouri. But one ahing should be key—that is, getting water to our eastern cities, such as Aberdeen, Redfield, Huron and Mitchell.

If there is anything I can do to help, I certainly will. Our entire Congressional delegation has met tirelessly with the various local boards and members of the state legislature to try to break this deadlock. I just want to say that my staff and I are available, and will continue to work on it.

Although we are of different parties, I look forward to visiting with you soon about what we can do to come up with a modified plan, so that by next March or April our state can present a water delivery system plan to the James River Valley that will be workable.

We must also look at such things as the WEB pipeline. If we subsidize a pipeline as much as we talked about subsidizing a huge ditch, it makes the pipeline much cheaper in comparison. Also, we must recognize that the railroads need some revenue. The railroads have cranes to lay the pipe—this would require no purchase of additional lands. Some of the railroad track has already been abandoned. Even if it is not abandoned, the railroad owners tell me they have no objection to a water pipeline such as they do to a gas or oil pipeline because of the danger.

Harvey, I look forward to visiting with you soon. Good luck in your governorship. I am honored to be able to work with you. I am sending you a copy of the resolution I introduced in Congress last week asking that the Oahe authorization be preserved and expressing the sense of Congress that Congress would welcome modifications to the Oahe plan. I do think that we will be wearing the patience of Washington thin if we go beyond March or April of 1979. In the next six to eight months, we simply must come up with what our plan is, and get it approved by the state legislature and the local boards. That is my assessment of the situation.

If you have any advice for me, I stand ready to visit you at any time.

Sincerely,

LARRY PRESSLER,
Member of Congress.●

BALANCE(S) OF POWER SERIES—SOVIET INTENTIONS AND DOCTRINE I—(ii)

HON. JOHN BRECKINRIDGE

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 26, 1978

● Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. Mr. Speaker, on Friday I inserted into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the first part of an article entitled Soviet Military Doctrine and Strategy, by Dr. William Scott, appearing the summer 1975 Strategic Review. The conclusion of Dr. Scott's article follows:

II. MISUNDERSTANDINGS

The Soviet strategic nuclear forces deployed today are the result of decisions made in the early and mid-1960s. This is due to lead time—the period between the time the decision is made to produce a weapons system and the time of actual deployment of the system into operational units. For a major weapons system the lead time generally runs from five to ten years.

The continuity of Soviet military doctrine and strategy throughout the 1960s and into the early 1970s already has been shown. Since this was the period in which decisions were made that are responsible for the Soviet military posture in this post-SALT I period, it should be instructive to re-examine the interpretations given by Western analysts to these writings at the time in which they appeared. In other words, how well has the public of the United States been informed, on a timely basis, of the main currents of Soviet military thought?

THE KHRUSHCHEV ERA AND THE "DEBATE"

With hindsight, we now know that major discussions took place in the Soviet Union, beginning about 1957, concerning the nature of a future war and the role that might be played by the nuclear weapon. In 1958 these discussions were conducted as a series of seminars, attended by designated senior Soviet officers. The conclusion was reached that in a future war the nuclear weapon would be the decisive factor. This conclusion was accepted as the basis for the new military doctrine. The next step was to develop a strategy based on this doctrinal decision.

A series of papers, probably stemming from the 1958 seminar discussions, has been referred to in the Penkovsky Papers as the "Special Collection."[14] These gave various viewpoints concerning an optimum strategy for the utilization of the nuclear-rocket weapon. Contributions were made by the Minister of Defense, senior members of the General Staff, commanders of military districts, chiefs of military academies and military theorists at higher military schools. A number of these were published in Military Thought, the classified journal of the Soviet General Staff, beginning in 1960.[15]

Neither the discussions during the 1958 seminars, nor the articles from the "Special Collection," published in Military Thought, were internal "debates" of the type that had existed between the United States Navy and Air Force in the late 1940s and early 1950s.

Aided by the views presented in the "Special Collection," the Soviet political-military leadership then formulated a new strategy. This strategy had to meet the guidelines established by the new doctrine, which had been approved in the late 1950s. It is hypothesized that Marshal Sokolovskiy and a group of military theorists, a number of whom had contributed to the "Special Collection," were given the task of preparing an unclassified synthesis of the new strategy for presentation in a book, which could be used for study throughout the Soviet Armed Forces. This would account for the publication of Military Strategy,[16] which first appeared in 1962.

Military Strategy is a book about nuclear war, and describes how the Armed Forces, the industry and the entire Soviet population must be prepared for the eventuality of a nuclear conflict. There is little wonder that this book could not be taken literally in the United States. By the time Military Strategy was translated into English, detente was in vogue. Few analysts dared even suggest that the book outlined the requirements of the Soviet leadership to build a strategic nuclear force that in a decade would exceed that of the United States.

The explanation given, perhaps, was reasonable for the time in which the analysis was made. Various contributors to the book had highlighted different matters. Rereading the book today, however, discloses that there were no basic differences of opinion among the Soviet authors. But at the time analysts may have expected that the book would show a continuation of the "debates" of the 1950s. A prevalent Western opinion was that some sections reflected the "traditionalist" point of view which means favoring "balanced" forces, while other sections were the work of the "modernists," who placed major emphasis on nuclear weapons.

A second edition of Military Strategy, published in 1963, was hardly noticed in the West. The following year another major work, On Soviet Military Science,[17] appeared in Moscow bookstores. This work, if anything, was more "nuclear" in its emphasis than Military Strategy. However, before it was fully translated and analyzed, Nikita Khruschev was ousted.

Still, when the international climate of 1963–1964 is considered—signing of the nuclear test-ban treaty, establishment of the hot-line between Washington and Moscow and, finally, Khrushchev's removal in 1964—it is easy to understand why Soviet doctrinal writings were so misinterpreted at the time. In this period, following the Cuban Missile Crisis of 1962, there was a mood of detente in the United States. Most Western military analysts were finding it difficult to relate Soviet doctrinal writings to current events. They tended to concentrate on possible nuances in Soviet publications, seeking to find evidences of power struggles which might explain the uncompromising attitudes found in books such as Military Strategy. While so doing, they overlooked the basic thrust of Soviet doctrinal thought.

In 1968, when a third edition of Military Strategy appeared,[18] the authors were the same as had written the two earlier editions, except for one contributor who had died in the mid-1960s. This 1968 book was published as one of the Soviet "Officer's Library" series, nominated for the 1969 Frunze Prize, listed in various editions of the Soviet Calendar of a Soldier as recommended reading and referenced in the latest edition of the Bolshaya Soviet Encyclopedia.

Thus, the common interpretation made in 1963 that the first edition of Military Strategy represented a debate between opposing Soviet military groups called "modernists" and "traditionalists" simply has proven to be incorrect. On the contrary, all evidence indicates that this book represents a consensus concerning military strategy, not only within the Soviet Armed Forces, but within the political hierarchy as well.

Unfortunately, the idea of internal Soviet military debates so caught the fancy of many Western Sovietologists that the myth of the "modernists" and "traditionalists" has not been permitted to die. A number of Western analysts even continue to attempt to place specific Soviet officers in a "traditionalist" or "modernist" category—much to the amusement of the Soviet officers themselves.[19]

THE MYTH OF THE "RED HAWKS"

Another version of the "modernists" and "traditionalists" categorization of Soviet military-political leaders appeared in Western writings in 1966. This time it was the Soviet "hawks"—a designation which, as applied, had little connection then or now with the realities of the Soviet power structure.

"Detente," a term in vogue in 1975, was equally a favorite word in 1966. Khrushchev recently had been ousted, and many analysts in the West thought that international relations could return to normalcy. In particular, there was a prevalent belief that the new Soviet leadership would give much less attention to nuclear weaponry, and would accept United States ideas of mutual assured destruction.

In actual fact, as subsequent events and the SALT agreements testify, there was no change in Soviet military concepts. The weapons that Khrushchev started in research and development were produced and deployed during the Brezhnev era. However, in 1965 many Sovietologists thought there should be major shifts in Soviet military policies. As in 1963 with respect to Sokolovskiy's Military Strategy, United States Sovietologists in 1966 had difficulty in reconciling Soviet military writings with prevalent opinions and, perhaps more importantly, with official policies.

A rather brash article published in a Soviet military-political journal in September 1965, somehow tickled the fancy of a number of analysts in the West. The title of the article was "On the Nature of World Nuclear-Rocket War," written by Lt. Colonel Ye. I. Rybkin. This author stated that victory in nuclear war is possible, and presupposes that such a war can be fought and won by the Soviet Union. Any "a priori rejection of the possibility of victory is bad because it leads to moral disarmament, to disbelief in victory, to fatalism and passivity."[20]

Lt. Colonel Rybkin was associated with the Lenin Military-Political Academy. His advanced degree, Candidate of Philosophical Sciences, roughly equates to the Ph. D. in the United States and indicates that he is a student of Marxist-Leninist philosophy. Communist of the Armed Forces, the journal in which the article appeared, is the twice-monthly organ of the Main Political Administration of the Soviet Army and Navy. This Administration has the rights of a department under the Central Committee of the Communist Party, and serves as the Party's ideological watchdog over the Soviet Armed Forces. The Lenin Military-Political Academy is the top school for political officers within the Soviet military educational structure.

When "On the Nature of World Nuclear-Rocket War" was examined in the United States, a general conclusion was reached that Rybkin's views were contrary to those of supposedly more moderate elements of the Soviet military, as well as to those of the Party leadership. Rybkin was dubbed a "Red Hawk," attempting to sabotage the efforts of the new regime in maintaining good relations with the West.

Almost all analysts in the West seemingly overlooked the fact that articles and books published by the Soviet military press after 1965 continued to emphasize the concepts of military doctrine and strategy that had appeared during the Khrushchev regime. Also apparently overlooked was the role of the Lenin Military-Political Academy, and its responsibilities to the Central Committee of the Communist Party in ensuring the ideological purity of the Soviet Armed Forces.

In fact, any doubts concerning the nature of Soviet military doctrine and strategy should have been cleared up completely by the publication of an article, "On Contemporary Military Strategy," in April 1966.[21] This article, by the well-known Marshal Sokolovskiy and his frequent collaborator, General Major M. I. Cherednichenko, restated and updated the basic concepts found in the first two editions of Military Strategy. The same year Tactics,[22] the first book on this subject since 1941, continued to discuss nuclear warfare.

But the myth of the "Red Hawks" on the faculty of the Lenin Military-Political Academy continued. In December 1968, one of Colonel Rybkin's colleagues at the Academy, Lt. Colonel V. M. Bondarenko, published an article in the same journal which had carried Rybkin's article some two years previously. Bondarenko's article was entitled "The Modern Revolution in Military Affairs and the Combat Readiness of the Armed Forces"—the same article quoted earlier in this study as first explaining a modification to Soviet military doctrine. However, one noted columnist in the United States misinterpreted the purpose of the article and wrote of the "Concern Stirred by Seeming Rise of Soviet Military Over Civilians."[23] Another headlined: "Soviet Armed Forces Renew Fight Against Party Control."[24]

It is of interest that the Lenin Military-Political Academy is located on Moscow's Sadovoye Koltso, within less than a block of Gorkiy Street, opposite the Peking Hotel. It is within easy jogging distance of the dilapidated United States Embassy. Students frequently can be seen outside the building carrying their briefcases and having casual conversations. This is the most unlikely spot in Moscow to be a hotbed of activity plotting against the established order.

The idea of Rybkin, Bondarenko or any other faculty members of the Lenin Military-Political Academy representing a hardline military view in opposition to a more moderate Party view is contrary to fact. Officers in the Main Political Administration, such as Rybkin and Bondarenko, simply take Party-military approved views, and rewrite them in a Marxist-Leninist context for the training and indoctrination of all members of the Soviet Armed Forces.

Had there been any substance to the belief that Rybkin and Bondarenko were military dissidents, acting against the Party, surely their positions would have been altered over the past five or ten years. This has not been the case.

For example, in October 1973, Dzhermen Gvishiani, son-in-law of Premier Aleksey Kosygin, collaborated with Colonel Bondarenko to write a critical review [25] of the book, Science and Technology as an Instrument of Soviet Policy, which had been published by the Center for Advanced International Studies, University of Miami in 1972.

Also, in 1973 final burial to the myth of Rybkin and Bondarenko being "Red Hawks" should have been given by the publication of Scientific-Technical Progress and the Revolution in Military Affairs. Both were contributors to this work,[26] which was issued as one of the "Officer's Library" series, in the same manner as the 1968 edition of Military Strategy. Incidentally, General-Colonel N. A. Lomov, editor of the book, is a consultant to Dr. Georgiy Arbatov, Director of the Soviet Academy of Sciences' Institute of the USA

Despite all of the evidence of the unity of views of the Soviet poliitcal-military hierarchy concerning the basic tenets of military doctrine and strategy—and the lack of evidence of any disagreement—the myth of the "doctrinal debates" and the "Red Hawks" persists even in the post-SALT I period. Some newspaper columnists still attempt to portray the Party and military leadership as being involved in a struggle for power—discernible by reading between the lines in the open Soviet press!

II. CONCLUSIONS

The need for doctrine, so well expressed by Dr. Henry Kissinger in 1957, is well understood by the Soviet leadership. By 1962 this leadership had formulated both a military doctrine and a strategy for the nuclear age. Their basic concepts of military thought have not changed as a result of the nuclear confrontation in 1962, the nuclear test-ban agreement of 1963, the ouster of Khrushchev in 1964, the invasion of Czechoslovakia in 1968 or the signing of the SALT I agreement in 1972. As a French analyst noted as early as 1966, Soviet military theorists have "digested" the nuclear fact.[27]

Expressions of military doctrine and strategy are not confined to a few speeches by the military leadership, or a few books and articles in the military press. These same concepts can be found in the handbook of the Pioneers,[28] in textbooks used in universities, in books issued by the Academy of Sciences and in countless articles and books found in bookstores and newsstands throughout the entire Soviet Union.

Implementation of the concepts developed in the early 1960s now is demonstrated by the size and composition of the Soviet strategic nuclear forces, as specified in the SALT agreements. The number and capabilities of Soviet strategic weapon systems generally are known, and need no elaboration here. These same strategic concepts are reflected in the organization and weaponry of the Soviet Strategic Rocket Forces, Ground Forces, National Air Defense Forces, Air Forces and Navy.

However, as the record shows, little attention was given to these doctrinal writings by Western analysts throughout the 1960s. Most analysts in the United States appeared to ignore the content of these writings and, instead concentrated on attempts to read between the lines for nuances of meaning. The idea of "doctrinal debates" among "modernists," "traditionalists" and "centrists" was accepted by many Western Sovietologists. As there are "hawks" in the United States, so there must be "hawks" in the Soviet Union!

The general belief in the United States that "doctrinal debates" take place in the Soviet military press, and that groups and individuals can be identified as "traditionalists," "modernists," "hawks" and the like, have affected our perceptions of Soviet actions—and how to deal with them. Since there are hawks, there also must be doves, and the latter should be cultivated. In like manner, "the traditionalists," who support emphasis on conventional weapons, should be favored over the "modernists." If these specific groups are not supported at conferences and during negotiations on arms limitations, their positions might be weakened and the nuclear hawks could gain control.

This belief, in one form or another has existed for years. It is reported that during the thirties President Roosevelt was advised to support the demands of Joseph Stalin, else the hardline Soviet group would take over the Communist Party.

Those in the United States who coined the expressions of "modernists," "traditionalists," "hawks," and so forth produced a body of writings which in many academic circles still is followed. For a decade students at universities, service academies and war colleges have been taught a concept of Soviet military affairs which, on close analysis, falls apart. Many of these former students now are in positions of responsibility, working in areas such as SALT, MBFR and other aspects of arms control.

In all probability there are, of course, differences of opinion in the Soviet military leadership concerning matters of doctrine and strategy. Undoubtedly, there also are differences of opinion within the Politburo, and between some segments of the Politburo and the Ministry of Defense. However, only very, very rarely have differences of opinion concerning military matters been revealed in the open press.

Soviet strategic nuclear power today, combined with the changes in the "balance of forces in the world arena"—an expression frequently used by Soviet theorists—may bring about major modifications to Soviet military thought. If we are to do better in the future than we have in the past in analyzing and understanding these changes, more objective and deeper research of Soviet writings is essential.

Sputnik I caught the Western world completely by surprise. Afterwards, it was found that plans for this launching had been discussed, matter-of-factly, in Soviet scientific journals for at least a year before the event actually occurred. But few Western scientists at that time read them.

The constant build-up of Soviet strategic nuclear forces, as well as conventional forces, continues to surprise the political-military leadership in the West. This is the case despite the fact that the military doctrine and strategy that led to the creation of these forces were, and continue to be, explained in Soviet writings on almost a daily basis. A number of these writings now have been translated into English and are available to interested readers.[29]

There is a strange reluctance in the West to examine these Soviet writings in their totality. It is much easier to sit on the fence and speculate about what course the Soviets might take. A thorough analysis of Soviet publications on military matters, combined with known facts about Soviet weaponry, could present explanations of Soviet behavior that would be uncomfortable to study. Thus, in the marketplace, the myths still have a ready sale.

WHY NOT RESIGN?

HON. LARRY McDONALD

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 26, 1978

● Mr. McDONALD. Mr. Speaker, columnist William F. Buckley, Jr. is a person with whom I do not always see eye to eye, particularly on foreign affairs. However, Mr. Buckley wrote an interesting column recently that appeared in the Atlanta Journal of July 19, 1978 that effectively shredded most of Andrew Young's argument in which he compared his arrest 10 years ago in a garbage strike to that of the Soviet dissidents. And his conclusion is correct, Andrew Young should resign. The Buckley column follows:

WHY NOT RESIGN?

(By William F. Buckley, Jr.)

NEW YORK.—President Carter won't fire Andrew Young, for reasons so clearly political they at once remind us of the dishonors of democratic politics and that there are inherent flaws in the system no one is ready to correct:

But one is entitled to ask: Why doesn't Andrew Young resign? Every defense of Young ever published has remarked about him that he is a man of honor and sensitivity. If it were otherwise—if he were personally obnoxious, cynical, opportunistic—he would be left without a single defender.

The question to raise now is this: If he stays on, doesn't he risk the destruction of what personal reputation he has left? He should resign because he is not a representative of the view of the president of the United States, and because the views he continues to enunciate are much more than merely embarrassing to the people whose government pays his salary and provides him his podium.

But one is required to ask: Has Andrew Young lost that sense of balance which in other days would have prompted Andrew Young to resign—rather than submit, as he so ignominiously has done, to a public dressing-down by the secretary of state that would have brought a freshman in the foreign service to resign?

The most offensive feature of his statement to the French press was the comparison of his own experience with that of Ginzburg and Scharansky. On the day that Ginzburg was sentenced to eight years in what the Soviet Union calls a "special" labor camp, Andrew Young told the French reporter that "after all" there are "hundreds, perhaps even thousands of people whom I would call political prisoners" in jail in America. Let that go, even though it is both a lie and a defamation. Concentrate on the next sentence. "Ten years ago I myself was tried in Atlanta for having organized a protest movement."

What happened 10 years ago? Andrew Young was arrested, along with several others, for doing what? Asserting his rights as a black citizen? Defending the Supreme Court's decisions? No, he was routinely arrested for physically obstructing an emergency phalanx of Atlanta municipal workers instructed to remove garbage that had accumulated as a result of a strike by 800 garbage collectors over wages. There was as much political oppression involved in the arrest of Andrew Young as there'd have been if he had received a speeding ticket.

Alexander Ginzburg will be sent for the third time in 20 years to a labor camp. His sentence is for eight years. We know a great deal about the hierarchy of Soviet prison camps thanks to very recent testimony from Anatoly Marchenko. The camp to which Mr. Ginzburg will be sent, for the offense of affirming the rights of Soviet citizens as guaranteed under their own constitution, allows each inmate one visitor per year—but only after serving half the sentence. That is to say, in Ginzburg's case no visitors for the first four years. He is permitted one food-and-clothing parcel per year. And—supreme torture—one letter per year. For Andrew Young to compare his own experience with that of Ginzburg is a profanation that makes Earl Butz's racist jokes a tushery by comparison.

Andrew Young began his career at the U.N. by welcoming Cuban forces to stabilize Africa, even as in the past there were individual Americans who welcomed the Ku Klux Klan to stabilize the Reconstruction South.

He arrived in Africa giving the Black Power salute, thus identifying himself with a movement even Eldridge Cleaver disdains. He has now suggested that Ian Smith—whom he once called "similar" to Idi Amin—was the engineer of the mutilations of the missionaries in Rhodesia. His incontinence causes more than embarrassment. It causes pain to those who are concerned for the preservation of the faculties of ethical discrimination. And, as I say, the only remaining question is whether he has left the dignity to resign.—(c1978.)

It was further interesting to read in the Washington Post of July 19, 1978, in the Evans and Novak column, which stated in part:

While Young is unforgiving about right-wing dictatorships, he is lenient toward communist tyranny. This climaxed in May 1977 in Mozambique, a Marxist regime with 100,000 citizens in forced-labor camps. "East and West alike look to this nation with new hope and with new courage," Young said. While welcoming communist Vietnam into the United Nations by praising its "struggle for independence", he ignored repression and genocide in the new Indochina.

Going along further in the Evans and Novak column, a quote was given from a Carl Gershman, executive director of the Social Democrats who said:

Young finds himself today for the most part on the side not of the oppressed but of the oppressors.

And this is the crux of the problem exactly. Mr. Young always seems to find a way to speak for the oppressors and not the oppressed. How long, I ask, must the American people put up with such dangerous nonsense?●

SENATE COMMITTEE MEETINGS

Title IV of the Senate Resolution 4, agreed to by the Senate on February 4, 1977, calls for establishment of a system for a computerized schedule of all meetings and hearings of Senate committees, subcommittees, joint committees, and committees of conference. This title requires all such committees to notify the Office of the Senate Daily Digest—designated by the Rules Committee—of the time, place, and purpose of all meetings when scheduled, and any cancellations or changes in meetings as they occur.

As an interim procedure until the computerization of this information becomes operational the Office of the Senate Daily Digest will prepare this information for printing in the Extensions of Remarks section of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on Monday and Wednesday of each week.

Any changes in committees scheduling will be indicated by placement of an asterisk to the left of the name of the unit conducting such meetings.

Meetings scheduled for Thursday, July 27, 1978, may be found in Daily Digest of today's RECORD.

SENATE—Thursday, July 27, 1978

(Legislative day of Wednesday, May 17, 1978)

The Senate met at 10 a.m., on the expiration of the recess, and was called to order by Hon. ROBERT C. BYRD, a Senator from the State of West Virginia.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. The distinguished Senator from Missouri (Mr. DANFORTH) will offer the prayer.

PRAYER

The Reverend JOHN C. DANFORTH, a Senator from the State of Missouri, offered the following prayer:

As You reminded Your servant Job, O God, we were not present when You laid the foundation of the Earth. We did not shut in the sea or command the morning and cause the dawn to know its place. We have not entered into the springs of the sea or walked in the recesses of the deep. The gates of death have not been revealed to us. We do not know the ordinances of the heavens, and we cannot establish their rule on Earth.

Grant us, O God, a measure of humility, that we may understand our own limitations and the limits of the work we do. Teach us, as You did the sons of Zebedee, that whoever would be great must be a servant. And give us the energy to persevere in our efforts, making modest contributions where we can, and trusting that all our positive gains are completed by You in Your heavenly kingdom. Amen.

APPOINTMENT OF ACTING PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will please read a communication to the Senate from the President pro tempore (Mr. EASTLAND).

The legislative clerk read the following letter:

U.S. SENATE,
PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE,
Washington, D.C., July 27, 1978.

To the Senate:

Under the provisions of rule I, section 3, of the Standing Rules of the Senate, I hereby appoint the Honorable ROBERT C. BYRD, a Senator from the State of West Virginia, to perform the duties of the Chair.

JAMES O. EASTLAND,

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD thereupon assumed the chair as Acting President pro tempore.

SENATE MINISTERS

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. For the benefit of our guests in the galleries, the Senator who offered today's prayer was Senator DANFORTH, the junior Senator from Missouri, who is an ordained minister. Yesterday the opening prayer was offered by Senator HODGES, of Arkansas, who is also an ordained minister.

RECOGNITION OF LEADERSHIP

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Tennessee.

THE JOURNAL

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Journal of the proceedings of the Senate be approved to date.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

RECOGNITION OF LEADERSHIP

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DECONCINI). The Senator from West Virginia is recognized.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I have no need for my time.

THE COAL CONVERSION CONFERENCE REPORT

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I see the distinguished Senator from New Mexico is in the Chamber at this time. In keeping with the conversation that he and I had previously relating to a conference report, I yield to him at this time so he may address certain inquiries to the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. SCHMITT. Mr. President, I submit an inquiry to the Chair regarding the status of the coal conversion bill, which was before the Senate starting about 2 weeks ago. There seemed to be some urgency in its consideration, which this Senator did not feel at that time. I wonder if that bill has, in fact, been enrolled and sent to the House of Representatives.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Senator is referring to the conference report, not the bill, it was messaged to the House this morning.

Mr. SCHMITT. It was sent to the House this morning?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. SCHMITT. Mr. President, I wonder if the distinguished majority leader would have any indication to give this Senator as to when the House would act on the conference report.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I do not have any indication, no.

Mr. SCHMITT. It would seem that, through appropriate channels, action could be forthcoming. Since the Senate was enjoined to act promptly on the bill, I feel somewhat responsible for having slowed us down a little bit. I hope action will occur at the earliest possible time. I did have some responsibility for a few days of delay.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Does the Senator expect me to respond?

Mr. SCHMITT. I would appreciate some assurance that the distinguished majority leader would use his good offices to see that the House acted at a fairly responsible and rapid pace.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I should say to the Senator I was once a Member of that body. It is the feeling over there that they do not need any advice from this body as to how they conduct their business. I think we probably have the same feeling in return. I am sorry I cannot encourage the distinguished Senator in his suggestion that I might be able to speed matters up a bit on the other side. I have my hands more than full in trying to keep things moving over here.

Mr. SCHMITT. I understand. It is just unfortunate that with the urgency that the Senate feels about these matters, that there is not that feeling of urgency in the other body. I would hope that that sense of urgency could be transmitted either by our words or in some other manner. There are a number of matters which are coming forward which I do believe have urgency, including the energy conference reports. Without that sense of urgency in the other body it will be difficult, I believe, to hope for action over here.

I appreciate having had this colloquy, and I know the Senator will do everything he can.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I hope the Senator does not indicate by what he has just stated that we may expect to see further delays in this body. We have to do what we have to do, as we see our duty. The House does have its responsibility. The public will hold them accountable for their sins and the public will hold us accountable for ours. I would just hope we would keep ours clear so we do not have to be so penitent to all.

Mr. SCHMITT. To complete my remarks, I would like to say that measures can often be enacted quickly which are not completely understood.

It is certainly not this Senator's intention to cause any delay which is unnecessary. I think sometimes a pause is necessary in order to better understand what the Senate is about to do, even though the outcome may be absolutely certain.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. As the Apostle Paul said, "Be still and know."

Mr. SCHMITT. I have found that the Apostles have been very generous, and I hope that throughout the upcoming debates they will not be depriving us——

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I am not sure it was the Apostle Paul. It may have been Psalms.

Mr. BAKER. Mindful, of course, Mr. President, that this is my time in which this lecture in theology is being conducted, I might intervene only long enough to say that this matter was brought to my attention by the distinguished Senator from New Mexico, who did play a part in the bulk of the debate on the coal conversion conference report.

I think he is entirely within his rights to inquire about the sudden "dishaste" in this matter. I do recall that we proceeded to the consideration of this privileged matter, the coal conference report; that there was a degree of criticism, I believe, in the popular press of the distinguished Senator from New Mexico for taking a day or two to discuss it.

Then, Mr. President, I found out this morning, to my surprise I must confess, that the conference report, after it was acted upon by the Senate, was not enrolled and sent to the House until today.

I might ask the Chair if that is correct.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct. The Senate did not message its action back to the House until today. It will not be enrolled until both Houses have acted.

Mr. BAKER. It was not enrolled, but it was not transmitted to the House until this morning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

Mr. BAKER. How much time elapsed between the time the conference report was adopted by the Senate and the time it was transmitted to the House?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Approximately 9 days.

Mr. BAKER. A parliamentary inquiry: What, if any, rule or precedent controls the time at which conference reports or messages to the House are transmitted to the other body?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is no rule or precedent that governs such matters.

Mr. BAKER. What has been the practice of the Senate in that respect?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Usually reports will go within a day or two.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I shall not pursue this matter further except to say when it was brought to my attention by the distinguished Senator from New Mexico, it struck me that was an extraordinarily long time to intervene between the time the Senate acted and the time the message was sent to the House of Representatives, in view of the emergency nature of the matter, as described by many of us, including me.

While there is no rule or precedent of the Senate that bears directly on this subject, I hope if there is going to be a delay in the future, the parties might be apprised of it, particularly those who are extensively involved in the matter itself.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I suggest that there be no delay in the future so those who may be opposed to a conference report may not use that as an excuse for delay. I do not mean any inferences to be drawn from my having said that, but I think it is good practice, I think it is good protection for all of us. I suggest that those matters be expedited in the future without any delay.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will note the comment of the Senator from Tennessee and the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. SCHMITT. If the Senators will yield, I agree wholeheartedly with the two leaders. The only reason this matter is under discussion is because I happen to be involved in it. Even though I voted in opposition to its passage, once that passage occurred, I think it is clearly the business of the Senate to see that these bills, or conference reports, or whatever measure happens to be before us are transmitted expeditiously to the other body. Once the battle is over, once the vote has been taken, then it is the business of the Senate to see that the business of the people is conducted efficiently. I am sure that will now occur. I hope it will more or less set a precedent for the rapid transmittal of these messages.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. SCHMITT. I am happy to yield.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I think the Senator from New Mexico has performed a service. I can see from his standpoint why he expresses his concern in this regard. I do not say this as a criticism of anyone on the staff of the Senate. They have other pressing business, also. So without any criticism intended, I can see how the Senator would wonder why there would be such a delay in a matter on which the leadership wanted action promptly.

Looking at it from the standpoint of the leadership, and I have already asked that this situation be corrected in the future, I think as I see it, it is our duty to act on conference reports, not in haste but after reasonable deliberation, without regard for the time or the number of days that may be required to get the message over to the House. I do not think that has anything to do with the scheduling of a conference report here or when the Senate should complete its action. I think it has absolutely nothing to do with that. But I agree with the Senator that, once the conference reports have been adopted, in consideration of all the workload the appropriate people have, the matter should be expedited as much as possible.

Mr. SCHMITT. I am glad to hear those comments. I just say that when the argument of haste and immediate necessity and emergency is used in order to argue for expeditious handling of the measure in the Senate, it is incumbent on the Senate as a body to see that these measures are transmitted to the other body as rapidly as possible. I think we all understand that.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of my time.

VITIATION OF SPECIAL ORDER

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senator from New Mexico (Mr. DOMENICI) is to be recognized for not to exceed 15 minutes.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that that order be transmitted to Mr. PROXMIRE. I understand that Mr. DOMENICI did not want time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Senator from Wisconsin is recognized.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I thought the Senator from Wisconsin wanted some time.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I was going to call up the New York conference report.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for recognition of Mr. DOMENICI be vitiated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HATHAWAY). Without objection, it is so ordered.

PRIVILEGE OF THE FLOOR

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, we are waiting for members of the staff to come to the floor on the New York City conference report. While doing that, I have some other business I should like to transact.

I ask unanimous consent that John Daniels, John Collins, Howard Menell, Ken McLean, and Elinor Bachrach be granted the privilege of the floor during discussion, debate, and vote on the New York City conference report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I also ask unanimous consent that a member of the staff of Senator ALLEN, Richard Gentry, be granted the privilege of the floor during consideration of the conference report on H.R. 12426.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be a brief period for the transaction of routine morning business for not to exceed 15 minutes, with statements therein limited to 5 minutes each.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

WICKER ARTICLE POINTS TO THE NEED FOR THE GENOCIDE CONVENTION

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, on Sunday, July 23, New York Times columnist Tom Wicker reviewed this country's human rights policy. Mr. Wicker discussed both the successes and failures of the administration's and the Congress' efforts to secure universal human rights. He reminded us that our human rights policy has not significantly affected rightwing terrorist activities in Buenos Aires, nor have we substantially ameliorated conditions in Brazil, Chile, and a host of other nations. Many of the world's people are still oppressed and persecuted merely because of their race, ethnicity, religious, or political beliefs.

Conversely, Mr. Wicker asserted that there is an improved world "climate of human rights." He cited several notable events which can be attributed to the United States' active advocacy of human rights. While causal links between improved human rights and U.S. policy cannot always be documented, our human rights activism has certainly influenced world opinion and events. Particularly in recent months, our policy has become more consistent and more effective. Last week, the Inter-American Court of Human Rights was formally established. The U.S. Export-Import Bank recently rejected a $270 million loan to Argentina because of the South American country's flagrant violations of human rights. And the government of Indonesia recently released 10,000 political prisoners.

After weighing our accomplishments and our failures, Mr. Wicker concluded that our human rights policy has been a "modest success."

Mr. President, in the vital arena of human rights we cannot afford a "modest success." The lives and fortunes of millions of people are constantly threatened by those who violate human rights with impunity. Our foreign policy must be comprehensive and vigorous. It must reflect our nationwide commitment to universal human rights.

Mr. President, this Senate can act to make our human rights policy much more successful. We can ratify the United Nations Genocide Convention. By defining and punishing the crime of genocide, the United Nations treaty protects the most fundamental of human rights—the right to live. It helps to guarantee that every citizen of the world can live securely.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a copy of Mr. Wicker's article be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A MODEST SUCCESS

(By Tom Wicker)

WASHINGTON, July 21.—The vote of Grenada finally brought into being this week an Inter-American Court of Human Rights that has been nine-years in winning hemisphere approval. A day or so later, Argentina learned that the United States Export-Import Bank had turned down a $270-million loan for electrical equipment for a hydroelectric project on the upper Parana River. And in the same week, a Bolivian election was annulled by a court, only to be followed by a military coup.

At least one connecting link between all these events was President Carter's human rights policy. There are those who think that policy is pushed too erratically—not hard enough against strategically important allies like South Korea and perhaps too hard for the good of Soviet dissidents like Anatoly Shcharansky. But after a year and a half, and despite setbacks like the Bolivian coup, the Carter human rights policy has had its modest successes, too.

Some of those most involved in that policy think its major achievement has been an improved world "climate of human rights." Just recently, the Council on Hemispheric Affairs, in releasing a country-by-country assessment of human rights in the Americas, expressed some reservations about the Administration's performance, but concluded:

"The Carter Administration, through its human rights policy, has made a significant contribution to the cause of humanity in the hemisphere. . . . We have now entered a period where no totalitarian regime can victimize its own people with impunity or in silence."

The United States' signature in June 1977 finally led the way toward the necessary ratifications—Grenada's was the 11th and deciding vote—on the hemispheric court of human rights; whether Congress will now ratify what President Carter signed remains to be seen. Argentina's dismal record on human rights, the worst in the hemisphere—more than 3,500 acknowledged political prisoners and probably at least that many more unacknowledged—evoked the Ex-Im Bank's refusal to make the $270-million loan. And human rights pressures from Washington and elsewhere were pushing Bolivia toward a return to civilian rule, until the latest military coup turned back the clock.

Nor is it only in this hemisphere that the human rights policy is being felt. When President Mobutu of Zaire recently declared an amnesty for political prisoners, including a former foreign minister, he was completing his end of an arrangement worked out when the United States agreed to ferry French troops into Shaba Province to repel last spring's Katangese invaders.

And although nobody in Washington claims specific credit, it seems likely that the improved "climate of human rights" had something to do with Indonesia's recent release of 10,000 political prisoners—although there are at least 20,000 more in Indonesian jails. But one obvious and probably effective human rights move—an American embargo on Ugandan coffee—has not yet been taken by the Carter Administration.

It is among the nations of this hemisphere, nonetheless, where the human rights policy has been most heavily felt. Direct cause and effect of course are not always traceable but it's reasonable to suppose, for example, that elections were held in Peru and Ecuador sooner than they might have been without human rights pressures. The improved "climate" certainly influenced the military to abide by the results of elections in the Dominican Republic.

The liberalization of the Pinochet regime in Chile, though far from complete, has been measurable; and when an American grand jury hands down expected indictments in the assassination in Washington of former Chilean Foreign Minister Orlando Letelier, they may so link the killing to the Chilean Government as to endanger General Pinochet's personal position atop the military junta. And almost any conceivable successor, it's believed here, would be more concerned for human rights than he has been.

Notable progress also has been made in Brazil where, after 14 years of military rule, a "back to the barracks" movement is said to be gathering force in the army and among those who originally welcomed authoritarian government and long supported it. But for all these gains, the coup in Bolivia and the situation in Argentina serve to underscore the warnings of human rights activists here that the task has hardly begun, even in this hemisphere.

Amnesty International estimates that as many as 15,000 people have disappeared in Argentina since the military coup of March 1976. Dr. Oscar Alende, a former Governor of Buenos Aires, visited the United States recently and said 1,000 people have died by right-wing terrorist action this year, probably with police connivance. Religious freedom has been canceled and seven secret prison camps, according to Dr. Alende, are full to overflowing. And although Gen. Jorge Rafael Videla officially becomes President on Aug. 1, in a seeming step toward the rule of law, the expectation here is for continuing repression and violence.

ORDER OF PROCEDURE

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, may I just say to the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin, who will be managing the conference report with the assistance of the ranking member (Mr. TOWER), the Senator from Virginia (Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR.) called me this morning. He is in a hearing, perhaps on the markup on a bill. Anyhow, he is in committee, cannot be on the floor at this time, and he will want an hour for himself on the conference report.

So I merely say this so that the Senator from Wisconsin will be aware of that fact and that the Senator from Virginia will be protected before we act finally on the conference report.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I understood Senator BYRD was very interested in being on the floor. Of course, I will be happy to accommodate him.

Could the leader give us some idea when Senator BYRD will be able to come to the floor?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I told the Senator we would be taking the conference report up at circa 10 o'clock. He wanted to be protected for noon. I told him I did not think that the conference report would go that long without his being on the floor, but that he would be protected, which indicated to me that it may be 11:30 or 12 before he gets here.

Mr. TOWER. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Yes.

Mr. TOWER. I am the ranking minority conferee on the military procurement bill and I would like to treat this matter with some dispatch.

I wonder if we could find out who wants to speak on this matter and for how long, and, if necessary, if the principals cannot be here, postpone consideration until later in the day?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I had hoped we might be able to get the health planning bill up in the event we reached a gap. Senator MORGAN is on his way and he will want to address this issue. He is on his way to the floor. Senator MOYNIHAN will also wish to speak and he will be on the floor presently, or shortly.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I am sure Senator JAVITS will want to speak.

Mr. TOWER. I would be amazed if Senator JAVITS did not want to speak.

[Laughter.]

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. There will be enough Senators, I would imagine, at this point, to hold the floor for a while until, I hope, Senator BYRD can come to the floor.

Mr. PROXMIRE. In the event we have finished with our speaking and are ready to act on it, I assume we will lay the bill aside until Senator BYRD can come to the floor and speak, is that right?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Yes. That will be all we can do.

If the Senator will notify me if we reach that point, I will be in my office and will try to give assistance.

Mr. TOWER. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HODGES). The clerk will call the roll.

The second assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

NEW YORK CITY FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE ACT OF 1978—CONFERENCE REPORT

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senate will now proceed to the consideration of the conference report on H.R. 12426, which will be stated.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 12426) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to provide financial assistance for the city of New York, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses this report, signed by a majority of the conferees.

(The conference report is printed in the House proceedings of the RECORD of July 18, 1978.)

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, the purpose of this legislation is to assist New York City in meeting its financing needs and restructuring its debt over the next 4 years, by providing Federal guarantees of New York City securities under certain conditions. By the time the guarantee program expires on June 30, 1982, it is expected that the city will have a budget balance in accordance with generally accepted accounting principles and will be able to meet all of its financing needs in the public credit markets, without any further reliance on Federal credit assistance.

Mr. President, as I have made it clear in the course of this legislation and in voting on it, I am fundamentally opposed to this legislation because I believe it is not needed. I think New York City could have and would have made it on its own, with the support of its financial institutions and its pension funds, if the Congress had chosen not to act. Nonetheless, a majority of the Members of both Houses of Congress have voted to provide additional financial assistance to New York City. The conference report reconciling the differences in the bills passed by the House and Senate was approved in the House of Representatives Tuesday and is pending before this body today.

Mr. President, I believe that this conference report is one which Members of the Senate can support. It contains virtually all of the significant provisions of the Senate-passed bill, including a number of additional conditions and requirements designed to insure that New York City balances its budget, gets back in the credit markets, and repays the guaranteed obligations as rapidly as possible. There was a compromise reached with the House on the major differences between the two bills, but that compromise reflects the general thrust of the Senate position and should, I believe, be acceptable to Members of the Senate.

The main points at issue with the House in the conference on this legislation concerned the amount and type of guarantee authority to be provided and the various limitations to be placed on that guarantee authority.

The Senate bill provided guarantees of up to $1.5 billion in aggregate principal amount. The House bill provided up to $2 billion in guarantees of principal plus accrued interest. It was difficult to determine the amount of principal which could be guaranteed under the House formulation; estimates ranged from over $1.9 billion down to less than $1 billion, depending on the assumptions made.

The conference report provides guarantees of up to $1.65 billion in aggregate principal amount. This is somewhat higher than the amount provided in the Senate bill, but well below the $2 billion in guarantees of principal originally requested by the administration, and arguably below the amount provided in the House bill. Moreover, it should be noted that the guarantees are to be available on a standby basis, to be used only if the city is unable to obtain sufficient credit elsewhere, and it is unlikely that all of the $1.65 billion in guarantees authorized will actually be used.

The Senate bill provided guarantees for long-term financing only, as requested by the administration. The House bill permitted the guarantees to be used for either long-term or short-term "seasonal" financing, with the understanding that the guarantee authority backing the seasonal borrowings, which mature within a year, could then be used again for long-term financing later on.

Mr. President, there was a great deal of discussion of this issue in the conference committee. I was extremely reluctant to recede from the Senate's position and to provide guarantees for seasonal as well as long-term financing. The Banking Committee was told time and time again by experts from New York and by the administration that the city could do its own seasonal financing if long-term guarantees were forthcoming, and I believed it would be a step backward for the city to become dependent on the Federal Government for both long-term and seasonal financing.

However, there was a great deal of concern on the part of the House conferees that New York City might not be able to obtain all of the seasonal financing it needs from the various local sources because of possible limitations that might be imposed on the city pension funds legal capacity to invest in city securities by legislation now pending before the Finance and Ways and Means Committees. This legislation would provide exemptions from certain provisions of the Internal Revenue Code for the city and State pension funds, and these exemptions are needed to enable the pension funds to participate in the financing arrangements contemplated by the guarantee legislation. Having discussed the questions raised in conference with members of the Finance Committee, notably the distinguished Senator from Texas (Mr. BENTSEN), who was most helpful on this matter, I believe that the tax-writing committees are aware of the potential problems and that these problems are likely to be resolved in a satisfactory manner.

However, I could understand the concerns expressed by the House conferees and by city officials that the city not be impeded from meeting its seasonal financing needs, given the time constraints involved and the uncertainties about the tax legislation, and therefore some accommodation with the House seemed in order.

The conference report contains a compromise on this issue which provides the possibility of some guarantees of seasonal financing, but only to a very limited extent and under strict conditions. First, it confines the availability of such guarantees to the first year of the guarantee program only, fiscal year 1979, when they are most likely to be needed. Second, it limits the amount of seasonal guarantees which can be provided to a maximum of $325 million. Third, it permits such guarantees to be provided only if, and to the extent that, the full amount of seasonal financing which the city needs in that year—over and above commitments from other private sources and anticipated public note sales—cannot be provided on an unguaranteed basis by the city pension funds due to limitations which may be imposed by the legislation now pending before the Finance and Ways and Means Committees.

This means that the Secretary must first determine that the city pension funds have exhausted their legal capacity to do seasonal financing for the city, by purchasing or agreeing to purchase short-term notes up to the full amount permitted under the prospective tax legislation. Then, if the Secretary determines further that the city has additional seasonal financing needs and that its capacity to meet those needs from other private sources or from the public credit markets has also been exhausted, he may issue guarantees for the remaining amount of seasonal financing needed, so long as that amount does not exceed $325 million.

Mr. President, I think it is unlikely that this seasonal guarantee authority will be used; I do not think it will be needed. The city recently reported that it had about $1 billion in cash on hand at the beginning of this fiscal year, July 1, 1978. The estimates of peak seasonal financing needs have now been reduced to $975 million, down from $1.2 billion, and the city intends to try to sell some $200 to $300 million in short-term notes in the public markets later on this fall. So I think we will find that New York City can, in fact, do its own seasonal financing, and I believe this is the best way for the city to go. But the seasonal guarantee authority is there as a backup this year, in case problems arise.

Mr. President, let me continue to describe the compromise reached with the House, as reflected in this conference report.

The Senate bill contained some significant limitations on the guarantee authority, which were intended to provide a basis for effective congressional oversight of the guarantee program. These included annual limitations on the amount of guarantees to be provided and authorization of a one-House veto of the guarantee authority for the second and third years of the program, fiscal years 1980 and 1981. The House bill contained no such limitations.

I am pleased to state that the conference report includes annual limitations and one-House vetoes along the lines of those provided in the Senate bill, but with some amendments including changes in the dollar amounts. Under the conference substitute, there is guarantee authority available for fiscal year 1979 in an amount not to exceed $750 million, of which up to $500 million is available for long-term guarantees, and up to $325 million is available for guarantees of seasonal financing, subject to the limitations described above. In fiscal year 1980, there is new guarantee authority provided in an amount not to exceed $250 million, plus the carryover of any unused portion of the $750 million in guarantee authority provided in fiscal year 1979, all of which may only be used for guarantees of long-term financing, and all of which is subject to a one-House veto. In fiscal year 1981, there is new guarantee authority of $325 million, plus the carryover of any unused portion of the $1 billion in guarantee authority provided in fiscal years 1979 and 1980, except for any amounts disapproved through passage of a one-House veto, all of which may only be used for guarantees of long-term financing, and all of which is subject to a one-House veto. In the final year of the program, fiscal year 1982, there would be new long-term guarantee authority provided in an amount not to exceed $325 million, only if the Secretary determines that the city has presented a budget balanced in accordance with generally accepted accounting principles. Furthermore, there is to be available the carryover of any unused portion of the $1.325 billion in long-term guarantee authority provided in the 3 prior fiscal years, except for any amounts which have been disapproved through passage of a one-House veto.

Mr. President, let me mention some other features of the guarantee program, as decided in the conference report. The length of the guarantees could run as long as 15 years in all cases. The obligations guaranteed can be sold only to the State and city pension funds. In setting this latter requirement, the conferees wished to confine narrowly any precedent set by this legislation with respect to other cities. Along similar lines, the conferees also agreed to a provision contained in the House bill making the interest on the guaranteed obligations taxable for the life of the guarantee, so as not to set a precedent for Federal guarantees of tax-exempt municipal obligations. However, this provision is not intended to set any precedent with respect to the taxability of municipal obligations generally.

Mr. President, the conference report establishes a number of conditions of eligibility which the Secretary must determine has been met and are being met on a continuing basis before he can provide guarantees or enter into commitments to provide guarantees at any time under this legislation. These conditions and the required determinations by the Secretary can be summarized as follows:

First. There must be a reasonable prospect of repayment of the guaranteed city indebtedness.

Second. The Secretary must determine that credit is not available elsewhere in amounts and terms sufficient to meet the city's financing needs.

Third. The interest rate on the guaranteed indebtedness must be reasonable, taking into consideration current average market yields on other guaranteed obligations.

Fourth. The Secretary must determine that the city's remaining long-term and seasonal borrowing needs over the 4 years of the guarantee program—other than those assisted under the program—will be met through commitments from the State, an agency of the State, private sources, or through public credit markets, in amounts which will be sufficient to enable the city to meet all of its long-term and seasonal borrowing needs through public credit markets after the guarantee program expires on June 30, 1982, assuming that all the other conditions are and will be fulfilled.

Fifth. The city, under the supervision of the independent fiscal monitor, must adopt and adhere to budgets balanced in accordance with generally accepted accounting principles for fiscal year 1982 and thereafter, and must make substantial progress toward that goal in accordance with accounting principles established under State law in the intervening years, fiscal years 1979, 1980, and 1981. The city must also submit plans for bringing all its expenditures other than capital items into balance with its revenues according to the relevant accounting principles, and there must be annually submitted 4-year plans.

Sixth. The independent fiscal monitor must demonstrate that it has the authority to control the fiscal affairs of the city for the entire period during which the guarantees are outstanding.

Seventh. There must be annual independent audits of the city's financial statements and an audit committee established consisting of the mayor, the city comptroller, the president of the city council, two individuals with expertise in municipal finance, and two officers or employees of two different firms of independent public accountants not already engaged by the city.

Eighth. There are two conditions defining certain State responsibilities under the act. One requires the State to maintain its financial assistance to the city in at least the amount provided in the city's 1979 fiscal year until such time as the city has a budget balanced in accordance with generally accepted accounting principles. The other requires the State to have on deposit in a reserve fund an amount equal to 5 percent of the principal of and of 1 year's interest on the guaranteed indebtedness outstanding, and this State money must be used first to pay or reimburse the Treasury for paying in the event of a default, up to the full amount available in the fund. In addition to giving the State a larger stake in preventing default, this State reserve fund will provide the Federal Government further security against losses due to default, along with the security already afforded by the authority to withhold Federal payments to the city or State to cover losses.

Ninth. The city is required to establish a productivity council to develop and seek to implement ways to increase city employee productivity.

Tenth. The city is required to make public offerings of its short-term notes in fiscal years 1980, 1981, and 1982, and of its long-term bonds in fiscal years 1981 and 1982.

Eleventh. The city must agree that, after the guarantee program ends, it will devote 15 percent of the net proceeds of city indebtedness issued in the public credit markets in each fiscal year to repaying or refunding the guaranteed obligations outstanding, unless the Secretary modifies or waives this requirement because he determines that its application would either impair the city's ability to meet its essential capital needs or substantially overburden the market for long-term city bonds. In addition, the city must implement, under the direction of the Secretary, a general program for refunding the guaranteed obligations outstanding for the purpose of achieving complete repayment of them at the earliest practicable date.

Twelfth. The Secretary must determine that the city and State are meeting their respective obligations under the conditions of eligibility section.

In addition, the Secretary is authorized to set other terms and conditions bearing on any of the parties involved, at his direction.

Mr. President, the details and intent of these conditions of eligibility are amply described in the joint explanatory statement of the conference committee and in the relevant committee reports, so I will not belabor them further here. However, there are a couple of points which merit further clarification.

First, there is a question which has arisen with respect to the balanced budget requirements. The Senate bill contained a provision which required that the city's budget be balanced in accordance with accounting principles established under State law for fiscal years 1979, 1980, and 1981, up until the 1982 fiscal year when the city was required to have a budget balanced in accordance with generally accepted accounting principles. The conference report contains the Senate provision. The term "accounting principles established under State law" refers to the accounting principles established under the State Comptroller's Uniform System of Accounts, and further defined under State law with respect to the gradual phaseout of certain operating expenses funded out of the capital budget and certain accrued pension liability.

I understand that by fiscal year 1982, the city will have completely phased out the operating expenses funded out of the capital budget, and that these will be reduced to $450 million in fiscal year 1979, to $300 million in fiscal year 1980, and to $150 million in fiscal year 1981. I also understand that the city will be accounting for its pension liability on on accrual basis by fiscal year 1982. The language of this provision gives the Secretary the authority to make determinations as to the accounting principles to be used and to set stricter standards as he deems appropriate.

Second, the provision requiring that the city devote not less than 15 percent of the net proceeds of city indebtedness issued in public credit markets in each fiscal year after 1982 to repaying or refunding the guaranteed obligations outstanding may need some clarification. This requirement is intended to apply only to long-term city indebtedness so issued, since there are no net proceeds of seasonal borrowings which could be used to refund long-term debt. The references in the waiver language to "essential capital needs" and "the market for long-term city indebtedness" are a further indication of this intent.

Finally, Mr. President, I should note that the conference report contains certain provisions relating to legal remedies which were included in the Senate bill. One provides a right of civil action to permit the Secretary to go to court to enforce compliance with the provisions of the act, any agreement related thereto, or any provision of State law related thereto, by the city, the State, the financing agent, the independent fiscal monitor, or any official of any of the foregoing, or any other party to an agreement pursuant to the act. Another provision authorizes the Secretary to waive the absolute priority afforded Federal claims in the event of bankruptcy with respect to new issues of city indebtedness if he determines that this is necessory to get the city back in the public credit markets. Third, there is a severability clause which states that if any provision of the legislation is held invalid by a court of competent jurisdiction, the other provisions of the act will not be affected thereby. Thus, for instance, if the one-House-veto provision of this or any other act were overturned by a court, the guarantee authority and the other provisions of the act would remain in effect.

Mr. President, I have some further remarks with respect to rent control which I will reserve until after the distinguished Senator from Texas, who is the ranking minority Member on this issue, speaks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas is recognized.

Mr. TOWER. Mr. President, the Senate on June 29 expressed agreement with the concept of authorizing Federal long-term guarantees of New York City's securities. The bill agreed to by the conferees, over my objection, provides for limited seasonal loan guarantees in addition to the long-term guarantees which the Senate passed. The bill originally passed by the Senate was ill advised and unnecessary; giving New York City additional discretion by authorizing seasonal as well as long-term guarantees further erodes the purported limitations on the precedent established by this unfortunate legislation.

I have repeatedly stated my reasons for opposing this bill. Briefly, I think that the bill does little if anything to solve New York City's financial problems, but instead merely postpones them. The price which we are paying merely to postpone those problems—including the prospect of massive and lengthy Federal involvement in local decisionmaking in New York City and elsewhere—is, in my view, intolerable.

The Banking Committee in February found unanimously that New York City could avoid the need for Federal financial assistance through reliance upon local resources, increased State aid, and other well-documented measures designed to restore crediblity to New York City's financial operations. Instead of a joint and cooperative effort to take the steps recommended by the Banking Committee by those most interested in New York City's well-being, however, it appears to me that far greater effort has been devoted by city and State officials and others to presenting the case for Federal guarantees.

I am most concerned about the lesson which other financially troubled cities are likely to learn from these events. Instead of relying upon local resources and local solutions, this bill and the circumstances leading to its passage are likely to provide a roadmap to Federal guarantees or other financial help for other cities. While steps were taken to limit the nature of the precedent established in this bill, such steps are in my judgment totally inadequate. Once the precedent—providing guarantees—is established, the details of the assistance to other cities can be negotiated.

The addition of authority to issue seasonal guarantees, as agreed to by the conferees, broadens the precedent further and, at the same time, eliminates some of the discipline on New York City embodied in the bill originally passed by the Senate. It is abundantly clear that New York City has the resources available to meet at least its seasonal needs without Federal intervention; this was amply demonstrated during the Banking Committee's hearings. Providing for seasonal guarantees in such circumstances contributes further to the erosion of the emphasis upon local initiative, for it is apparent that local sources are not going to act as long as the prospect of Federal assistance exists.

The provision for seasonal guarantees is made even more unnecessary in view of facts which have come to light since the Senate's action of approving the long-term guarantees. The New York Times reported on July 18 that New York City now finds itself with a billion dollar cash surplus on hand as of July 1, 1978. Under these circumstances, providing for season loan guarantee authority of up to $325 million, as is done in the bill approved by the conference committee, is completely unwarranted.

City officials were described as "embarrassed" at the size of the cash surplus, in light of estimates available during the Senate's consideration of the bill which projected a substantially lower amount. The "embarrassment" is hardly surprising, since it illustrates the fact that no seasonal guarantees are really needed.

These events serve to reinforce the Banking Committee's findings last February that there is no need for Federal assistance to New York City. The city's present cash position, coupled with the seasonal lending capability of local sources within New York City, make it particularly clear that the city's seasonal borrowing can be accomplished without Federal assistance.

The bill originally passed by the Senate was a bad bill; the bill as amended in conference is even worse, and I urge my fellow Senators to vote against it.

New York City reached a state of fiscal collapse because of its unwillingness to act responsibly, to take the elementary step of limiting its expenses to the amount of its revenues. No amount of Federal guarantees can bring about a climate in which the public credit markets will open up to its securities. Only when New York City faces up to the fundamental concept of consistently balanced budgets will its access to the public credit markets be restored.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Texas yield?

Mr. TOWER. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Before the distinguished Senator from New York speaks, I think this is ironic. Here we have a bill that has gone to conference and we have a conference report that is going to go through overwhelmingly, by a landslide, and we have both the managers of the bill, on the majority side and on the minority side, opposed to it and taking good, hard shots at it.

It is an indication of the fantastic potency and power of New York City and New York State, and of their remarkable Senators, and of New Yorkers' great capacity, in my view, to achieve their will.

The bill may have some merit, but I must say that this is one of the very few occasions in the 20 years I have been in the Senate when the Senators managing the bill on both the Republican and Democratic sides have been opposed to it and yet, as we know, it is going to go through by a resounding vote if we do have a rollcall vote on it.

Mr. TOWER. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, I agree with his comments on the quality of the representation that New York has in this body.

My distinguished friend, Senator MOYNIHAN, is a product of the London School of Economics and Political Science and is a man of superior intellect.

Mr. PROXMIRE. In spite of that.

Mr. TOWER. The senior Senator from New York is acknowledged to be one of the great legal brains and has one of the best minds that has ever graced this body. He is enormously persuasive, and I have always said if I were ever indicted for a felony crime I would want the senior Senator from New York to represent me and to be my lawyer.

I broached this question to him once, and he said he would do it without fee, and I hope that that is a standing offer, just in the event this ever happens to me.

But certainly New York has two of the most persuasive Senators who ever graced these halls.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The senior Senator from New York is recognized.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, interestingly enough I was going to address myself to exactly that subject openly. The first of my notes say 53 to 27, which was the vote on this bill here in the Senate.

Mr. President, we have been "brilliant" before, Senator MOYNIHAN and I, as have others of my colleagues in their particular specialties, but we have also lost a lot of them. I know I have. He has not lost quite as many because he has not been here as long, but he will. So, it cannot be our brilliance.

But I tell you what I think it is, and I was going to address myself to that: I think it is simply the weight and the irrefutable facts of New York. The fact is, and it comes through, that this is an important makeweight in our country, in the life of our country, and in the future of our country. And it is not only true of hundreds of millions in the world who know New York, the name, what it is about, et cetera, much more than they do the U.S.A.

We always have a joke about New Yorkers and the map of the United States, with New York, the Hudson River, and then the narrow sliver for the rest of the country.

But that is also true of the world. In the world New York is the U.S.A. and vice versa, and there is a very real reason, and that is that it is the nexus of the communications, of the drive, the initiative, the excitement which makes up so much of our country; and even though it is by no means the best-liked city in the United States—although interestingly enough whenever our own members go there, the overwhelming majority always tell me what a great time they have had and how their kids have enjoyed it and how it is just great, but they would not care to live there—and that is the rather traditional assertion.

I do not know whether that is regretful sour grapes or that they really would not. I think the latter is the explanation that they really would not.

Yet they do appreciate the tempo, the excitement, the originality, the drive, and the fact that it is a proliferation of skyscrapers, cultural events, and the cultural establishment which represents really a 20th century phenomenon.

Having been in all the great cities of the world, and as so many of us have, I think it is far and away the most magnetic and one of which our country has every right to be proud. I think that is what has finally come through in the years from the time when we first began to worry about New York nationally in 1975 until today when we are acting on this bill.

There is a pride in the achievement which has erected this enormous monument to the skill, the dedication, the determination, and the quality of man. All of its excrescences and difficulties, as philosophers will tell you, and as my colleague, Senator MOYNIHAN himself a great student, can explain better than I can, are just the juxtaposition which comes with any kind of greatness or any kind of distinction. Somehow or other there has to be a soil around it out of which it grows, which is not very happy and not very pleasant. Just like Justice Frankfurter said about the civil rights movement: "Don't expect nice people to come into this court and complain about the deprivation of their civil rights." So I think that is the reason, Mr. President.

Second, we were, and we are, in very real trouble with a $14 billion budget. As any company treasurer will tell you if they have got $1 billion to start with, after all, that is good, not bad, but it does not represent any solution. They were expected to have a half billion dollars. They need that kind of float as a minimum in order to pay their debts, and remember that what the Government is going to do in this bill is to give guarantees not money.

So there is debt which the city of New York will contract which it has to pay. Therefore, if its float gives us a little additional margin, I think that is to be praised rather than blamed. I think our city officials who expressed surprise were our city officials who were rocked and buffeted by winds. I have been a city official, and I hazard a guess that if Senator MOYNIHAN had been a city official, we would not have been surprised, we would have used that as an element of proof to our Nation that we were doing the things which our Nation wished us to do in order to deserve the aid of our Nation, and that was a good thing, not a bad thing.

Anybody who knows about the tremendous deficiencies—dangerous, recklessly dangerous deficiencies—in the maintenance of our city in terms of its own people and in terms of its millions of visitors and other Americans who come there, will testify to the fact that whatever we do we will still remain for a long time in this very, very precarious condition.

Last, and I shall not detain the Senate very long, there is no doubt about the fact that New York has tightened its belt and, on the whole, it has done a very creditable job. It has reduced the number of its employees by somewhere between one-fifth and a quarter; frozen its salaries and other compensation except for—even below the actual cost-of-living problems which have arisen—and compensated for an overly liberal pension system, and I am the first to affirm it, compensated for an overly liberal pension system, with the enormous reserves which are now being put at the disposal of the city so that this bill again is guaranteeing what? It is guaranteeing the pension funds of the city's employees which have been created out of this overly liberal pension policy. It is going right back into trying to save New York.

While I do not condone the policy, and we are now on new hires, et cetera, doing much better than we did, I do point out it is not being selfishly directed. It is being placed at risk in respect of the effort to finance the city, and these guarantees go only to these pension funds.

There are, without any question, certain built-in deficiencies in my city. I heard from Senator PROXMIRE that he will say something about rent control. Senator MORGAN, who very graciously allowed me to speak before him because of another committee conflict, told me he would like to speak about rent control. I would like to say a thing about that myself.

New York, after all, is a political organism, and I have no doubt, Mr. President, that there are some elements of rent control in the city of New York that are undeserved. There are other elements, however, which are deserved because there still remain very grave shortages of housing in the city when you take them within the categories within the reach of people of modest means. And there is some form of rent control, because it has been disadvantageous to build quarters except with public money and public credit for moderate and lower income families. There is no such thing as private entrepreneurship except as a tax shelter, and that is a very inadequate way on which to depend for housing. But it is a political entity. While some parts of it are undeserved, other parts of it still remain essential.

We obviously cannot control rent control in the city of New York, and we obviously have made the only decision which makes any sense, which is that we are not going to tell the city to go bankrupt and cause us a real national calamity merely because "we are going to discipline you on the rent control issue." The great majority of the Senate has decided and, I think, quite properly, that you cannot do it that way. But we have done what I think will have a very material effect upon the way in which we handle our real estate.

I think on this bill, while the chairman of the committee and the ranking member may have been against it, they certainly lent themselves to fashioning a very, very tight system of control. Not only is there a financial monitor which has for the last 3 years proven to be courageous, effective, and truly regulatory in a very strict way, and shows every promise of continuing to do that, but also the terms and conditions of these guarantees which require budget balance within a very short time of 3 years, and require that every year from, beginning in, fiscal year 1980, the steps leading toward budget balance should be apparent, and do not even trust that to a matter of contract, and a matter of the jurisdiction of the Secretary of the Treasury to cut off guarantees, but they have now placed it within the power of either House of the Congress by a veto to cut off guarantees. In short, New York is going to have to toe the mark stronger than ever and, therefore, self-interest in order to be able to toe the mark will, in my opinion, have a very material effect on the rent control picture because it relates to the amount of revenue which can be raised by the property tax.

Remember that vast parts of New York go untaxed because of our constitutional inhibitions respecting charitable, educational, and similar institutions.

So, while Congress cannot control rent control, and Congress has decided not to take the drastic remedy of cutting New York off in order to discipline it, this act will eliminate or materially curtail further rent control, and has established a budget balance condition which I believe will lead to very constructive results not only in other features of the cost of municipal administration and employees, but in rent control as well.

Mr. President, again I emphasize the truth of the situation in terms of our country as to what has brought about this majority in the Senate now. I deeply believe that has now been sustained through all kinds of scrutiny and debate, and the Senate should, and I hope it will, concur with the pattern established in passing the bill in its action on the conference report.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I should like to say a few words about the rent control laws in New York City and the bearing these have on the city's financial problems.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. PROXMIRE. As I stand here today, in July 1978, with the U.S. Senate about to give final approval to yet another measure to provide financial assistance to New York City, it troubles me to reflect that we are no closer now to seeing a resolution of one of the city's most fundamental economic problems than we were in December of 1975, when Congress passed the first New York City financial aid measure. I refer to the city's system of rent regulation and rent stabilization.

A recent report issued by the temporary commission on city finances, one of many such reports which have been issued over the many years of the rent control programs, found that "both rent control and rent stabilization have played a critical role in the destruction of much of the city's rental housing, as well as costing the city hundreds of millions of dollars in lost real estate tax receipts, the single most important source of city revenues." That report went on to estimate that a gradual phaseout of rent control and rent stabilization would yield, in just the first 5 years, about $50 million more a year in real estate tax revenues.

Mr. President, as chairman of the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs, which handles the New York City financial aid legislation, I can state flatly that it is not the committee or the Congress which has ignored this problem. In its first oversight report on the New York City seasonal loan program, issued on May 17, 1976, a little over 2 years ago, the committee found that "the rent control program administered under State law is a major cause of the decline of New York City's housing stock and the erosion of its real estate tax base." The committee then went on to recommend "that the city and State confront this problem squarely and, if necessary, take the actions needed to phase out rent control."

I have pursued this matter in subsequent committee hearings, asking Governor Carey and Secretary Blumenthal and former Mayor Beame what should be done about the disastrous impact of rent controls, and would they support a phase-out of the various rent control laws. For the most part, I just got evasive answers. The most direct, and most candid, response came from Governor Carey, who stated simply in 1976:

> Frankly, this is an election year, and we have more tenants than landlords in the State.

The only real answer came in mid-1977. It was then that the New York State legislature passed a simple extension of the rent control laws for 4 more years, and the Governor signed the bill into law.

I think it is most regrettable that public officials in New York State and New York City are wholly unwilling to face up to this problem and deal with it sensibly. I recognize that it would not be realistic to attempt to do away with rent controls overnight, any more than it would be realistic to expect their impact on real estate investment and management practices to disappear overnight. Any effort to phase out rent controls would have to be gradual and would have to make some provision for aiding lower-income people affected by the phaseout. But the problem is that no one in New York has even begun to make such an effort.

Mr. President, the legislation before us today, the conference report on the New York City Loan Guarantee Act, does not make any mention of rent control. Rent control was not discussed in the House and Senate Committee markups of this legislation, or on the House floor, and it was mentioned only briefly in the debate on the Senate floor and in the conference committee. Therefore, it would not be appropriate to say that this legislation mandates any action on the rent control issue. In any event, I feel it is something which should properly be handled at the local and State level, where the rent regulation laws are passed and administered.

However, I do feel strongly that it is time, and past time, that New York officials take action to rectify the problems caused by over 30 years of rent controls, by turning the tide and working to eliminate these laws. And I would urge the Secretary of the Treasury, in his continuing review of New York City's progress under the loan guarantee legislation, to assess the problems caused by rent control and rent stabilization and to keep bringing these matters to the attention of public officials in New York City and New York State.

I yield to the distinguished Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I thank the Senator for yielding, and I join in the remarks of the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin, the chairman of the Banking Committee.

Secretary of the Treasury Blumenthal stated to the Subcommittee on Economic Stabilization of the House Committee on Banking on March 2, 1978, that:

> The only way to break the downward spiral [in New York City] is to rebuild the private sector base.

I reemphasize the statement made by the Comptroller of the United States April 4, 1977, that:

> The rapid deterioration in the City's fiscal and economic base is the root of the City's problems. . . . The loss of tax revenues due to rent control has been estimated by the Federal Reserve Board of New York to be more than $220 million dollars in 1975.

In other words, the tax revenues which New York City is losing because of rent controls exceed the annual interest payment on the loans which the Federal Government will be guaranteeing. Obviously, this situation bears upon the integrity of the Federal Government's guarantees.

It was pointed out to the Senate by the distinguished Senator from North Carolina (Mr. MORGAN) on June 29, 1978, that the Temporary Commission on New York City Finances in its June 1977 report to the mayor found that,

> Rent control and rent stabilization have already facilitated the destruction, beyond repair, of a significant portion of the housing inventory of New York City, . . . cumulatively, this subsidy (to tenants) has exceeded $20 billion dollars. . . . By depressing property tax assessments and promoting real estate tax delinquency and the abandonment of rental properties, rent control and rent stabilization diminish receipts from the single most important source of City revenues, the real property tax.

Mr. President, New York City presently ranks last in the major cities of the United States in new housing starts. According to the U.S. Bureau of Census statistics released on January 31, 1978, the New York statistical area with an estimated population of 9,527,000 had approximately 8,000 new units started during 1976, or less than 1 new start per 1,000 population. I am greatly concerned what this decline in construction has meant in loss of jobs. It is estimated that 50,000 to 100,000 jobs will result by a revitalization of the residential construction and rehabilitation of existing housing to the 1963 level of 50,000 new units.

My concerns and those of my colleagues regarding New York rent control programs have been repeatedly expressed and emphasized by persons having impeccable credentials to comment. For example, the Business/Labor Working Group on Jobs and Economic Regeneration in New York City, the leaders of which were David Rockefeller, chairman of the board of the Chase Manhattan Bank, and Harry Van Arsdale, president, Central Labor Council, AFL–CIO, stated in its summary report—page 24—this past year:

> Eliminate rent controls in an orderly and fair manner.

That is exactly what the Senator from Wisconsin was addressing himself to, an orderly and fair manner. Back to the report:

> At present, some 40,000 units of housing a year are being abandoned in New York City. Assuming a conservative replacement cost of $50,000 a unit, this means a loss to the City of some $2 billion in capital investment annually. While many causes are involved, a major factor is artificial ceilings on rents which do not allow revenues to keep up with costs. The Citizens Housing and Planning Council, the Economic Development Council and others have prepared studies and recommendations to deal with this problem in an expeditious and equitable manner. We urge public officials to move on this issue quickly before yet more permanent damage is done.

Mr. President, during the course of the conference committee deliberations, I expressed my concern about the adverse results of rent control and rent stabilization in New York City during the past 33 years. It is my belief that the Congress, and the Secretary of the Treasury, should continue to review this matter since it obviously directly impacts upon the legislation before us. The ability of New York City to repay these loans must be of concern to all Members of Congress. I reiterate the request made to the conference committee which was as follows:

> In order to increase the long-term revenues of the City, the Secretary shall investigate the impact of rent controls and rent stabilization in New York City and the loss of revenue as the result thereof and after such investigation, if he deems it necessary, may require as one of such terms and conditions the phasing out of rent control and rent stabilization on vacant units in the City, as recommended by the Congress in 1975.

I urge, Mr. President, that these matters be considered promptly and seriously by the Secretary of the Treasury and that included in his report to the Congress he state the results.

In the absence of remedial action taken by the Secretary of the Treasury pursuant to the discretionary powers granted him in the pending legislation, I believe the Congress should then take such appropriate action as may be necessary, and this under the continuing review provisions under H.R. 12426.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished Senator from New Jersey and congratulate him on his remarks. I think we all recognize there is nobody in the Senate more concerned with housing, with the plight of the poor and the low-income people, with those who are ostensibly, theoretically, supposed to benefit from rent control. At the same time, the Senator recognizes, as I think all of us are beginning to recognize, thanks to him and the Senator from North Carolina, that if we are going to help the poor we have to adopt a far more rational policy of subsidizing rental housing which will be fair to all.

If you talk to people in New York City, as I am sure the Senator from New Jersey who is so familiar with New York has done, you would recognize that there are many, many well-to-do people, with mighty good incomes, substantial incomes, and they are the ones who benefit primarily from rent control. I think we have an absolute obligation to provide shelter for those who need it but who cannot afford it. That is one thing. To provide the kind of comprehensive rent control system New York has now, which covers people with very high incomes, middle incomes, and so forth, is obviously counterproductive. As the Senator has pointed out so well, very careful studies by objective experts have demonstrated that beyond a doubt.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And, of course, we do suggest that in view of the vacancies, the abandonments, this could be accomplished in these first stages without any harsh impact.

Mr. PROXMIRE. The statistics the Senator gave in the beginning of his statement, when he mentioned the great dynamism in New York and the great interest they have in providing shelter, is that New York City is last of all the major cities in the country in providing new housing. There is no question that there is a very distinct connection here, because New York City is the city which, more than any other city that I know of, does require rent control. There are few other cities in the country that do. New York has had it longer, has had it more comprehensively, than other cities have, and I think it is safe to say it has had a more damaging effect.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think it is significant that everyone who is participating has an understanding of the life and the needs of people of the lower incomes. This should be a further indication that we are not suggesting anything that would bring harsh results to people of lower income, particularly in this period of great pressure, of great inflation.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Will the Senator permit the Senator from South Carolina to proceed? He has a statement he would like to make which is very brief.

Mr. MORGAN. I yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I would like to make a short statement in opposition to this approval of this conference report.

This bailout of New York City is not warranted and sets a dangerous precedent for the future. But even if this is overlooked, we cannot escape the fact that assisting New York is tantamount to approving all the abuses and excesses that the city has practiced in the past and will, as a result of our approval, practice in the future. If in a few years we hear the same plea again the blame will be as much on this Congress as with New York City. If this city is to ever become fiscally sound and stay that way, it must bear the burden of its past mistakes and suffer the restrictions of limited resources. Our action relieves that burden and in effect, the lessons to be learned for the future are lost.

Another problem I have with the current bill, Mr. President, is that the amount of loan guarantees has increased now by $1.5 million. This is another million and a half dollars of the taxpayers' money to be tied up so that employees of New York City can remain among the highest paid municipal workers in this country. I felt, and strongly so, that $1.5 billion was excessive as did some of my colleagues, but now, we are asked to increase that amount. I continue to hope, Mr. President, although realizing the improbability, that others will see now the need to stop this misuse of funds.

I thank the Senator from North Carolina for yielding.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I agree with my distinguished colleagues, the Senator from Wisconsin and the Senator from New Jersey, on the question of rent controls for New York City. I spoke on the subject along with my colleague (Mr. PROXMIRE) earlier, because we think it does have a direct bearing on the recovery of New York City.

I might say in the beginning it is a little hard, sometimes, for the average person to understand how we can stand here in Washington and be concerned about rent control in New York City.

As I pointed out in my statement when the bill was passed, when a landlord finds himself in a situation where his rent is controlled, he cannot increase the rent to take care of inflationary costs which are spiraling, or repairs. He finds himself in the situation where he either lets the building deteriorate or abandons it completely, or, as it was pointed out in the colloquy earlier, many times they are sold to the insurance companies by way of arson.

In my earlier comments I gave some facts and figures on the deterioration of property values in New York City. I think my able colleagues have already established today very well the need for doing something about the rent control.

As I have previously pointed out to the Senate, the Federal Government must in its own interests act to bring about a phasing out of rent control and rent stabilization programs in New York City, so long as we are going to be called upon to guarantee the securities of New York City. This course is required by the inertia and the reluctance of New York City and State officials to deal with the problem. Their reluctance is based on political considerations.

It appears to me that the economic future of New York City is dismal and unviable unless rent controls are ended. Obviously, political considerations are an overriding element in the failure to do away with these outmoded and economically unfeasible programs.

As the distinguished chairman pointed out, Governor Carey, in his testimony before one of our Banking Committee hearings, said there are more renters than there are landlords. I think that is the reason for this colloquy today, to try to impress upon the political leaders of the State of New York the importance that we give to this problem.

Reference has already been made to the devastation to the city's financial tax base resulting from unpaid real estate taxes in New York City. All taxpayers in New York City, regardless of economic class, bear the burden of these unpaid taxes. Rent controls in New York have resulted in the middle-income owners subsidizing the middle-income property renters. This rent control program is not one that has any rational social purpose. It does not benefit only the underprivileged. Apartment units under rent control are available to all comers, regardless of their financial status or annual income. The wealthy are subsidized on the same basis as the lower income or poor citizens. There is no provision in the present New York rent control laws which relates eligibility for rent control apartments to the income of the apartment dwellers. As a social program, these rent controls are irrational; as an economic matter, they are disastrous.

There are a number of Federal and State programs which do subsidize tenants in need who have insufficient income to obtain proper housing. Our housing committee for years has been interested in this type of subsidization. I do not urge, nor do I understand my colleagues to urge, that these subsidized programs should in any way be terminated or revised.

A housing subsidy for the poor is an essential part of any social program. The wisdom of accomplishing this through rent controls is, in my opinion, nonexistent. These rent control programs have been largely responsible for driving New York City to the brink of financial disaster, and their continuance will prevent any renaissance in New York City real estat. They will stifle the normal new construction and improvement of housing units on which any large city must depend for its economic vitality.

I believe earlier, I gave the very low number of new housing units which had been started in New York recently. An initial start in the direction of phasing out these improvident statutes will be a vacancy decontrol program. This could have no disruptive effect on present renters in New York City, but will be a first step, and I repeat a first step, to phasing out the rent control and rent stabilization problems. It will permit owners of these vacated units to undertake improvements which otherwise would not be economically feasible. I commend the chairman, Mr. PROXMIRE, and my colleagues who have addressed this subject today, and join with them in urging that the Secretary of the Treasury take immediate steps to insure that the real estate base, the backbone of the financial well-being of New York City, is not further eroded, because of rent controls. A multitude of studies have already shown the devastating impact of rent control on the New York City economy, on the city's tax base, and on the construction industry. I shall not list them again. These studies should be reviewed as soon as possible by the Secretary of the Treasury, and he should gather any additional information that may be necessary to permit him to take such appropriate action as is necessary with regard to continued Federal assistance under H.R. 12426.

Mr. President, I again thank my colleagues for letting me join in this very important colloquy. I hope it will be of some interest to the officials of the city of New York.

(Mr. SARBANES assumed the chair.)

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I thank the Chair and the Senator from North Carolina. I thank also the chairman of the committee, Mr. PROXMIRE, for giving me this opportunity to speak.

I shall address myself first to the immediate subject of the colloquy which the Senator from New Jersey and the chairman have had.

I understand it to be not a condition of the passage of this legislation but a circumstance of the passage that the city of New York understands that the U.S. Senate expects that the issue of rent control will be addressed. It will be in the spirit—the open, factual, compassionate but realistic spirit—we have this morning and which the Senator from North Carolina spoke to on the day this legislation first passed the Senate. The Senator from Wisconsin, the chairman of the committee, said that the legislation does not mandate such action, but I believe it would be fair to state that it does anticipate it. That the request of the Secretary of the Treasury to include this matter in the annual review of the state of the city's condition seems to me to involve more than just an aspect of legislative history, but to indicate the will of this Chamber in a general sense.

The facts are as clear as can be. The Senator from New Jersey, who is perhaps our leading authority in this matter, cited the elemental evidence that New York City and its region is last in housing stocks. The finding of the business-labor group, headed by Mr. Rockefeller and Mr. Van Arsdale, is that some 50,000 housing units are abandoned each year, representing the destruction of capital in the area of $2 billion.

I do not wish to be anecdotal, but just this last week, a couple of times, I have had occasion to be in Harlem, which is a region that is familiar to me. I went to high school at East Harlem and went to the City College and I know that area rather well. It may be that my eyes have not been seeing as they ought to have done, but it seems to me that 3 years ago, maybe 2 years ago, there was a reasonable stability of real estate. I can report to you that the cancer of the South Bronx has reached 125th Street; 125th Street, one of the great commercial arteries of the city, has collapsed. It is being abandoned.

In the face of that, it is not enough to assert that it is too difficult or too dangerous to do what it is indicated clearly has to be done. I wish to indicate that Governor Carey has concerned himself with this matter, and Mayor

Koch has specificially addressed this matter.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a paper on rent control from Mayor Koch's office.

There being no objection, the paper was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RENT CONTROL

Let me tell you something about rents in New York City. A lot has changed over the last decade. Under provisions of a 1970 local law, rates in many rent-controlled units have increased 86%. In addition, a 1971 State law has required all rent-controlled apartments that become vacant to be rented at the market or economic rent. These factors have no doubt contributed to the recent startling report of the U.S. Bureau of Labor Statistics that the typical household in the New York Metropolitan area spends 42% of its budget on housing.

The rent increase policies of the early 1970's were enacted to counteract the effects of the previous rent control policies of the 1950's and 1960's which failed to provide landlords with cash flow adequate to maintain their properties in the face of inflation.

Putting it another way, New York City is out of the "dark ages" in rent control. The City allows regular 7.5% annual rental increases to law-abiding landlords of apartments that are still subject to rent control. These increases move the rents to the economic level required to adequately maintain a property and provide a competitive rate of return.

The number of apartments subject to rent control decreases everyday as vacancies occur because vacated apartments may be rented at market rates. In fact, since 1970 the number of rent-controlled units has dropped from 1.2 million to about 500,000. If current trends in rent-controlled apartments continue for the next two years, by 1980 between 70% and 75% of the original 1.2 million rent-controlled housing units would no longer be subject to rent control.

The impact of all these changes in the Rent Law has been to give more money to the landlords who need additional funds to operate their buildings but it has increased the rent-paying burden of our citizens who have had to endure the ravages of unemployment and inflation themselves. Over 70% of all New York City housing units are rented and housing costs are the largest fixed cost in a family budget. Most rent-controlled tenants are relatively low income. In fact, in 1975, 66% rent-controlled households reported to the Census Bureau that their income was below $10,000; 78% had incomes below $12,500.

How does our situation in New York compare with that of other cities? In the 1960's New York was probably the only city with rent control. But it has been recently reported in Real Estate Weekly that between 230 and 250 cities now have some form of rent control ordinance. Clearly, other cities have also felt the need to respond to the terrific strain on tenants' budgets caused by the inflation of the 1970's. New York's current rent control policies attempt to maintain the delicate balance between the needs of owners and the needs, and the rent paying capacity, of tenants who are the very families that give New York the stability it needs.

RENT CONTROL: ANSWERS TO POTENTIAL QUESTIONS

What about rent stabilization?

Apartments in the rent-stabilized sector start out at market levels and get regular increases to cover increased costs to landlords.

What about abandonment?

Abandonment is an insidious urban ailment which is a result of many complex social and economic factors. It appears in Newark, Baltimore, Chicago, St. Louis and many other older urban areas that do not have rent control.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Finally, my thoughts go beyond the specifics to the general and I say that it is true what my good friend from Texas says, that this legislation does little, if anything, to solve New York City's financial problems. But it is the fact that the Senate, with gallantry, has risen to the request we have made of it, done what it does not think perhaps to be the best thing to do, and done it, because we have asked that it be done. That is an act of support and perhaps of confidence, certainly of a certain kind of loyalty, to American arrangements that certainly New Yorkers want to recognize and acknowledge and try to comprehend, because something very large is at issue here.

I have remarked in the past that of all the separations of power in the American Constitution, perhaps the most important is the one that is not provided in the Constitution as such but is an unwritten appendage. That is the determination of Jefferson and the willingness of Hamilton to see that the political capital of the Nation was separate from the financial, cultural, intellectual, and industrial capital of the Nation—a profound idea of separation.

Jefferson wanted the Capital out of New York City, because New York City, in a sense, was the Capital as it would have been understood in any other country of the world, then or previously. He wanted the Capital moved to a swamp on the banks of the Potomac, which turned malarial in April such that any Congressman who stayed on until May might not be back in December, when Congress convened. He could not have anticipated air-conditioning or Dr. Walter Reed. It was his thought that there should be this separation between the banking, artistic, intellectual, industrial, and commercial world from the political capital of the country, so that it not be caught up in those other matters lest it begin to infect them and they it.

This arrangement has worked for a very long time. It is astonishing how pronounced it was in the 19th century: When General Grant died, no one thought to bury him in Washington; he was buried in New York City. When the French gave the Nation the great symbol for their fellow republic, they put it in New York Harbor. It never occurred to them to put it on the Mall.

This persisted only to be commenced to be undone by Franklin D. Roosevelt, a New Yorker, in the rise of the Nation and the advent of the great war, and which inevitably brought about the rise of this city.

The day when the medical association would routinely have its headquarters in Chicago, as with the Governors' conferences, and when most national associations would be in New York, is passing, and something will go out of our culture when it happens.

This has been precipitated by the bad fortune and the poor performance of government in New York City itself which has reduced us to the condition which a writer for the New Yorker magazine recently described as "recidivistic beggary."

It is not with any great pleasure that a Senator raised in and representing that great city rises to thank the Senate for having saved us this time. All I can say is that, genuinely, I do thank you, because something larger was at issue than just the well-being of a municipality. It is something to do with the constitutional separation, the extra-constitutional separation of political power from the rest of the society in America, which I think has made government possible.

I hope we will be deserving of your trust, because something was entrusted to us when Jefferson and Hamilton agreed to leave to the present arrangements and, in the main, New York has fulfilled that trust splendidly.

It is, in truth, the most important city in the world today, but it will be the measure of its citizenry that it should stay such.

The Senate has enabled us, has given us that opportunity. The test of it will be in our will and our capacity. It remains to me to thank my colleagues genuinely, to suggest that I hope we know what is required of us. I hope we will not disappoint the Senate and let down the Nation.

Finally, I want to say that of all the Members of the Senate, we are indebted to, and my formal thanks will be sufficient, I would like to add a personal note of admiration and, if she will allow the term, affection for Miss Elinor Bachrach, of the Senate Banking Committee, who with such awesome authority and gentle good nature has managed this most difficult and unrewarding task with a grace that only comes from intellect and character.

Mr. TOWER. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. PROXMIRE. Before that, let me just add to what he has said about the distinguished member of our staff, Elinor Bachrach, who has done so much work on this matter, and has been responsible for the committee reports we have filed, to a very great extent.

She has worked with some other very talented members of the staff of the Banking Committee. But I think everybody would agree she, more than anybody else, has put in the time, effort, intelligence, understanding, sympathy, and the good, hard, tough criticism of New York, which I hope will help New York to straighten out and fly right in the future.

But I think the Senator is right in saying New York does owe quite a debt to an almost anonymous young lady who has done so much to help the Senate arrive at a more rational position than we might have had, although I agree with the distinguished Senator from Texas that it would be more rational if we said, "No."

Mr. TOWER. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. MOYNIHAN. I am honored to.

Mr. TOWER. I was intrigued by the Senator's remark that New York City is the most important city in the world. There are some who might take issue with that. I just wondered what the basis for the statement is.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. It is, first of all, the financial capital of the world.

Mr. TOWER. Aha! If it is then the financial capital of the world, why is it that it cannot manage its own fiscal affairs? Why does it not have the resolution to deal with its own problems?

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Well, one of the reasons is that the people who run the financial institutions are not the people who run the political institutions, and that is not a bad arrangement. It is an arrangement rather conducive to the effectiveness of both, it seems to me, and, this is one of the reasons I found myself in the Chamber last night speaking of what, it seemed to me, was a profoundly illiberal proposal to have the banks account for their foreign loans.

The whole notion that institutions of our society—private institutions—must be miniatures of the State strikes me as a profoundly illiberal view. I am sure it strikes the Senator from Texas the same way.

I do not mean in any way to complicate his political career, but he is a Senator who shares with me the honor of being a fellow of the London School of Economics.

The fact is that New York is the intellectual capital of the world in the sense that the most important public events are there, and that perhaps the world's most important newspapers are published there. Most of the major magazines of the Nation are published there. We happen to be at this moment the art capital of the world. The most important painting in the world was taking place in New York. We are the largest of what is derisively called the communications industry—that produce the gibberish and inconsequence that passes for evening television. We are the home of JACOB K. JAVITS, a fact which would add distinction to any municipality. We are the place which has the honor that when the Senator from Texas wishes to attend the opera, where does he go? And where is he most emphatically welcomed? And what could be more evidence of a, perhaps, fleeting, but for the moment unquestioned, ascendancy?

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I want to join the distinguished junior Senator from New York and the senior Senator from New York, too, because they both took, roughly the same position. But I want to dispute my good friend from Texas on this matter.

I think there is no city in the world like New York, that can really compare with it. Of course, Milwaukee, Madison, Racine, and La Crosse are better cities, but they are not more important cities.

This is an important city, and I must say that the city is so much in so many ways.

If the Statue of Liberty could speak, some people say, all she would say is, "My arm is tired."

But that marvelous inscription, that Emma Lazarus poem:

Give me your tired, your poor,
Your huddled masses yearning to breathe free,
The wretched refuse of your teeming shore,
Send these, the homeless, tempest-tost to me,
I lift my lamp beside the golden door.

Nothing expresses America better than those words. In my view, it also expresses New York. New York has not only said this to the world, we often view this as an invitation to Europe, or the people abroad, to come to our country.

It is also, in my view, an invitation to people to come to New York, American people to come to New York, and not simply to visit, but to come and face it, to face the biggest challenge in so many fields of endeavor anywhere.

If a young man wants to become a lawyer, where does he go? Where is the biggest challenge?

Mr. TOWER. To Houston—that is where he goes. [Laughter.]

Mr. PROXMIRE. Maybe a thousand years from now he may go there, after he goes to Milwaukee and Madison. Right now, they go to New York.

Mr. TOWER. Three of the top five largest law firms in the United States are located in Houston. I thought I would mention that.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Top in what way? With respect to oil?

Mr. TOWER. Numbers, size.

Mr. PROXMIRE. The Statue of Liberty, of course, is only the beginning. There is that marvelous skyline. When you come into New York in the evening, whether you are flying into New York, whether you come by ship, whether you drive into New York, it is so exciting. You just feel it.

The Empire State Building, the World Trade Building, the United Nations. There is no building in the world that gives more hope for peace or for what mankind really aspires to.

Mr. TOWER. That is a very arguable point, indeed.

Mr. PROXMIRE. There is nothing like Rockefeller Center in Houston, or even in Racine, Wis. [Laughter.]

It is such a marvelous, pluralistic city. We forget about Brooklyn. We forget about Queens. We forget about Staten Island. We forget about all the smells, the dirt, the crime—which, after all, is bigger and stronger in New York City than any other place. And that is what makes New York a zesty, tasty, exciting, dramatic place.

I might go on to say that, above all, it is the people. It is not the buildings. It is not the institutions. It is not even the art. It is the people. It is the fact that you have the Damon Runyons, the Billy Roses, the Walter Winchells, the William Sloan Coffins. Such a marvelous, amazing, spectacular variety of human beings.

As the Senator has pointed out, the New York Times, the New York Daily News, the New York Post, all the TV net works—all these elements are there.

But if New York has one quality above all, it is that fantastic brass, that ability to con you into buying the Brooklyn Bridge, con you into a $1.65 billion guarantee, when, as the Senator from Texas has pointed out, this is the credit capital of the world. New York should need credit like the Sahara needs sand, or like the Atlantic Ocean needs salt water, or like the Senate needs natural gas. [Laughter.]

New York has demonstrated that today in the fact that it has received this $1.65 billion guarantee—for a credit, of all things—sitting there with the 11 top banks, clearinghouse banks, which by themselves have $281 billion in assets. All New York needed was a little $1.65 billion, and they come to Washington to get it in order to avoid the risk, because they are awfully good at putting it over on us peasants from around the country.

I do love New York City. It is a great city. A marvelous city. No place else can you have a better time. It is a great place to live, too.

If you really want to be challenged, in spite of what the distinguished Senator from Texas has said, whether it is law, whether it is accounting, whether it is writing, whether it is poetry, whether it is art, whether it is ballet—regardless of what it is, that is the place to go, if you want a challenge, if you really want to take on the toughest place in the world and aspire to the greatest heights.

It is a wonderful city, and it is a great privilege to be conned by that city, even though that is exactly what is happening to us this morning. [Laughter.]

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I yield.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I was born in New York, and I have lived there all my life, other than during the war years when I served in the Army.

It does my heart great good to hear what the Senator from Wisconsin has said. It is very heartwarming. It puts me in mind of one thing, I say to the Senator from Wisconsin and the Senator from Texas.

I think it would be very good for the people of our city if this act—the Senator describes it amusingly, but I think it is an act of confidence by the Congress of the United States—could be considered as a vote of confidence given them, that we are not cut off from the United States, that not everybody wishes we were floating away, but that the Nation, in a sense, has taken us to its bosom, given us its trust, and expects us to deliver, to really make the city the pride to the United States which it is organically in the magnificent terms in which the Senator has described it.

I hope that for my city, and I believe that we have a good chance to do it.

I know that Senator PROXMIRE is against this; but, notwithstanding that, I think he has shown an extraordinary ability, as a Senator, to divide his views from his duties. He has contrived a bill and has been perfectly fair about its strengths and its weaknesses, and I believe this bill can help New York redeem itself. New York is a national institution; it is not just New York.

I know the enormous help that Elinor Bachrach has been to the Senator and the pride he has taken in her work. PAT MOYNIHAN described it beautifully and properly.

I hope the result will be a closer relationship between the people of the United States and the people of New York. I think both have enormous gains to be made in that relationship.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I thank the distinguished senior Senator from New York. I know he is completely sincere in his statement. I think the contribution the two great Senators from New York have made will help make this legislation constructive.

Although, as the Senator well knows, I have stated many times that I am against this legislation, I think it may help New York City do a more efficient and more responsible job, to balance its budget in the near future, and to be more self-reliant than ever.

Mr. TOWER. Mr. President, I will not get into the matter of which is the most important city. I believe we all have a great deal of pride in our respective cities throughout the country. That is a debate that could go on at very great length in this Chamber.

I note that, in fact, corporations are fleeing New York, locating their headquarters elsewhere, many of them in my own State, in Houston and Dallas.

I note that finance is becoming more decentralized in this country.

So far as the fine arts, the performing arts, and the literary arts are concerned, that, too, is becoming greatly decentralized in this country, and I think that is a healthy thing.

With all this, however, I think none of us denies that New York City is a great national asset; and those of us from other parts of the country who regard it as such can only be greatly chagrined that it has been mismanaged so badly. The question is, is it going to be managed properly in the future?

It seems to me that very often New York City is managed for the benefit of its public employees or for the perpetuation of certain political cliques in positions of power and influence; that, from time to time, it has ignored the real needs of its people and has failed to manage its affairs properly.

The basic question, then, is, what is going to happen in the future? Are they going to manage it properly in the future? What course must we take here to try to influence the course of events in the future in terms of the proper management of the affairs of that admittedly very great city?

I am concerned that this legislation does not make a positive contribution toward that future; therefore, I oppose it.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on the conference report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second?

There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays on the conference report are ordered.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The second assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, at the suggestion of Mr. TOWER and Mr. PROXMIRE I ask unanimous consent that further consideration of the conference report be set aside until 3:30 this afternoon and that in the meantime the Senate proceed to the consideration of the next order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered. Consideration of the conference report will be set aside until 3:30 p.m. this afternoon.

HEALTH PLANNING AMENDMENTS OF 1978

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senate will now proceed to the consideration of S. 2410, which the clerk will state by title.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 2410) to amend titles XV and XVI of the Public Health Service Act to revise and extend the authorities and requirements under those titles for health planning and health resources development.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Time for debate on this bill, S. 2410, is limited to 1 hour to be equally divided and controlled by the Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. KENNEDY) and the Senator from Pennsylvania (Mr. SCHWEIKER); with 30 minutes on any amendment, and 15 minutes on any debatable motion, appeal or point of order.

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill which had been reported from the Committee on Human Resources with an amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may put in a quorum call without the time being charged to either side until the managers can get to the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I make such a suggestion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The second assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Bob Wenger, Stuart Shapiro, Larry Horowitz, Becky Beauregard, Sister Rosemary Donnely, Steve Paradise, Louise Ringwalt, Ellen Akst, and Craig Polhemus be permitted to have access to the floor during the consideration and votes on S. 2410.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. SCHWEIKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the following staff members be permitted to be on the Senate floor during consideration of S. 2410, the Health Planning Act Amendments of 1978: David Winston, David Main, Polly Gault, Mary Bloch, Fran Paris, John Rother, and Barbara Green of the Human Resources Committee staff, Robert Rubin of Senator JAVITS' staff, Ginny Eby of Senator HAYAKAWA's staff, Mary Ann Simpson of Senator STEVENS' staff, and Cindy Root of Senator TOWER's staff.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HUDDLESTON). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I also ask unanimous consent that Nancy Olsen of the Human Resources staff be granted the privilege of the floor during the consideration of this legislation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, we are here today to ask for swift passage of Senate bill S. 2410, the Health Planning Amendments of 1978. This bill revises and extends the authorities and requirements under titles XV and XVI of the Public Health Service Act for health planning and health resources development.

Mr. President, I introduced this important legislation on January 23, 1978. The bill, unanimously reported by the Committee on Human Resources, was sponsored by myself and my distinguished colleagues, Senators SCHWEIKER, WILLIAMS, JAVITS, RANDOLPH, PELL, CHAFEE, HATHAWAY, CRANSTON, and BIDEN. The bill was referred to the Committee on Human Resources. I would especially like to thank my distinguished colleague, Senator SCHWEIKER, for working closely with me on this legislation. Three days of hearings were held in the Subcommittee on Health and Scientific Research on this legislation. Testimony was received from Senators CLARK and LEAHY, the Honorable Hale Champion, Under Secretary of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, the Honorable J. Joseph Garrahy, Governor of Rhode Island, chairman of the National Governors Association, Subcommittee on Health Policy, and the Honorable Edward Herschler, Governor of Wyoming. Other witnesses included physicians, hospital administrators, health planners, consumers, union leaders, representatives of HMO's, and officials of county government.

In addition statements were supplied for the record by 50 additional witnesses.

Mr. President, I would now like to explain the rationale behind this proposal.

The major purpose of this legislation is to strengthen and build upon the already functioning health planning network. The committee in its deliberations strongly emphasized that health planning should be a process in which both consumers and providers of health and mental health services work together to effectuate a better and more rational health delivery system than exists today. This will assist us in the goal of providing quality health care at a reasonable cost.

The committee found that the need for strengthened and coordinated planning for personal health services has grown more apparent each day. It was the view of the committee that the health care industry does not respond to classic marketplace forces. The highly technical nature of medical services, together with the growth of third party reimbursement mechanism, acts to attenuate the usual forces influencing the behavior of consumers with respect to personal health services. For the most part, the doctor makes purchasing decisions on behalf of the patient and the services are frequently reimbursed under health insurance programs, thus reducing the patient's immediate incentive to contain expenditures.

Duplicative investment in costly health care resources, such as hospital beds, coronary care units or radiation treatment centers, is too often made in the same or a nearby area. Such investment not only results in capital accumulation but also establishes an ongoing demand for payment to support those services. There is convincing evidence from many sources that overbuilding of facilities has occurred in many areas, and that maldistribution of high-cost services persists.

A recently published study indicates that there are at least 100,000 unneeded hospital beds throughout the United States. Hospital beds, though unused, contribute substantial additional costs to the health care industry. It is estimated that a hospital bed, full or empty, costs between one-third and one-half its initial purchase cost each year to operate. Each $1,000 invested in hospital expansion requires at least $333 each year in operational financing. This operating cost exists whether or not the bed is occupied at a particular time. The same is true with respect to other medical facilities and services. A coronary care unit with a low rate of utilization, or an open heart surgery team which performs relatively few operations a year, requires a substantial proportion of the support required by similar services with a high utilization rate.

Widespread access and distribution problems exist with respect to medical facilities and services. In many urban areas, hospitals, clinics, and other medical care institutions and services are crowded into relatively tiny geographical areas, while other large areas go poorly served or completely unserved. Likewise, many rural communities are completely without a physician or any other type of health care service, while adjacent urban areas are oversupplied.

Mr. President, Federal efforts on behalf of national health planning and resources development have undergone several transformations. Although these programs made many notable contributions, they suffered from austere financing, overlap, and duplication of responsibilities, and absence of sufficient mandate for implementation of their plans. Additionally, there was inadequate Federal guidance as to national health priorities and goals. Planning agencies were in turn accused of knuckling under to the Nation's health providers and paying scant attention to the all-important cost implications of their decisions.

It was my concern over the fragmentation and mixed success of these earlier planning efforts that led me to introduce legislation that combined and integrated these programs with the enactment of the National Health Planning and Resources Development Act of 1974 (Public Law 93-641). In this legislation, clearer lines of authority were drawn with responsibilities and accountability specifically detailed; broader mandates were provided for actual implementation of the short- and long-range plans developed by the planning bodies; stronger sanctions were authorized; improved funding arrangements were included, so that agencies would not be dependent on contributions from health care providers, as had often been the case under the predecessor programs; and the extensive care was taken so that the point of view of those that utilized health care resources would be fully represented.

The legislation recognized State certificate of need programs to be the basic component in an overall effort to control the unnecessary capital expenditures which contribute so greatly to the total national health bill.

Congress drew up an ambitious array of responsibilities for the thousands of individuals in State and local planning agencies who would be involved in implementing the program including the de-escalation of the increasing costs of health care. Since that law was enacted, the issue of cost containment has assumed even greater significance. National health expenditures tripled between 1965 and 1975. In fiscal year 1977, the annual expenditures for health totaled $160 billion, up from the $139 billion spent in 1976. The rate of increase was approximately twice the rate of increase in the overall consumer price index for the same period. Without any intervention it has been estimated that this $160 billion spent on health care in 1977 will grow to $230 billion by 1980. Expenditures for hospital care, which account for 40 cents out of every dollar Americans spend on health care, have been growing far faster than the overall cost-of-living for more than two decades.

In this climate of escalating health costs, effective health planning has become an essential component in the overall strategy to control future increases and to introduce priorities in the allocation and use of finite resources. After 4 years experience with the planning law, Congress is now in a position to assess the strengths and deficiencies of the program and to legislate the changes necessary to improve the process and fulfill the goals set forth in the original legislation.

In preparation for the substantive consideration of amendments to the health planning program, the Committee on Human Resources solicited written comments from over 400 individuals and organizations concerned with the daily implementation of Public Law 93-641. As a result of this process, numerous thoughtful suggestions were incorporated into S. 2410 as originally introduced. Additional comments made in the course of public hearings led to various modifications which the committee believed would measurably enhance the program. Throughout these deliberations, the members and staff of the Subcommittee on Health and Scientific Research participated in an open and active dialog with officials at the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, representatives of planning agencies, the health industry, including physicians and hospitals, consumer groups, labor unions, and the business community.

Testimony and discussions brought to the committee's attention a number of problem areas which S. 2410 as reported addresses. For example, numerous complaints were received that, despite the law's mandate for a consumer majority on HSA and other planning bodies, consumers remained at a disadvantage in challenging the community influence and technical information wielded by health care providers. In some cases the complaints centered around the lack of education and staff support for consumer board members. In other cases, it was charged that sincere efforts had not been made to attract representatives of low-income or medically undeserved groups, or that the selection process for board members had not been sufficiently well publicized or had resulted in self-perpetuating boards dominated by provider interests. The bill specifically addresses these concerns by assuring effective consumer participation through requirements for HSA staff to be assigned to consumer board members, an open selection process for HSA members in which current members may not select new members, improved liability protection for HSA and SHCC members, consumer majorities on HSA subcommittees, and advance payments for HSA members' expenses.

In similar fashion the bill assures representation of medical underserved populations, especially in rural areas, through explicit provisions for their representation on health systems agencies, statewide health coordinating councils, and the National Council for Health Planning.

Planning agencies in general urged the committee to increase overall funding levels to keep pace with the current rate of inflation and to recognize the necessity for additional funds as the program assumes new and broader responsibilities, particularly in the area of hospital cost containment.

I believe that it is imperative that the health planning agencies should be adequately funded in order to enable them to carry out their mandates and I hope that the authorizations contained in the proposed committee legislation will prove adequate to support the extensive and complex activities of the health planning agencies.

In response to the request of the National Governors that each Governor be given a more defined and visible role in the finalization of the State health plan and the State medical facilities plan, which together act as the planning document for health services throughout the State and the foundation on which certificate of need decisions are to be based, the bill provides that the State health plan and the State medical facilities plan developed by the State health coordinating council is to have the concurrence of the Governor. The committee intended in drafting this provision that the development of the SHP should be a continuing cooperative effort between the Governor and the statewide health coordinating council.

Many provisions in the bill are aimed at strengthening the certificate of need program in order to insure linkages between planning and regulatory decisions. To accomplish this end, the bill provides that all certificate of need decisions be consistent with the State health plan developed individually in each State by its State and local planning agencies. To do less would eliminate any objective basis for decision making at the State and local level. Of course, there is sufficient flexibility in S. 2410 to provide for exceptions to this rule for emergency circumstances that pose a threat to public health such as might occur if a hospital's heating plant or the wing of a nursing home had to be replaced as a result of a natural calamity or accident.

The bill also extends the requirement for certificate of need review to any one piece of diagnostic or therapeutic equipment valued over $150,000 regardless of location and is designed to prevent discrimination against HMO's by establishing parity between HMO's and other providers of ambulatory health care. During committee consideration of the bill Senator HATCH offered an amendment to delete this key provision. This amendment was defeated 13 to 2. The provision in the committee's bill is intended to deal with a troublesome anomaly in current law that is increasingly being used by certain providers of health care to acquire very expensive equipment free of planning review. This equipment can add enormous costs to the health care system.

I know in a few moments we will be debating this particular issue and I will elaborate on the position of the committee at that time.

It is self-evident that planning cannot work if the same piece of expensive medical equipment will or will not be subject to certificate of need laws on the basis of who happens to purchase it. But this is the situation under the present law. This anomaly has resulted in physicians and clinics being allowed to purchase expensive medical equipment without having to demonstrate that the community served actually needs that equipment. The hospital serving the identical community would have to prove such need prior to the purchase. This is obviously unfair and destructive to rational planning and is contrary to congressional intent.

We find examples where a hospital is turned down for purchase of the equipment. Then right next door, a clinic will open up and go ahead and purchase the equipment. It makes absolutely no sense. We shall get into those examples during discussions of various amendments.

Some have attempted to frame this discussion as a State's rights issue. That is a smokescreen. States are already required to have in place a certificate of need law that covers certain basic services such as hospital construction and purchase of major medical equipment in most settings. The bill simply insures that the basic certificate of need provisions will cover such very expensive equipment in all settings. It is the equipment which the law will cover and which inflates medical costs.

While the American Medical Association is promoting this self-serving amendment, which would place physicians in a special class, they are the only major health care group who supports the amendment. Even the AMA-sponsored National Commission on the Cost of Medical Care, which was appointed by the AMA Board of Trustees, included 11 physicians, and was chaired by Dr. Max Parrott (AMA President 1975–76), specifically recommended a provision similar to that included in the committee's bill:

> If certificate of need legislation proves to be effective as a cost containment technique for inpatient institutions, then for the sake of consistency: Expand CON to provide settings outside the hospital, including private physician's offices.

Likewise, the respected Labor-Management Group, chaired by former Secretary of Labor John T. Dunlop, recommended in a recently completed report extending the certificate of need authority to include review of nonhospital expenditures.

Other groups in addition to the administration which support the provision that the Huddleston-Hatch amendment would delete include:

American Hospital Association.
National Council of Community Hospitals.
Washington Business Group on Health (made up of large corporations such as GM, Ford, IBM, Xerox, Goodyear, Citicorp).
Blue Cross.
Health Insurance Association of America (representing the commercial health insurance companies).
Labor-Management Task Force (chaired by former Secretary of Labor John T. Dunlop).
United Auto Workers.
AFL–CIO.
American Federation of State, County, and Municipal Employees.
Service Employees International Union.
American Health Planning Association.
Group Health Association of America.
Kaiser Foundation Health Plan.
Health Research Group.
Consumer Coalition on Health.
National Association of Counties.

The publication of the national health planning guidelines brought to public attention the national problem stemming from the already discussed oversupply of 100,000 hospital beds costing well over $2 billion a year. The guidelines called for planning agencies to use 4 hospital beds per 1,000 population and minimum occupancy levels of 80 percent as benchmarks health plans assessing the need for both new and existing resources in their respective health service areas are necessary. While some mistakenly feared that the guidelines thereby mandate HSA's to close unneeded existing facilities and beds, others correctly appreciated that hospital overcapacity was eroding efforts to control overall hospital costs.

Proposals to expand HSA and State agency authority to include decertification of unneeded facilities met with mixed reaction during hearings conducted by the Subcommittee on Health. However, there was almost unanimous support for some type of effort to encourage hospitals voluntarily to close or convert unneeded facilities. The bill establishes a new program to assist and encourage the voluntary discontinuance of unneeded or duplicative hospital services.

Mr. President, this is an important bill. The Committee on Human Resources, after 3 days of hearings, unanimously ordered it favorably reported. I am hopeful that my distinguished colleagues will join in passage of the health planning bill and defeat of the amendment to be offered by Senators HUDDLESTON and HATCH. By doing so, we will be improving the health planning process and reducing the costs of health care.

I yield such time as the Senator from Pennsylvania may want.

Mr. SCHWEIKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Tom Delbanco, Marcia Stanhope, and Sheila Burke of Senator DOLE's staff, Jeff Lewis of the Subcommittee on Aging, Marsha McCord of Senator EAGLETON's staff, and Lynn Wanlund of Senator HUDDLESTON's staff be granted the privilege of the floor during consideration of the bill.

Mr. KENNEDY. I ask unanimous consent that Miss Robinson of Senator NELSON's staff have the same privilege.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. SCHWEIKER. Mr. President, I rise today to speak in behalf of S. 2410, the Health Planning Act Amendments of 1978. As ranking Republican on the Health and Scientific Research Subcommittee of the Human Resources Committee, I have been a long-time supporter of a strong, local health planning process. I firmly believe that the way to achieve quality health care at a reasonable cost is through a planning process that includes participation from all consumer groups and providers, as well as local and State government agencies and officials. If we do not improve the planing process so that it can accomplish our goals of lowering health costs and distributing services to areas presently underserved, then it is my feeling that the most likely replacement would be a heavily regulated Federal program of hospital revenue control—an alternative I oppose.

Senator KENNEDY and I are submitting a package of amendments to the Human Resources Committee version of S. 2410. We have worked closely with members of the Human Resources Committee and Senators TOWER, BELLMON, and DOLE to develop these amendments to strengthen the planning process. In particular, we have significantly lowered the amounts contained in title II of S. 2410. The bill was too costly in its original form and the amounts now included in the substitute better reflect what we felt should be the priorities of the planning process.

One of the amendments being offered as a committee amendment will reduce the cost of the bill by $915 million. We now have a fiscal year 1979 authorization of $373 million for all the programs contained in the Health Planning Act. This is $125 million less than was contained for the fiscal year 1978 authorization. Additionally, we have accepted suggestions by Senator TOWER to further assure that any application submitted to a local health systems agency or a State health planning agency will not be rejected simply because the agency does not act in a timely fashion, and that the guidelines issued by HEW for the health systems plans will be guidelines and not regulations.

These are two issues that I have been very interested in since we began consideration of this legislation. I felt that we had to make clear that the HEW guidelines are just that, and will not be used to preempt local decisionmaking. Also, health care providers should not be held at the whim of the project reviewers but allowed fair, timely consideration of their projects. I strongly support the Tower amendments and appreciate his further clarifying these issues.

HISTORY

The Federal effort in health planning began in 1946 with the enactment of the Hill-Burton Act, a program designed to identify and respond to the deficiencies in the supply and distribution of health care facilities. The thrust of the program was to provide Federal funds—first through grants and later through loans—to build new health facilities or to modernize and expand existing facilities. From 1947 to 1974 over $4.4 billion in grant funds have been appropriated and over $2 billion in loans or loan guarantees have been authorized. The Hill-Burton Act was, by most yardsticks, a great success. In fact it was perhaps too successful. By the late 1960's the Congress became concerned that we had too many beds and facilities. The major problem was not sheer numbers but the distribution of the health facilities. In addition, in 1966 Congress authorized the medicaid-medicare programs and, once the Federal Government became a major purchaser of services it became aware of the steeply rising costs and cast about for ways to deal with the problems of access and cost.

The primary response was enactment in 1966 of comprehensive health planning (P.L. 89–749). This act established the old 314a and 314b agencies at the State and local levels whose functions were to develop planning processes to produce comprehensive health plans for meeting current and future health needs. The role of the CHP agencies was further strengthened in 1972, when Congress enacted section 1122 of the Social Security Act which required certificate-of-need review for capital construction as a condition for reimbursement under medicaid or medicare.

By 1974 the Congress, in reviewing the programs mentioned above noted that considerable progress had been made but more was needed. We therefore approved Public Law 93–641 which established State and local planning agencies (HSA's, requires the establishment of certificate-of-need programs in each State, and authorized a loan guarantee program to facilitate construction of new health facilities and where appropriate, to modernize existing facilities.

The development of the program established under Public Law 93–641 has been at best mixed. The State agencies, the SHPDA (State health planning and development agency) and the SHCC's (State health coordinating councils) are in place and functioning: 86 health systems agencies have received conditional designation and 127 HSA's have been permanently designated. The process has not been easy and unfortunately took longer than anticipated—so much so that meaningful planning has only just begun. During the process certain problems have been identified. Basically the problems fall into three areas: accountability, responsibility, and performance.

ACCOUNTABILITY

A continuing problem is the accountability of the local HSA's. Approximately 90 percent of all HSA's are not for profit corporate structures who are accountable only to the board itself. Even in the very limited number of local government HSA's the regulations published by HEW have insured that the HSA governing board once established was not accountable to local government. In addition, we have become aware that in many areas the technical dominance of the HSA's by consumers is more apparent than real—in fact the boards are dominated by the provider members.

RESPONSIBILITY

Recently a major question has arisen over who is the dominant force in health planning. Is this to be a "bottom-up" planning or planning from the "top-down?" The Federal guidelines began with the assumption that the primary force was to be in Washington. Fortunately HEW, as a result of a nationwide outcry has backed away from their original position.

PERFORMANCE

The major concern of the Congress with regard to performance is whether or not the HSAS will be able or willing to make the hard decisions expected of them. Are they to become advocates for more and better health services or will they be tough enough to say no when appropriate? Our experience, to date, is limited, but is sufficient to cause some alarm. This is important because unless the HSAS can be effective in this area the whole program will fail.

WORK ON S. 2410

With these problems in mind the Subcommittee on Health and Scientific Research last October began a series of consultations with all interested groups to solicit their views or the existing programs and their suggestions for necessary changes. As a result of these consultations the subcommittee developed some basic assumptions upon which S. 2410 is based.

First. The existing HSAS, while not completely satisfactory were nevertheless making progress. It would therefore be counter productive to begin any wholesale changes in the composition of the HSAS. That would only delay the planning process.

Second. The role of the States in the planning process was too limited and should be expanded. No meaningful certificate-of-need program would be possible unless the States were given a larger role.

Third. The planning processes for physical health, mental health, and for alcohol and drug abuse were overlapping and duplicative.

Fourth. The health planning decisions should be made by local HSAS who are aware of local needs and circumstances.

Key changes, based on these assumptions to existing law, and in this bill, are:

First. The State Governors were given veto power over the State Health Plan. Under existing law the HSAS and the State Health Coordinating Council (SHCC)—dominated by the HSAS—developed the State plan without approval by the Governor. HEW had also adopted the position the plan must be reviewed and approved by the Secretary. S. 2410 provides that the Governor must approve the plan, and once approved, it is not subject to HEW veto or approval. The State plan is also not required to conform to Federal guidelines.

Second. The certificate-of-need authority is expanded and strengthened. State certificate-of-need is expanded to include acquisition of major equipment no matter where located, including the physician's office, and that is an element of controversy here today. In addition, the State's certificate-of-need decisions must be related to the approved State plan. In order to avoid unnecessary rigidity the bill provides for an exceptions process when deviation is necessary.

Third. The bill establishes a voluntary program to encourage hospitals to close, merge, or convert unnecessary facilities and services. A system of incentive grants is included to encourage the elimination of unneeded facilities and services.

Fourth. A system of incentive payments is included to encourage the planning, development, and delivery of ambulatory care services, and other alternatives to expensive (and often unneeded) hospital care.

Fifth. The role of the various State and local agencies is clarified so that planning for all health programs (physical health, mental health, alcohol and drug treatment program planning) are coordinated and duplication is eliminated.

Sixth. The private nonprofit HSA's would be prohibited from electing new members to their boards by the members of the boards themselves. They will be required to develop an acceptable process for selection of new members which does not include board selection.

Seventh. The governing body of local government HSA's will be given new authority to approve the HSA budget and the plan, and to remove, for cause, members of the governing board of the HSA.

Eighth. A judicial review process for appeals of certificate-of-need decisions is established. The current law is inexplicably silent on the issue and hospitals have complained about lack of due process.

Ninth. The unique health problems faced by medically underserved communities are targeted in the bill. We hear so often about our national priority to reduce the beds or services in medically overserved communities, but equally important is the need to see that all of our citizens have access to quality health care.

There are, of course, numerous other more technical amendments. But from my perspective these are the most important. I believe we must have a health planning process which is more accountable and more responsible. We must also insure that the principle of local planning is protected and enhanced. I believe the changes proposed in S. 2410 will go a long way toward alleviating some of the more glaring problems in the planning process and will give the process a chance to succeed.

I think it is in the best interest of the country to give the planning process at the local level an opportunity to work, and that is what this bill is all about. If health planning does not succeed in insuring access to quality care and controlling costs at the local level, it will inevitably be replaced with ever more rigid Federal regulatory programs, from the centralized Federal Government agencies.

Mr. President, I urge my colleagues to join me in supporting S. 2410, as amended by Senator KENNEDY and myself. I believe that we have made major steps in improving the health planning process in this legislation, due to the hard work of Senator KENNEDY, as chairman, and Senator JAVITS, the ranking minority member of the Human Resources Committee, who has been exceedingly interested and devoted in this area, as well as other members of the committee.

Mr. President, I urge enactment of this bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I am pleased to join Senator KENNEDY and other members of the Committee on Human Resources in recommending passage of S. 2410, the Health Planning Amendments of 1978.

I have offered as a floor amendment a proposal to create a National Commission on Alcoholism and Alcohol-Related Problems which I will discuss in a separate statement. I appreciate the willingness of Senator KENNEDY to accept this proposal as an amendment to the bill we are considering today.

S. 2410, as reported by the committee, would revise and extend for 3 years the National Health Planning and Resources Development Act of 1974.

Federal involvement in health planning began more than 30 years ago with the Hill-Burton Hospital Construction Act. Subsequently, Federal participation in this area expanded with enactment of the Hill-Harris Amendments of 1964; the Heart Disease, Cancer and Stroke Amendments of 1965; and the Comprehensive Health Planning and Public Health Service Amendments of 1966.

By the early seventies, it was apparent that the Federal Government needed to do more in health planning activities. Existing laws lacked the elements necessary to shape a health care system that was both responsive to the health needs of Americans and managed in an efficient, equitable, and cost-effective manner. In response, Congress enacted the National Health Planning and Resources Development Act of 1974, authorizing a $1 billion, 3-year program to synthesize, redirect, and expand the planning activities of various State and local entities.

Emphasizing the need to involve consumers in decisions about the allocation of health care resources, the 1974 act required health providers, elected officials, and the public to share responsibility for health facilities and health services planning in their communities.

The committee believes that the planning agencies now in place need somewhat more time to mature. Thus, S. 2410, the Health Planning Amendments of 1978, redefines the provisions of current law coordinating and strengthening planning efforts already underway.

The bill supports existing planning networks in seven important ways:

First, the participation of providers, consumers, and public officers in the planning process is more carefully defined.

Second, the role of the Governor is strengthened through involvement in the formal approval of the State health plan.

Third, other Federal systems, such as Peer Standards Review Organizations (PSRO), the National Center for Health Statistics, and medicare and medicaid programs, are linked to the planning process.

Fourth, the special health needs of urban and rural medically underserved populations are represented at all stages of the planning process;

Fifth, the definition of health planning is revised to include mental health planning and the planning for alcohol and drug abuse programs;

Sixth, financial incentives are offered to hospitals to close, merge, or convert unneeded or unused facilities into ambulatory and long-term care services;

Seventh, the certificate-of-need (CON) review process is broadened to cover the purchase of all diagnostic or therapeutic equipment valued over $150,000 regardless of location.

This last provision has been the focus of much controversy in recent weeks.

Existing law requires that health care institutions seek a certificate-of-need before making major capital expenditures. Physicians and other health providers, not bound by statute, can acquire expensive equipment without such review. An inequitable situation has been created by these provisions of the 1974 health planning law.

The review of major equipment is now determined by who purchases it rather than by such factors as demonstrated need for the resource or its appropriate use and placement in the health service area. This is contrary to the intent of the existing law. By requiring that equipment valued at $150,000 be reviewed regardless of its location, S. 2410 secures the intent of existing statute.

The development of an efficient, equitable and economical health care system in the United States is a worthy goal. I believe a strong local planning process is vital to present and future health initiatives. Therefore, I urge prompt passage of S. 2410 without change to its essential certificate-of-need provisions.

Mr. President, I commend the excellence of thought and development that has been put into this legislation by the Senator from Massachusetts, the chairman of our subcommittee, and the ranking member, the Senator from Pennsylvania (Mr. SCHWEIKER).

Mr. HUDDLESTON addressed the Chair.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, would the Senator just permit us to offer a committee amendment?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I yield to the Senator.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1518

(Purpose: Reduce authorizations, make clarifying and technical changes, limit scope of health systems plans, require consultation or redesignation)

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk on behalf of myself, Mr. SCHWEIKER, Mr. WILLIAMS, Mr. JAVITS, and Mr. DOLE.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NUNN). The amendment will be stated.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. KENNEDY), for himself and others, proposes an unprinted amendment numbered 1518.

The amendment is as follows:

SEC. 154. Section 1513(b)(2)(A) is amended by inserting "(primarily with regard to health care equipment, and health services provided by health care institutions, health care facilities, and other providers of health care and other health resources)" after "healthful environment."

Beginning on line 3, page 58, strike out through line 2, page 59, and substitute the following:

SEC. 130. (a) Section 1521(b)(4) is amended by (1) inserting "(A)" after "(4)"; (2) inserting "upon review (as provided in section 1535) of the State Agency's operation and performance of its function," before "he determines"; (3) adding at the end of paragraph (4)(A) (as so redesignated) the following: "Before renewing an agreement under this paragraph within a State Agency for a State, the Secretary shall provide each health systems agency designated for a health service area located (in whole or in part) in such State and the Statewide Health Coordinating Council an opportunity to comment on the performance of the State Agency and to provide a recommendation on whether such agreement should be renewed."; and (4) adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph: "(B) If upon review (as provided in section 1535) of the State Agency's operation and performance of its functions, the Secretary determines that it has not fulfilled, in a satisfactory manner, the responsibilities of a State Agency during the period of the agreement to be renewed or if the applicable State administrative program does not continue to meet the requirements of section 1522, he may terminate such agreement or return the State Agency to a conditionally designated status under paragraph (2) of subsection (b) for a period not to exceed twelve months. At the end of such period, the Secretary shall either terminate its agreement with such State Agency or enter into an agreement with such State Agency under paragraph (3) of subsection "(b).".

(b)(1) Paragraphs (3) and (4) of section 1521(b) are each amended by striking out "twelve months" and inserting in lieu thereof "thirty-six months".

(2) Section 1521(b)(3) is amended—

(A) by inserting "(A)" after "(3)",

(B) by redesignating subparagraphs (A) and (B) as clauses (i) and (ii), respectively,

(C) by amending clause (ii) (as so redesignated) to read as follows:

"(ii) by the Secretary if the Secretary determines, in accordance with subparagraph (B), that the designated State Agency is not complying with the provisions of such agreement.", and (D) by adding at the end the following:

"(B) Before the Secretary may terminate an agreeemnt with a designated State Agency under subparagraph (A)(ii), the Secretary shall—

"(i) consult with the Statewide Health Coordinating Council of the State of which the State Agency is designated respecting the proposed termination,

"(ii) give the State Agency notice of the intention to terminate the agreement and in the notice specify with particularity (I) the basis for the determination of the Secretary that the State Agency is not in compliance with the agreement, and (II) the actions that the State Agency should take to come into compliance with the agreement, and

"(iii) provide the State Agency with a reasonable opportunity for a hearing, before an officer or employee of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare designated for such purpose, on the matter specified in the notice.".

(3) The amendments made by paragraphs (1) and (2) shall apply with respect to designation agreements entered into under section 1521(b)(3) of the Public Health Service Act after the date of the enactment of this Act.".

Beginning on line 15, page 55, strike out through line 10, page 56, and substitute the following:

SEC. 127. (a)(1) Paragraphs (1) and (3) of section 1515(c) are each amended by striking out "twelve months" and inserting in lieu thereof "thirty-six months".

(2) Section 1515(c)(1) is amended—

(A) by inserting "(A)" after "(c)(1)",

(B) by redesignating subparagraphs (A) and (B) as clauses (i) and (ii), respectively,

(C) by amending clause (ii) (as so redesignated) to read as follows:

"(ii) by the Secretary if the Secretary determines, in accordance with subparagraph (B), that the entity is not complying with the provisions of such agreement.", and

(D) by adding at the end the following:

"(B) Before the Secretary may terminate, under subparagraph (A)(ii), an agreement with an entity for designation as the health systems agency for a health service area, the Secretary shall—

"(i) consult with the Governor and the Statewide Health Coordinating Council of each State in which is located the health service area respecting the proposed termination,

"(ii) give the entity notice of the intention to terminate the agreement and in the notice specify with particularity (I) the basis for the determination of the Secretary that the entity is not in compliance with the agreement, and (II) the actions that the entity should take to come into compliance with the agreement, and

"(iii) provide the entity with a reasonable opportunity for a hearing, before an officer or employee of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare designated for such purpose, on the matter specified in the notice.".

(3) The amendments made by paragraphs (1) and (2) shall take effect with respect to designation agreements entered into under section 1515(c) of the Public Health Service Act after the date of the enactment of this Act.

(b) Section 1515(c) (as amended by subsection (a)) is amended by adding after clause (ii) of paragraph (1)(A) the following: "A designation agreement under this subsection may be terminated by the Secretary before the expiration of its term if the health service area with respect to which the agreement was entered into is revised under section 1511(b)(4) and the Secretary determines, after consultation with the Governor and Statewide Health Coordinating Council of each State in which the health service area (as revised) is located that the health systems agency designated under such agreement cannot effectively carry out the agreement for the area (as revised). In terminating an agreement under the preceding sentence, the Secretary shall provide that the termination shall not take effect before an agreement for the designation of a new agency takes effect and shall provide the agency designated under the agreement to be terminated an opportunity to terminate its affairs in a satisfactory manner.".

"(B) If upon review (as provided in section 1535) of the agency's operation and performance of its functions, the Secretary determines that it has not fulfilled, in a satisfactory manner, the functions of a health systems agency prescribed by section 1513 during the period of the agreement to be renewed or does not continue to meet the requirements of section 1512(b), he may terminate such agreement or return such agency to a conditionally designated status under subsection (b) for a period not to exceed twelve months. At the end of such period, the Secretary shall either terminate its agreement with such agency or enter into an agreement with such agency under paragraph (1).

"(C) Before renewing an agreement with a health systems agency under this subsection, the Secretary shall provide the State health planning and development agency and the Statewide Health Coordinating Council of the State in which the health systems agency is located an opportunity to comment on the performance of such agency and to provide a recommendation on whether such agreement should be renewed and whether its renewal should be made subject to conditions as authorized by paragraph (3).

"(D) If the Secretary enters into an agreement under this subsection with an entity or renews such an agreement, the Secretary shall notify the Governor of the State in which such entity is located of the agreement, its renewal, and, if any conditions have been imposed under paragraph (3), such conditions.".

(d) The last sentence of section 1515(c)(2) is amended to read as follows: "In considering such applications, the Secretary shall give priority to any application which has been recommended by a Governor or a Statewide Health Coordinating Council for approval.".

(e) Section 1515(b)(4) is amended by striking out the last sentence and substituting: "In considering such applications, the Secretary shall give priority to any application which has been recommended by a Governor or a Statewide Health Coordinating Council for approval. When the Secretary enters into an agreement with an entity under paragraph (1), the Secretary shall notify the Governor of the State in which such entity is located of such agreement.".

On page 66, insert the following between lines 21 and 22:

SEC. 143. (a) Section 1532(b)(2) is amended by adding at the end the following new sentence: "Failure of a health systems agency or State Agency to complete a review within the period prescribed for the review may not be deemed by such an entity to constitute a negative finding, recommendation, or decision with respect to the subject of such review.".

(b) Section 1524(c) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"(7) Failure of a SHCC to complete a review within the period prescribed for the review may not be deemed by such an entity to constitute a negative finding, recommendation, or decision with respect to the subject of such review.".

On page 66, line 22, strike "Sec. 143." and substitute "(c)".

On page 84, strike lines 4 through 14.

On page 84, line 15, strike "(f)" and substitute "(e)".

On page 85, line 7, strike "(g)" and substitute "(f)".

On page 52, insert the following between lines 23 and 24:

(d) Section 1513(b)(2)(C) is amended by striking "and is consistent with".

(e) Section 1513(b) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"(5) The agency shall submit to the State Health Planning and Development Agency, the Statewide Health Coordinating Council, and the Secretary a detailed statement of the reasons for any inconsistencies between its HSP and AIP and the national guidelines and priorities established under this Act."

On page 45, insert the following between lines 24 and 25:

(c) Section 1512(b)(3)(C)(ii)(II) is amended by inserting "rehabilitation facilities," after "long-term care facilities,".

On page 75, strike lines 15 through 18 and substitute the following:

"SEC. 202. Section 1613 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new".

On page 76, section 205 is amended by (1) striking "$120,000,000" and substituting "$40,000,000"; (2) striking "$150,000,000" and substituting "$70,000,000"; and (3) striking "$180,000,000" and substituting "$130,000,000".

On page 85, line 8, strike "$150,000,000" and substitute "$50,000,000".

On page 85, line 9, strike "$200,000,000" and substitute "$100,000,000".

On page 38, line 5, strike "eighteen" and substitute "twenty".

On page 38, line 10, strike "seven" and substitute "eight".

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, this amendment makes a number of changes in the bill as reported by the Human Resources Committee, which I encourage my colleagues to accept.

First, it emphasizes that HSA's should focus their attention primarily on issues dealing with health care equipment, health services provided by health care institutions, health care facilities, and other providers of health care. I remain committed to the local planning process, but this amendment will redefine the broad mandate of the HSA's.

Second, we have reduced the levels of authorizations in the bill. Many of the programs in the committee's bill have never had any funds appropriated and additional data received since the markup have convinced us that with the current excess in health care facilities in most parts of the country, Federal assistance in this area is no longer needed. For this reason we have reduced the funding in sections 1613 and 1640.

Additionally, the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare has indicated that they will be unable to gear up fully for the important closure and conversion section, and we have thus reduced the levels of authorizations for this new programs and eliminated the extra payment to the HSA's. I am pleased to have worked so closely on this with my distinguished colleagues Senators DOLE and BELLMON.

Third, this amendment increases the membership on the National Council for Health Planning to 20 members. This is an important body, and I am hopeful that the Secretary when he fills these and other vacancies will insure that the membership includes individuals knowledgeable in the management of institutional health services such as hospitals.

In response to the sentiment expressed following the release of the national guidelines for health planning, we have eliminated the requirement that all HSP's be consistent with the national guidelines. I believe that the development of these guidelines should be an evolving process, and believe that until the state of the art is more refined in this area that the HSA's should be allowed some flexibility. Included, however, is a provision in this amendment that requires the HSA's to state why their AIP's and HSP's are inconsistent with the national guidelines.

There is also an amendment that would clarify current law to assure that the failure of an HSA or State agency to complete a review within a prescribed time period could not be used as a "pocket veto." I feel strongly that to perpetuate the current HEW regulation on this issue fails every test of fairness and is the antithesis of due process.

Also included are a series of amendments that clarify the role for the Governor, the State health coordinating councils, and the Secretary in the designation and resignation of HSA's and State agencies, and a conforming amendment concerning rehabilitative facilities.

Mr. SCHWEIKER. Mr. President, we strongly support this amendment and urge its adoption.

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. SCHWEIKER. Mr. President, I thank Senator KENNEDY and other members of the Human Resources Committee for accepting my amendment which would clarify the scope of the health systems plans. I am sure that this amendment will reaffirm to the HSAS and the communities they serve the congressional intent that they primarily concern themselves with the task of improving health services in areas that are underserved, while trying to cut down on services and facilities in areas which are overserved.

Mr. President, today I would like to call attention to a committee amendment to S. 2410, the Health Planning and Resource Development Act Amendments of 1978, which would, for the first time, offer health systems agencies a clear delineation of the intended scope of their health systems plan.

Section 1513(b) of existing law lists among the functions of health systems agencies the promulgation of a health systems plan (HSP) "which shall be a detailed statement of goals (A) describing a healthful environment and health systems in the area which, when developed, will assure that quality health services will be available and accessible in a manner which assures continuity of care, at reasonable cost, for all residents of the area * * *"

In this very broad mandate the words "healthful environment" have created confusion and uncertainty regarding the appropriate content of an HSP. Obviously, a description of a "healthful environment" might include details of virtually any feature of our surroundings potentially affecting physical or mental health, however broadly those terms might be defined. Indeed, one health systems agency, using this broad authority, recently promulgated an HSP that outlined specific goals for the HSA on a broad range of public policy issues, including antismoking, gun control, air quality, sex education, general traffic safety standards, air bags, the 55-mile-per-hour speed limit, and auto emission standards.

A public controversy resulted that not only diverted the attention of the HSA from its primary and more immediate functions, but also caused the county board of supervisors to withhold a significant amount of local funding for the HSA. Other HSA's across the country have found themselves embroiled in similar controversy as a result of taking stands on broad public policy issues.

Mr. President, while there is no question that the challenge of improving the health of the American people requires public decisionmaking on many issues relating to our environment and lifestyles, I do not think Congress designed health systems agencies to be the vehicle for resolving such a broad range of problems. The Health Planning Act, and health systems agencies, were created primarily to eliminate waste and duplication in the allocation of health services, facilities, and institutions. My amendment, therefore, would qualify the meaning of the term "healthful environment" in existing law so that it would encompass primarily "health care equipment, and health services provided by health care institutions, health care facilities, and other providers of health care and other health resources."

During the review of the Health Planning Act leading to S. 2410, one of the major problems uncovered was the difficulty HSA's are having in developing health systems plans. It is clear that if the HSA's are to succeed in developing these plans, their endeavors must become more, rather than less focused. The HSA's have more than enough to do in developing health systems plans with regard to facilities and services, particularly with the new decertification authority these amendments propose. Should HSA's inject themselves into the amorphous and emotional areas addressed by the HSA I referred to earlier, their resources are likely to be so diverted that those plans may never become a reality.

Additionally, I am concerned that, should HSA's become involved in the broad range of controversial issues potentially relating to a "healthful environment," local funding for the HSA's might be placed in jeopardy. This danger is all too clearly illustrated by the situation I referred to above.

Finally, Mr. President, I am also concerned about whether HSA's are as accountable as we would want public decisionmaking bodies to be in setting policy on the full range of issues related to a "healthful environment." There have already been many criticisms of the process by which HSA's reach decisions on matters relating simply to the consolidation of services and equipment. We have attempted in this bill to improve that process. Nevertheless, I doubt that the planning process has sufficient credibility at the moment to enable it to resolve issues relating to airbags, gun control, sex education, and the like. While we have tried to structure the HSA's to handle matters specifically relating to duplication among facilities and services, I think it would be wiser to leave issues going beyond these narrow functions to publicly elected officials, existing legislative bodies, and judicial procedures.

Mr. President, I believe the thrust of my amendment simply clarifies Congress' original thinking on this matter, and I hope my colleagues will support it.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I am pleased to cosponsor this amendment to S. 2410 which contains a provision resulting in a reduction of $915 million in the authorization levels. The initial purposes in the development and passage of Public Law 93–641 in 1974 were to reduce the fragmentation of earlier planning efforts, and to provide the States and, more importantly, the local areas, with control over the development of health services and the building of health facilities, thereby containing and/or reducing the soaring costs of health care delivery throughout our Nation.

PROGRESS OF THE STATE AND LOCAL PLANNING ACTIVITIES

Now some 4 years later, and after a 1-year extension of the original act by Congress in 1977, the States and local areas are just beginning to develop their health plans and assess their needs for health services and facilities. HEW reports the full designation status of some 123 health systems agencies and five State health planning and development agencies. Recognizing this progress, there remains a degree of paradox in speaking of cost containment as the original intent of the Health Planning Act, while Congress makes a new commitment to ever increasing fiscal spending for this purpose.

Mr. President, in this time of limited budgetary resources, we must carefully scrutinize each Federal program to insure that it is utilizing Federal dollars in the best possible way. In this time of continuing inflation, we must insure that Federal policies do not exacerbate increases in costs.

STATE ALLOTMENTS

One provision of the amendment would delete all funding for section 1613, the facility formula grants. This program was intended to provide funds to the States for the construction of hospital facilities. Although funds were appropriated for the program in 1976, none have been spent.

As my colleagues are aware, the State allotments program is only one of many programs through which medical facilities—particularly hospitals—receive Federal support for construction and renovation.

The need for these construction programs is currently in serious question. As a Nation we have approximately 100,000 extra hospital beds, costing as much as $4 billion annually; $1.6 billion of the cost of unused hospital capacity is paid by the Federal Government. Moreover, in the last 3 years hospital costs have been increasing at an annual rate of 12.6 percent. Over the same period, the CPI averaged 7.1 percent. One factor in this hospital cost inflation has been the existence of excess capacity that encourages unneeded medical care.

By reauthorizing funding of the State allotments program, we would pursue a self-defeating policy with regard to health care costs. On the one hand, Congress considers efforts to control costs, while at the same time reauthorizing $405 million for further facility construction and renovation that may well fuel further health care cost inflation.

Mr. President, the number of programs that support medical facility construction is overwhelming. Between 1945 and 1973 the Federal Government funded $4.3 billion worth of medical facility construction through the Hill-Burton program. The majority of these funds went to financing 358,000 new hospital beds—about one-third of all existing community hospital beds.

Although the Hill-Burton program has been phased out, title XVI of the Public Health Service Act now authorizes loans, loan guarantees, and interest subsidies, as well as direct grants to medical facilities and grants to State governments for construction or renovation. Furthermore, S. 2474, the Health Services Extension Act, contained reauthorizations for several programs that support medical facility construction. Public works employment grants, Farmers Home Loan Administration direct loans, and FHA mortgage insurance all provide Federal support for construction or renovation of medical facilities. Approximately 6.9 percent of medicare payments, or $2 billion, is paid for interest and depreciation charges related to capital investment. Beyond programs directly supporting expansion of medical facility plants, this country has invested $4 billion annually in tax exempt municipal bonds to finance hospital construction.

My effort to reduce the authorization levels of the specific program and other programs in the bill is a response to those who ask for caution in our decisions to commit more Federal dollars. It is not our intention to prevent the planning process from taking place.

STATE PLANNING

We should continue to allow the States to exercise their rights to make their own decisions. We must provide them with the promised national guidelines that will assist them in developing programs that will increase the health benefits to our citizens in both urban and rural communities, while at the same time reduce the inflationary trend of our health care costs. However, guidelines must be guidelines—they should be provided only to give guidance to the States and localities in making their decisions. The guidelines should not be offered to provide more stringent Federal regulation of the process that is now moving toward a system of planning that encourages local decisionmaking.

I thank my distinguished colleague, Senator TOWER, for his attention to this issue, and am pleased to note that other provisions contained in this amendment address this issue.

ISSUES AND PROBLEMS

Rather than attempting to increase Federal control of the planning process, I am pleased to note that the focus has been placed on the strengths and deficiencies of the program and of legislating the changes necessary to improve State and local planning.

Let us give the States the opportunity to show their ability to provide efficient health services while reducing the costs of health care. Let us lend them the support they need, while being fiscally responsible. Let us not add to the inflationary spiral of the health care system, whether it be reflected in planning, or in the delivery of services.

CONCLUSION

In conclusion, I offer my thanks to my distinguished colleagues, Senators SCHWEIKER and KENNEDY, for their willingness to support this compromise which addresses the need for the Congress to be fiscally responsible. I am pleased to join in the sponsoring of this amendment, and I urge its support and adoption.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FORD). The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

AMENDMENT NO. 3098

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. President, I call up my amendment No. 3098.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Kentucky (Mr. HUDDLESTON) proposes an amendment numbered 3098:

On page 62, line 25, insert after "other" the word "covered".

On page 65, line 13, insert after "acquired" the phrase "by a health care facility".

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on this amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is not a sufficient second.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On whose time?

Mr. KENNEDY. On our time, on the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The second assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. President, in addition to the name of the Senator from Utah (Mr. HATCH), I ask unanimous consent that the names of the following Senators be added as cosponsors of this amendment: The Senator from Tennessee (Mr. SASSER), the Senator from Oregon (Mr. PACKWOOD), the Senator from Alabama (Mrs. ALLEN), the Senator from Texas (Mr. TOWER), the Senator from Wyoming (Mr. WALLOP), the Senator from California (Mr. HAYAKAWA), and the Senator from North Carolina (Mr. HELMS).

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. President, since we are under a very short time agreement and the Senator from Utah (Mr. HATCH) and others would like to speak to this amendment, I will be very brief in explaining its purpose—with which most Senators, I believe, may already be familiar.

Mr. President, very simply put, this is a "States' rights" amendment designed to protect their existing options to deal with so-called certificate of need requirements under the health planning law. In particular, it would preserve their ability to apply CON to the noninstitutional, or private office, setting as they see fit rather than federally mandating regulation of all major equipment purchases and tying coverage of one new class of ambulatory providers, that is, HMO's, to coverage of individual practitioners.

The amendment would accomplish this aim by inserting the word "covered" after the word "other" on page 62, line 25, and by adding the phrase "by a health care facility" after the word "acquired" on page 65, line 13. These changes would have the combined effect of allowing the States to themselves determine whether and to what degree they want to extend certificate of need review beyond the basic hospital-related facilities.

As the language of the revelant provisions in the bill now stands, of course, States would be compelled to expand the CON laws they have already adopted or broaden the scope of their initial law when they do enact it in two ways: First, they would be forced to require preauthorization of all major medical equipment purchases which either HMO's or any private practitioners wish to make to improve their health care delivery capabilities; and second, they would be barred from requiring prior approval of an HMO's establishment, construction, equipping, and program of services unless they were also willing to impose the same preliminary review clearance on doctors, dentists, nurses, chiropractors, clinical psychologists, and the like—telling them in effect what, where, whether, and how they can conduct their practices.

For a law which was supposed to return health policymaking decisions to the local level, it seems to me that sort of dramatic Federal mandate thrust upon the States represents a rather substantial preemption of authority without any very reasonable or realistic alternatives. Accordingly, our amendment would restore the choices which States have had to act in this area without affecting the committee's effort to ease the requirements applicable to HMO's. It would do this by making all noninstitutional coverage permissive—granting no exemptions but stipulating no inclusions or contingency coverage either.

For the sake of clarity—and because there have, unfortunately, been some misconceptions circulated regarding the effect of this amendment—I think it would be well to articulate exactly what our proposed modification is intended to do in terms of CON application to both HMO's and private practitioners. With regard to diagnostic equipment, for example, we are talking about optional State coverage for nonhospital HMO's, outpatient clinics, private offices, and indeed, any entity which is not within the definition of a "health care facility," as it is used in the Public Health Service Act. All that means is that States could cover such ambulatory providers, but would not have to, as the committee bill now requires.

By qualifying the expression "providers of ambulatory health care" with the word "covered" in the section dealing with across-the-board CON review, we are merely deferring again to State prerogative—allowing them to cover HMO's and others who are not within the definition of "institutional health services" as they see fit. The real difference between the committee's language and what we are proposing is that HMO's would not be "coupled" or grouped with all other ambulatory providers; instead, all noninstitutional entities, including HMO's, would be treated independently according to State determination of desirability and appropriateness.

The net effect of the change would be to say to the States: "You do not have to cover either HMO's or private offices unless you want to. Then you can cover anyone, a combination, or all of them as you deem necessary, but inclusion of one would have no bearing on your inclusion or exclusion of another. The only contingency would be that, in the event you cover an ambulatory provider in a certain specified category such as equipment—and coverage in that same category is also extended to HMO's—it can be no more restrictive on HMO's than it is on the other covered provider."

Now if my colleagues find that recitation a bit confusing and convoluted, they have a sympathetic ally in the Senator from Kentucky. The problem in trying to modify an obscure provision such as the one in question, however, is that it invariably still comes out ambiguous. Our purpose was to inject the element of State discretion into the section in the cleanest way possible—without disturbing the basic notion—and the only other way to do that, it seemed to me, would have been to add a more lengthy phrase at the end to make it read, "other providers of ambulatory health care which the States choose to cover."

In any event, to dispell the notion that our amendment would somehow require HMO's to be covered, I offer the following excerpt of an interpretive memorandum I had prepared by the Congressional Research Service:

> The addition of the term "covered" does not lend itself to an unambiguous interpretation of the above language. It would not appear, however, that if a State Agency wished to cover some types of ambulatory health care services that HMO's would also be required to be covered under the State's review procedures. That is, the State Agency could still choose not to cover HMO's while covering other types of health care services. This reading would probably be consistent with other provisions of the Health Planning Law.

The similar clarification I wish to make on this point is that States would certainly also, with our modification, be able to cover HMO's without covering any other types of ambulatory health care services. It has to work both ways in order to be a pure State option for each separate category of regulation, so that if a State wants to review HMO's for services, facilities, equipment, and organization—but only review private offices for, say, equipment, or not at all or vice versa—it can, provided only that the requirements in the selective category are no more stringent for HMO's than for the other ambulatory providers, if any, which it has chosen to cover.

Obviously, the "in addition to" language which the committee utilized in this section of the bill gives a certain advantage to HMO's which it does not give to others, but with our amendment the States will at least have the opportunity to decide of what providers and for what types of activity they wish to require CON review.

Mr. President, when I was the majority leader of the Kentucky State Senate and our current presiding officer of the senate was the Governor of the State of Kentucky, we helped to develop the certificate-of-need law which we enacted even before Congress incorporated the concept into its National Health Planning and Resources Development Act of 1974. For that reason, I support the basic purpose of CON so far as institutions are concerned just as I support the planning law itself. But in 1972 we in the Kentucky Legislature felt that, given the essential objective of CON to review the construction of new bed facilities, it would be not only administratively infeasible but impractical, inappropriate, and ineffective—probably even counterproductive—to expand its application into the ambulatory setting.

I still maintain that same belief today, Mr. President, and while I would not want to deny any State the right to experiment in that area if they so choose, neither would I want to tell them they have to do it against their better judgment and preference—or worse yet, perhaps, that they cannot do it except in accordance with the "not unless you also" contingencies we specify in a quest to grant certain providers preferential treatment. I am especially pleased that the National Conference of State Legislatures has echoed this theme and endorsed our amendment as consistent with their advocacy of local self-determination in the area of health planning—and I hope that every Senator has had a chance to read the copy of their resolution which accompanied a "Dear Colleague" letter of last week.

I think we have to be sensitive to what the NCSL is saying to us here for two basic reasons: One, we are talking about a provision in a law which has as its central core a promise of a return of health policymaking authority to the local level; indeed, 32 States have already used that authority to reach a decision on this specific issue. And two, we are debating the matter in an atmosphere of less, not more, government regulation—which certainly, certificate of need expansion represents.

While much as been made, also, about the notion of our trying to erode a committee "cost-saving" provision, I have to be very frank in labeling that something of a ploy to detract from the real issue under consideration. For Senators who most certainly have a right to be concerned about such a possibility, we have circulated a brief, half-page response for them to consider—but on balance I would just suggest as a matter of economics that more government regulation of any kind seldom reduces costs and that this issue should not properly be decided on that basis.

This amendment is totally in keeping with the spirit and intent of Public Law 93-641, Mr. President, and I believe the choice it offers is one with which we can all identify. I have no interest in either championing or damaging the cause of HMO enthusiasts or private medicine proponents; I do, however, think we have a commitment to live up to in entrusting the design and implementation of health planning policy of this kind to the States—and this amendment is a fulfillment of that pledge.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a unanimous-consent request?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I yield to the Senator from Florida without the time being counted against me.

Mr. STONE. I appreciate that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that two members of my staff, Edward Horowitz and Craig Wolfson, be accorded the privilege of the floor during this bill and votes thereon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. STONE. I thank the distinguished Senator.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I yield to the Senator from Utah (Mr. HATCH).

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I expand upon what my colleague from Kentucky has said by focusing further on the State preemption aspects of the certificate of need provisions in this bill and illustrating why this is a matter of such concern to us. I would also like to inject a bit of perspective on the CON issue as we discussed it during the committee markup on this legislation.

First of all, Senators should be aware that what the committee is really trying to do with the language in question in S. 2410 is extend what was originally supposed to be a review process for institutional bed facilities into the private office setting. It is clearly a calculated endeavor on their part to gain a "first-step" regulatory foothold over all individual practitioners of medicine—eventually bringing them under the complete umbrella of Government control.

At the same time we are examining the bill's motives with respect to fee-for-service entities, I think we would also do well to reflect on the State experience with this matter. For instance, fully 32 of the 39 States with CON laws have directly considered doing what the committee bill is advocating—that is, extending certificate of need requirements to the private office setting—yet only 6 of those 32 have chosen to do so.

It is no wonder the National Conference of State Legislatures is so sensitive about this prospect of the U.S. Senate telling their member State lawmaking bodies that "our judgment is better and wiser than 26 of yours; 18 of you are not going to be allowed to decide this issue after all, even though we told you 4 years ago that you were; and 6 of you have got the right idea, but do not go far enough, so we are going to make you expand your laws to cover private officers just like you do HMO's."

The "States' rights" argument is hardly a "smokescreen" as the committee has suggested, Mr. President, when you consider that the "right" which we extend to them in the original planning act—and which 39 of them have exercised when adopting their CON laws—would, if the bill remains unchanged, be taken away. Either we are going to be sincere and consistent in our promise of local health policymaking or we are going to make a mockery of the law which is supposed to stand for all that.

The idea of injecting Federal regulatory controls into the private office setting is no small matter either, especially when the States have demonstrated such an overwhelming unwillingness to do it themselves. Philosophically and practically, we are not just talking about "one small piece of equipment," for the committee provision is general in its application and would establish a precedent subjecting all licensed providers of health care to Federal scrutiny. The next step is obvious.

While much has been made by HMO proponents of the "uncoupling" aspect of our amendment, how can they in good conscience say:

> We cannot make a case for ourselves at the State level unless we are tied to all ambulatory providers?

It seems to me there is something wrong when a health care delivery alternative is unable to stand on its own merits and has to obtain leverage in another way.

When there is such substantial Federal financial support going for the establishment of HMO's, as we discussed last week, it would seem only natural and appropriate that we ask them to measure up to certain Federal review criteria such as certificate of need. But when there is no corresponding Federal support going for the establishment of private offices, it would seem equally natural that we should recognize a distinction and concede the impropriety of Federal review.

That is exactly why the States should be allowed to sort this thing out themselves. For if the committee should prevail on this issue, the States would be given a rather harsh choice to make: Either exempt HMO's from their CON laws or extend at least matching coverage—despite its obvious administrative infeasibility—to everyone else who delivers any type of health care—and not just for equipment, but for choosing a location, setting up shop, and offering a given set of services as well.

The only other matter I want to comment upon is the committee's attempt to throw up a diversion and somehow call what they are advocating a "cost-saving" measure. How they can maintain that certificate of need regulation of private offices is going to reduce health care costs when we do not have any reliable unrefuted data to demonstrate that it is even accomplishing that with the existing institutional coverage is one of the real mysteries of this debate to me.

Quoting from the most recent HEW analysis of CON effectiveness done by Prof. David Salkever of Johns Hopkins and Thomas Bice of Washington University—entitled "Impact of State Certificate of Need Laws on Health Care Costs and Utilization," for example:

> In summary, our analysis points to the (perhaps) surprising conclusion that CON controls have contributed to cost inflation; thus, they have tended to produce the very result which they were designed to prevent, . . ." At a minimum, our findings signal the need for a much more thorough and detailed study of the effectiveness of certificate of need regulation as a cost control device. The presumption of its effectiveness is clearly not warranted by the available evidence.

Mr. President, that "more thorough and detailed study" which Professors Salkever and Bice recommended has just been undertaken by HEW—and I have just the specifications for it, just the protocol, right here. They are paying two Boston-area consulting firms over half a million dollars—$535,000 to be exact—to do this study, and yet here we are in the Senate talking about expanding the concept to be evaluated before we even know the results of their findings.

I do not know about other Senators, but that poses a definite problem for me. It just seems that when we are talking about regulating doctors' offices; suppressing technology; preempting the States in the process; and spending a half million dollars to find out whether or not something is working—but broadening it beyond its current scope in the meantime—then that is a rather remarkable position for the Senate to be taking.

That is the position the opponents of the amendment are suggesting to us, however, and I just hope all my colleagues might give it some serious thought before being persuaded to go along. Our amendment is fair, reasonable, and responsible, on the other hand, and would place the whole certificate of need issue in its proper perspective.

All time has expired for the proponents of the amendment.

The Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. KENNEDY. Is it in order to ask for a division of the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is in order for the Senator to ask for a division of the amendment.

Mr. KENNEDY. I request a division of the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has the right to request a division.

Mr. SCHWEIKER. Mr. President, parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. SCHWEIKER. Does a request for a division in that way given equal time for the segments under the unanimous-consent agreement?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The effect of a division is to continue the time as it was, with back-to-back votes on the division.

Mr. SCHWEIKER. Mr. President, parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. SCHWEIKER. If the request were made that the amendments be considered separately, would that affect the time of the division?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the amendments had been offered separately then they would have separate times. Otherwise the time on the division of the amendment runs as the original time agreement.

Mr. SCHWEIKER. Do I understand that if one of us demands that the amendments be considered separately that we do not get separate time considerations for those amendments?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the prevailing cirumstances that is right.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Point of order, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state his point of order.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Is it permissible to make a division at this time with the time restraints remaining after one side has already used up its time?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair must advise the Senator that it is in order.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I do not make that request then at this particular time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is of the opinion that the Senator from Massachusetts has already made the request.

Mr. KENNEDY. Well, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Senator has 15 minutes.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. HATCH. Assuming that this is the same issue but attaches to two sections of the amendment is it still subject to division?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment as it now appears at the desk is divisible.

Mr. HATCH. But this only attacks one issue but two separate parts of the amendment. Is it still subject to division?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is.

Mr. HATCH. I thank the Chair.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I understand we have 15 minutes?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, there are two basic issues which are posed by the Huddleston-Hatch amendment. The Senators from Kentucky and Utah in both their oral statements, and the Senator from Utah in his remarks before our committee, have made their points.

First of all, the Senator from Kentucky makes the point about the infringement of the certificate of need on various States. Well, the fact of the matter is that basically the Senate has answered that question when it passed a law in 1974 requiring State certificate-of-need legislation. Prior to 1974 there were probably four or five States that had certificates of need. But the Congress, in its judgment, established the requirement that States formulate certificate-of-need laws, and over 37 States at the present time have them.

The argument that is made by the Senator from Kentucky, on the one hand, is that in the attempt of the Senate to try to deal with the issue of equipment, whether it be in the hospital or be in the clinic, should be an issue that ought to be resolved at the State level. That leads us, if we follow his conclusion and his rationale, to some extraordinary conclusions.

In Miami, Fla., for example, the Northway Parkway General Hospital submitted an application for a CAT scanner. It was refused because of lack of demonstrated need.

The physicians in the hospital formed an association, and installed the scanner in the clinic across the street. Since a group of physicians purchased the equipment, the purchase was immune from review.

The effect of the Senator from Kentucky's amendment is that if the planning agency, which is made up of providers, consumers, the medical profession, and people within the local community, decides that a piece of equipment is not necessary in order to provide good health in a particular area, that doctors who have a financial interest can open a clinic right next door to the hospital and virtually buy all the equipment they want.

We have established a floor of $150,000 for equipment. We are not requiring that the doctors get a certificate of need for every thermometer or bedpan. It is when a piece of equipment costs more than $150,000.

If we accept the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky you can be sure that you are effectively gutting a provision that would reduce the duplication of equipment.

We have illustrations where in one case the health planning agency said, "All right, you need a CAT scanner," in a particular hospital. Then what happens after they have done a total review at a great deal of cost?

The next day the doctors go out and decide they want the same kind of facility, too. So they go out and buy it and they get reimbursed by medicare and medicaid.

The increased cost to the hospital may be 20 to 30 percent. What possible sense does that make? What possible sense does that make when we are talking about trying to get some control on the costs of health care and begin to effectively contain costs. We cannot bow to the power of the American Medical Association to gut any kind of effective cost containment.

On the other hand, as a result of the amendemnt of the Senator from Kentucky and the Senator from Utah we are going to just add more and more money right into the already inefficient system.

We recognize that just about 50 percent of the increase in costs in hospitals is due to technology and equipment. This amendment would open up another loophole for medicare and medicaid to funnel billions of dollars through without improving any kind of quality care.

I did not hear one word from either the Senator from Kentucky or the Senator from Utah about how this is going to improve the health of the American people, not one.

The fact of the matter is that this is a prestige, high-cost technology issue where the doctors want to be able to say, "OK, you have a piece of equipment next door and we want our boys to have it too."

The Senate Health Subcommittee said,

> Let us cover that equipment no matter where it is, whether it is in the institution, in the hospitals or wherever it is. If it is needed, let us get it. If the American public needs it in terms of improving their health, let us go ahead and get it. But if it is not needed, why go ahead and purchase it?

You end up with Uncle Sam paying the bill. It is not the State of Kentucky, it is medicare and medicaid that go out and pay the bill. We have an interest in this.

Now, with regard to the HMO—how much time do I have remaining?

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KENNEDY. I would just like to complete my remarks.

Mr. HATCH. This is a unanimous-consent request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts has 7 minutes remaining.

Mr. HATCH. That is all the time the Senator has used?

Mr. KENNEDY. I think we can find more time. We will get a little more time, whatever time we need. I would yield time on the bill or ask consent to get additional time. This is the major amendment on these two parts.

Now, on the second part of the amendment that concerns health maintenance organizations.

In the committee's bill we have tried to be more precise, more sophisticated in dealing with the question of whether HMO's are actually providing institutional health services.

Under the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky an HMO would be covered under certificate of need but a group health practice would be excluded. All we are saying is, treat them just the same way.

If the Senator from Kentucky or the Senator from Utah can tell me what the difference is between a group health practice and an HMO outside of a prepaid payment, then I will be interested in listening to their explanation.

The interesting fact of the matter is, Mr. President, that here we have the prepaid programs, which this amendment will help stultify, even though we find they are one of the most cost effective programs we have today. We do not want to open up the door with regard to expensive facilities, but close down the door with regard to one of the most effective programs in reducing health costs in the country today.

We will show the Senator from Kentucky, for example, that in the 11 HMO's we have in my own State of Massachusetts that treat medicaid patients, they do it at 25 percent less cost than they do with fees for service segment. But he wants to eliminate that.

All we are saying is, treat them the same way.

Mr. President, I yield whatever time I have remaining to the Senator from Pennsylvania, withholding 15 seconds at the end.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania is recognized for 3 minutes and 45 seconds.

Mr. SCHWEIKER. Mr. President, it is my intention, when I finish speaking on this amendment, to demand that the two issues contained in this amendment be considered separately. The amendment offered by the Senator from Kentucky addresses two sections of S. 2410. These two issues are quite different, and I am going to ask for a separate vote on each one.

First, Mr. President, I support the chairman of the Health and Scientific Research Subcommittee, Senator KENNEDY, and the points he is making on this matter. This is not a small item. I talked last night with the dean of the University of California Public Health School. He said that in a matter of 2 years, we will be paying a billion dollars a year for the use of CAT scanners. We will be putting a billion dollars a year through our health care system into CAT scanners. So when you talk about "this little item," you are talking about a billion-dollar-a-year cost.

Who is to decide whether the American people want this? All we are saying in our bill is that the States ought to decide it. It is a States' rights issue. I do not agree that we are taking their rights away from them; we are giving them the right to review. All we are saying is that they should make a decision in each case on whether a clinic or a hospital should have a CAT scanner.

They can still give that clinic a CAT scanner. They can give a private (group) practice that CAT scanner; if they feel it is not duplicative, if it is not a cost burden, they can do that. We took a complete States' rights approach. The State agency decides who can have it, and who cannot. We simply say they must make a judgment on the clinics' request just as they must make a judgment on the request of the hospital.

How can we ask a hospital administrator to stick with the system when we do not ask the clinics to do so? The provisions in S. 2410 treat them alike. We cannot say to the hospital administrators, "You stick with the system, but everybody else can go outside the system."

We want a clinic and a hospital to be judged equally in the certificate of need process. Maybe they both should have CAT scanners, or maybe one and not the other, but somebody in the State should make that determination, when it involves a billion-dollar-a-year investment in CAT scanners.

So much for the first part of the amendment. The second part is quite a different thing. It deals with health maintenance organizations. By opposing part II of the Huddleston-Hatch amendment and supporting the committee position we will be saying that the stringent controls we put on HMO's in the original HMO Act in 1974 should be removed because those requirements are more restrictive than those we imposed on the fee-for-service system.

The Planning Act as now written says that an HMO must get a certificate of need for all phases of its operation. Not just for hospital beds, but even for ambulatory facilities. The law is written unfairly, discriminating against HMO's. It says they have to get a certificate of need for the construction of ambulatory health care facilities, and for purchases of expensive equipment for use outside hospitals. They have to get a certificate of need but the fee-for-service provider, does not. He does not have to get a certificate of need for building ambulatory care facilities. He does not have to get a certificate of need for purchasing equipment for use outside hospitals.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. SCHWEIKER. I yield myself 3 minutes on the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator may proceed.

Mr. SCHWEIKER. All we are saying in the committee bill, the provision taken from the Schweiker-Kennedy HMO bill is that there should not be this discrimination against HMO's. Just give HMO's the same treament you give the doctors. That is all.

This is a different issue from mandatory coverage of equipment. Our provision simply says that an HMO, which is designed to be cost effective, shall have the same treatment that the fee-for-service doctors have.

Several years ago we in the Congress—erroneously, I think—wrote into the Federal planning law that HMO's had to be covered by CON for everything they do—but not the fee-for-service system. This simply remedies the situation and equates CON treatment. I hope that will be perceived as Senators determine how to cast their votes, Mr. President.

Mr. President, I demand that the two sections of the amendment be considered separately.

Mr. KENNEDY. Will the Senator withhold that, since we have a short timeframe, to see whether other Senators wish to speak? Then we will close down the time.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I would like to proceed briefly.

Mr. KENNEDY. I would like to ask maybe one other——

Mr. SCHWEIKER. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. SCHWEIKER. If I demand that the amendment be divided, that does not shut off the time at this point?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A division, as stated earlier, will not affect the time.

Mr. SCHWEIKER. Mr. President, I demand that the sections be considered separately.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is the Senator objecting to considering the amendments en bloc?

Mr. SCHWEIKER. I am demanding that they be considered separately for voting purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is the Senator asking for a division of the amendment?

Mr. SCHWEIKER. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator can do that. A division of the amendment has been requested, and back-to-back votes on the two sections will occur as a result of that request.

Mr. SCHWEIKER. Mr. President, I will conclude in another minute or so, and give other Senators time to reply.

I think it is unfortunate that the amendment as drafted really touches on two such different issues. One section of the amendment deals with discrimination against HMO's, with a provision relieving that discrimination. The other considers whether hospitals and doctors shall have to meet the same test on equipment purchases.

The HMO part of the amendment does not relate to the equipment part at all. It simply deals with ambulatory health care facilities, providing that in commencing operations on building an ambulatory facility, they have to get a certificate of need.

Our judgment here is that they should be treated just the same as everybody else in the health care delivery system, just the same as the private clinics and the doctors. We are just asking for equal treatment.

I do hope that we judge these issues in separate ways.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I yield myself 3 minutes on the bill.

I ask unanimous consent for whatever time the Senator from Kentucky and the Senator from Utah would request.

I have a question of my friend from Pennsylvania.

If there was a situation in Philadelphia, for example, where doctors wanted to go and develop a group health practive in the fee-for-service model, as I understand, they can commence operations. They can build an ambulatory care facility; and they can purchase expensive equipment; and they will not be covered at all under the certificate of need. They can get that facility, they can get the equipment, and the only time they would be covered is actually if they were to develop a hospital. Would I be correct? That would be the fee-for-service program. As I understand, that would be the situation. Does the Senator agree with me?

Mr. SCHWEIKER. I certainly do agree. I might say that we have heard evidence before our committee, if the Senator will yield 1 minute, that some HSAS that have been provider-oriented have used the CON procedure to block an HMO from performing as efficiently as it could. In the case of Rutgers Community Health Plan they requested certificates of need and ran into so many technical roadblocks that they were severely hampered. The Senator is exactly right.

Mr. KENNEDY. If it is a group practice which is a fee-for-service, and has the clinic, has the doctors, has the expensive equipment, they are not covered. If it is a prepaid program, that being the only difference, then they would be covered. The desire of this legislation is to equalize those particular points.

Mr. SCHWEIKER. The Senator is correct. That is my reason for pointing out that the two separate amendments should not have been combined in this way in the first place.

Mr. KENNEDY. There is nothing in this amendment which says that if the State of Kentucky wants to include the one, they will not be able to include the other. Am I correct?

Mr. SCHWEIKER. That is absolutely true. They still would have a complete right to make that determination.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for an additional 15 minutes for the proponents of the bill, and maybe 6 minutes for the opponents.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered. The proponents have 15 minutes and the opponents have 6 minutes.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. President, I yield myself 4 minutes.

All of us are concerned about the high cost of medical service in this country. We all applaud and support reasonable efforts to in any way reduce the burden upon our citizens for this very important and necessary expense. There is considerable question, however, Mr. President, as to whether or not the issue with which we are dealing right now, the certificate of need process, is in fact an effective cost-saving program, and has been demonstrated as such.

I bring that out because there have been numerous studies made. One indicated that not only has it not been proved conclusively that it is a cost-saving method, but, in fact, may inflate costs. The Department of HEW is contracting for a study costing $535,000 to make a determination as to whether or not the certificate of need program indeed reduces the cost of medical services.

I think to support this on a cost basis exclusively is to deny the fact that up until now, at least, we do not know for certain that it is effective. But assuming that it is, taking for granted that we can reduce medical costs to our people through a certificate of need program, there are reasons to support the amendment we are offering here today.

The question of whether private offices ought to be considered on the same basis as institutional treatment or HMO's is one that deserves some attention.

Medicare and medicaid costs, for instance, in hospitals are figured on the cost of operating that hospital, which includes the cost of building the hospital and the cost of equipping it. There is some reason to have some control over what those cost inputs are.

But in the private setting, medicare and medicaid fees for doctors are figured without regard to the kind of equipment they use. So a doctor in Louisville, Ky., using nothing but a stethoscope will have the same charge to medicare and medicaid as a doctor in the same city who may have a million dollars worth of equipment to be used.

So it does not follow, necessarily, that by restricting the installation of equipment in a doctor's office you reduce his cost charged to medicare and medicaid.

Second, this same CAT scanner that we refer to today operated in a hospital is vastly more expensive to the patient there than the same scanner operated in a doctor's office. If we are talking about saving money, this is not necessarily the way to achieve that.

We have talked about HMO's and how they are to be treated. We are looking for equality also, but we want to leave the decision up to the State. The bill as presented does not provide parity, as has been stated. It requires that only HMO's be treated no more stringently than other private practitioners. That means that the doctor's office can be required to undergo a much more stringent requirement than HMO's. It means if a State does decide to require that an HMO receive a certificate of need certification from the beginning, then the young doctor who wants to open his own office in the area has to have that same certificate of need approved.

There is a legal question involved about whether or not you ought to, or have to, treat institutions which receive Federal support the same way you treat a private office. A recent Supreme Court decision said that the Federal Government does have a right to impose certain requirements where Federal funds are involved, and that makes sense. If we are spending Federal money to build a hospital, to equip a hospital, we ought to have some say about the cost of operating that hospital.

A considerable amount of Federal money has been appropriated to assist the establishment of HMO's. There is a Federal interest there, and there is some reason to have some Federal control.

If the private physicians referred to by the Senator from Massachusetts want to open a clinic and buy expensive equipment, that is a private decision. There is no Federal money in opening the clinic and there is no Federal money in buying the equipment. So there is a vast difference there.

I think it is reasonable to assume that good businessmen, whether they be physicians or whatever, are not going to squander great sums of money on equipment that is not needed, equipment that cannot be used, and equipment for which they cannot, in effect, recover the cost.

Mr. CURTIS. Will the distinguished Senator yield for a question?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I yield.

Mr. CURTIS. Is it true that an HMO that does not participate in the Federal subsidy program, has no Federal relation, and has no incentive for buying equipment beyond their prudent needs?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I cannot imagine that they would. The whole purpose of their operation is to operate as inexpensively as possible. That is the only way they can keep their head above water.

Mr. CURTIS. Does anybody know in the total amount we are authorizing to be spent on health planning, whether or not that saving is anywhere near that much money as it costs?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I do not totally understand the question. I do not have the figures on what health planning saves.

Mr. CURTIS. It is in the bill, how much is authorized. Does the Senator have any evidence that we are saving the amount in the cost saving?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I refer that to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. KENNEDY. If the Senator will yield, we will be glad to resubmit it.

Mr. CURTIS. I am talking about the whole field of health planning.

Mr. KENNEDY. I thought the question was with regard to health maintenance organizations.

Mr. CURTIS. That was another question. What I am asking is, Is all this health planning in Washington costing more than it is saving?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Let me answer the question by saying that the Department of HEW is going to spend a half million dollars to try to ascertain that. I believe it is inconclusive at this point, although there are some studies.

Mr. CURTIS. That answers my question. I think it is quite inconclusive.

Mr. SASSER. Will the Senator yield for a unanimous-consent request?

Mr. CURTIS. I yield.

Mr. SASSER. I ask unanimous consent that John Nelson of the Budget Committee be granted the privilege of the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HATCH. I ask the same for Gerald Rosen of Senator GRIFFIN's staff, and Hargrave McElroy, of Senator THURMOND's staff.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I appreciate my distinguished colleague's statement. I think he has attacked a number of the issues that are very important. I think the questions raised by my distinguished colleague from Nebraska have been equally important.

That is, even the basic certificate-of-need concept, as it now applies to institutions, has never been proven cost effective. What we are doing here is what we always do in the U.S. Senate, or at least have done over 42 of the last 46 years: Whenever we want to do something, we create the U.S. Government as an aura over everything that goes on in the private sector. In this particular area, what we are going to do is take away the rights of the States to determine whether or not they can grant these certificates of need in the sense that neither the amendment offered in committee nor the one introduced for floor consideration by Senator HUDDLESTON would delete anything.

Instead, it would merely leave to State discretion whether to apply certificate-of-need requirements beyond the basic hospital-related setting. Inclusion of both HMO's and individual practitioners would thus be a local decision, based on local determinations of necessity and not decided by a faceless bureaucracy back here in Washington, with which everybody is getting sick and tired.

The most recent study done by HEW on the point of cost effectiveness concluded that certificate-of-need controls have contributed to cost inflation. That is what we are going to do here. We are going to have more controls, tell the doctors what they can and cannot do, provide, it seems to me, less beneficial care, and in the end, take away free rights for the States.

All of the wonderful comments about how we are going to have the Federal Government save money, I think, are just poppycock. Every time we have placed our confidence in the Federal Government and in the bureaucracy which we have built up around here, we have placed our confidence in the wrong approach. That is what we want to do here, another Federal Government approach, another big Government approach, to solve problems that are very readily solvable right now.

I think it is time that we started waking up to realize that people out there in the States are sick and tired of having more and more oppression, more and more rights taken away, and less and less services and less and less benefit from them. That is what is happening with this bill, especially in this particular situation.

Individual practitioners—doctors, if you will—can never match the resources of a large institution in order to place them on an "equal footing" in competing for the approval of the HSA. In rural areas, particularly, with the certificate-of-need process requiring upwards of $25,000 of administrative costs just to successfully achieve clearance authority, patients would simply be denied ready access to advanced technological services because providers would not have the ability even to apply.

In other words, we are going to take rights away from the citizens out there in the States merely so we can have another Federal Government agency and more control right here. It does not make sense in my book, and I am getting awfully tired of it.

I think it is a classic State's rights issue because the States currently have the right to decide for themselves as to any application of certificate of need outside the institutional setting for which the concept was designed. To now preempt that right by requiring them to expand coverage to the ambulatory setting whether they want to or not, as the committee provision would do, is most certainly an infringement of the local health policy-making authority.

How can Federal regulatory requirements that extend to doctors' offices generally not be extending the long arm of Federal regulation into doctors' offices generally? If only a handful of practitioners have both the means and the inclination, why is it a problem worthy of Federal solution?

The fact is the problem does not exist. The fact is we are just going to bring the good old Federal Government in, with all of its powers, so HEW can blow another $7 billion of the taxpayers' money with no responsibility to anybody, and be proud that they only lost $7 billion that they cannot explain under present circumstances. They cannot explain where it went, and we are going to give them more power—more and more power to the Federal Government. That is what everybody says.

That is not what the Founding Fathers wanted. That is not what the people in the States want. That is not what the Governors want; that is not what the individuals who have free rights now want. That is only what the U.S. Senate and Congress want.

The reason they do is that this body, Congress, has been controlled for 42 of the last 46 years by people who believe that big is better, the Federal Government is better, and the States cannot do anything for themselves.

I think it is important. It is amusing to sit here and listen to the sponsors of this legislation, I think, misconstrue their own bill. The distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania says that States will be allowed to act in this area of certificate-of-need. That is true, but their actions are confined to whether to approve the certificate or not. They are deprived of the chance to exempt any category of provider based upon their own local determinations of the health needs of their own local citizens.

No, they have to be told by the Federal Government what to do. There has been no greater advocate for the Federal Government than the committee upon which I sit, the Human Resources Committee, which thinks that the Federal Government can solve every problem, and we all know that it solves very few. It creates more problems than it solves, and that is what this bill, in particular, is doing.

In the end, the individual citizens in the individual States, served by their individual doctors, who do not have the individual ability to come up with $25,000 in the rural areas, are going to have less and less care for more and more cost and, in the end, this whole country is going to have to suffer. This is just one of literally thousands and thousands of regulatory approaches that are stifling us in this country today.

I thank the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired.

The Senator from Massachusetts has 6 minutes.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I listened with great interest to my friend and colleague from the State of Utah talk about the role of the Federal Government. But he was not describing this bill. I think—I am sure—that the citizens of Utah and other communities have heard his very eloquent and compelling statements. But he is not describing what the health planning bill is all about.

As the Senator, when he reads the bill, will find out, the purpose of the health systems agency is to have local people in local communities making local decisions to decide what kind of facilities they need, what kind of services they want, and what kind of equipment they want. That is what the health planning bill is all about: Health service agencies made up of people who are providers, made up of local doctors, made up of consumers making decisions about what they need in the local community——

Mr. HATCH. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. KENNEDY. Not just yet, I will not yield.

To indulge in all this rhetoric about the Federal Government is not describing this bill. It may be describing some figment of the imagination of the Senator from Utah, but it is not describing the bill.

Mr. HATCH. Will the Senator yield on that point?

Mr. KENNEDY. No. When I finish, I shall yield; not until then. I have listened to what is basically a distortion of what this bill is about and what it is doing in the various local communities, letting local people make these decisions.

The fact of the matter is, as we listened to the Senator from Utah, you would not even think that the Federal Government is spending some $48 billion that are going into Utah hospitals under medicare and medicaid. You would not think the Federal Government has anything to do with that.

We are the people paying the bill and what we have tried to do in this legislation is to balance and let local people make these decisions. But the Senator from Utah is saying, "Oh, no," that if, on the one hand, the local people in Salt Lake City make a decision that they need a certain amount to provide services, that another group can come in that has no accountability to the local community making local decisions and set up whatever they want.

That is effectively what the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky and the Senator from Utah does.

Now, on the issue of containment of costs, the Congressional Budget Office figures in terms of just five States, Colorado, Florida, Louisiana, Maryland, and Mississippi, local people in local control effectively reduced the amount of the request for major hospitalization, and institutionalization, $150 million last year, $150 million that was not spent between 1973 and 1976.

If we provide a reasonable extrapolation on that of about 50 percent of the original cost for operating expenses, which is another $75 million, largely paid for by Uncle Sam and we are talking about $225 million in five States alone.

In five States alone, yet I do not hear either the Senators from Maryland coming in here, or the Senators from Mississippi coming in, or the Senators from Colorado coming in saying that when they saw those reductions the people in Pueblo or Colorado Springs were getting poorer health care.

No one said that. This bill has been on the legislative calendar for a series of days and I have yet to hear someone say, "Senator, we need this amendment because my people aren't getting decent health care."

Not one. Not one.

Mr. President, how much time do I have?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has 1 minute remaining.

Mr. KENNEDY. I will yield 15 seconds for a question.

Mr. HATCH. What we are finding out, we are getting darned good health care right now and we do not want it screwed up by the Federal Government because that is what happens.

The 26 States exempted this and said they did not want anything to do with the certificate of need requirements, and you are taking that away from those States and many others.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. HATCH. I ask for 15 more seconds. I would like to ask the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts——

Mr. KENNEDY. Ten seconds.

Mr. HATCH. Ten seconds.

[Laughter.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair admonishes the galleries to preserve quiet.

Mr. KENNEDY. How much time do we have on the bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has 7 minutes remaining on the bill.

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield 2 minutes.

Mr. HATCH. I am very grateful to the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, who is my friend. However, we do vastly disagree on the approach to government in our society toda

I might add that he is part of the group that has, it seems to me, dominated this country for 42 of the last 46 years and he is in a good position to state what he wants to today.

But I am in a good position to state what the States and individual people want. They want just as good health care without Federal Government interference and dominance.

Is it not true, I ask the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, that 26 States have said they do not want anything to do with the certificate of need requirements in doctors' offices.

Mr. KENNEDY. Excuse me.

Mr. HATCH. I am sorry. Is it not true that 26 States in our country have said, "We don't want anything to do with the certificate of need requirements of the Federal Government in our doctors' offices"?

Mr. KENNEDY. I will have to take a look at it.

Mr. HATCH. Let me state for the record, that is true.

What the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts is doing here is not giving States rights or individual local community rights to individual local situations. He is bringing the almighty Federal Government in under circumstances where we have the best health care system in the world, in a way I think will take away the best health care system in the world, and certainly in rural and other areas where doctors can presently apply these, and without any real basis, other than, I think, theoretical.

I am particularly grateful to the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts for granting me the 15 seconds plus 10 seconds plus 2 minutes. I thank the Senator very much.

Mr. KENNEDY. Just in response, I yield myself 1 minute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On the bill?

Mr. KENNEDY. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. One minute.

Mr. KENNEDY. All the States will have certificate of need laws which will be required for facilities.

What we are saying is that as a matter of findings by our committee, that in cases of those that would be prejudiced by the amendment of the Senator from Utah and the Senator from Kentucky, are the ones that are providing under the prepaid program cost effective health care benefits.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, have the yeas and nays been ordered?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays follow because they were ordered prior to the request for the division. They apply to both divisions.

Mr. KENNEDY. I move to table the first section of the Senator's amendment.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion to lay on the table the first section of the amendment. The yeas and nays have been ordered and the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. CRANSTON. I announce that the Senator from Minnesota (Mr. ANDERSON) and the Senator from Minnesota (Mrs. HUMPHREY) are necessarily absent.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Minnesota (Mrs. HUMPHREY) would vote "yea."

Mr. STEVENS. I announce that the Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. BROOKE) is necessarily absent.

The result was announced—yeas 57, nays 40, as follows:

So the motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is open to further amendment. Who yields time?

Mr. SCHWEIKER. Mr. President, I yield 5 minutes to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. MATSUNAGA. Will the Senator yield for a unanimous-consent request?

Mr. WALLOP. I am happy to yield.

Mr. MATSUNAGA. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a member of my staff, Mr. John McLaren, be granted the privilege of the floor during consideration of the pending bill and any vote thereon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. WALLOP. Mr. President, I had intended to call up an amendment but owing to some complications that were unforeseen, I have decided not to. I have asked the sponsors of the bill for time to bring up a point of genuine concern that I see in the trend of programs generally and, in particular, in this program. I am concerned about that trend and though it is difficult to articulate, it is very real.

Many agencies are given a certain amount of money and told to spend it, otherwise for the next year they will get less. We create and encourage the "spend it or lose it" attitude. There is very little accountability and very little incentive to curb Government waste. All too often, we read of agencies which go into a spending frenzy at the end of the fiscal year just so they will not have their funds cut for the next year. Mr. President, I find this practice deplorable. It is particularly upsetting at a time when competition for Federal funds is keen, and public consciousness about Federal spending is rising to new heights. The American people should not and will not tolerate this attitude of spend it or lose it. We should be examining ways to save it, rather than encouraging, even demanding, excuses to spend it. We should examine all possible cost-cutting alternatives.

The Public Health Systems Act, the bill we are currently debating, is basically a good bill, and I intend to support it. But I believe that we should have increased the accountability throughout, especially minimally funded HSA's. Here is a situation where we allocate a lump of money and say "go spend." In my own State of Wyoming, the director of the Wyoming Health Systems Planning Agency maintains that he could get by with less money, if a discretionary fund were made available to them for special circumstances. Here we have an example of an agency which is required to spend money under Federal guidelines which may or may not fit the needs of that particular State. Do not misunderstand me; Wyoming has a definite commitment to public health, and can use money wisely.

If introduced, my amendment would have increased the accountability of minimally funded HSA's by setting their level of funds at the House authorization level, $200,000, rather than the Senate level of $250,000. These HSA's could operate on the $200,000 budget if there were adequate discretionary funds available to cover unforeseen contingencies. In future authorizations we would both lower the relative authorization level and create a discretionary fund for minimally funded HSA's. My amendment also provided for a separate discretionary fund to be reserved for minimally funded HSA's. This would encourage frugality, and if additional expenses could be justified, they could be granted.

Mr. President, the justification for this amendment is simple. All minimally funded HSA's are given a set amount of money, disregarding the variance in population size served and the amount of square miles covered by the agency. Populations for minimally funded HSA's vary anywhere from 500,000—499,964 in the case of Connecticut—down to about 14,000, as in the case of the Northern Marianas. All of them get the same amount of money. The square miles covered by minimally funded agencies varies from a vast 207,000 in Alaska, to Maryland with 2,211 square miles. Yet each of these agencies is getting an equal amount of money without having to justify the need.

I realize that there are certain requirements which must be met by each HSA to comply with Federal Government regulations, such as the minimum five-member staff. All HSA's must administer the same type of program by submitting through their board a health systems plan and by establishing an annual implementation plan which describes the objectives and goals and priorities of the HSA. These plans must be published and available to the public.

Mr. President, I will not argue the need and valuable function that HSA's serve in this country. Wyoming has been lucky to have an extremely successful agency for the last 3 years and I recognize the important contribution this agency has made in the area of health planning in my State.

My argument is based on the principles of allocating a set amount of money for a program whether or not it can justify its need. It staggers me to realize that our funding is not set by the use of a budget but by distributing an amount of money which is exactly the same for 66 small agencies in the United States.

The use of the discretionary fund for minimally funded HSA's is a valuable tool. If we set the funding at the lower House level and ask agencies to justify their need for additional money, then we eliminate the problem of waste and abuse of money which is appropriated but not necessarily needed. It is impossible for me to believe that all 66 of these small HSA's need exactly the same amount, considering the wide diversity in sizes of populations and square miles covered in their areas. It only makes good sense to begin funding at lower levels, making these agencies aware that more money is available if needed. Travel expenses in some States, such as Wyoming, are staggering. It is possible that additional moneys are needed for just this type of additional expense. However, these HSA's should not argue against a cut when money is available for them if they can justify the need for it.

While everyone, individual citizens, bureaucrats, and politicians preach fiscal conservation, it's much easier to digest when you are not directly affected. I appreciate my distinguished colleagues' efforts on the committee in the past few months to accommodate Senators who have found ways to cut the so-called fat from several health bills. If I were interested in serving the selfish interest of only my State, I would have no doubt tried to pad this amendment, rather than cut it. However, my main consideration is for the taxpayers who deserve to get the most for their money and oftentimes do not.

I believe that saving money and requiring agencies to be accountable for amounts spent is most important. I am aware that some problems could arise if small agencies are required to go to the Secretary of HEW in order to receive additional funds. It has been pointed out to me that many small agencies fear that money will be withheld if their State is not held in favorable light by the present administration. If this is the way discretionary funds are being used, then we need to work on an alternate way of administering them fairly and with no political interference. The health of our constituents should not be a political favor.

My amendment was one which would promote careful and frugal spending practices by minimally funded health agencies. It is in no way interfering with their ability to perform their duties yet is merely asking that additional funds over $200,000 be justified and accounted for.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, the Senator from Wyoming raises an important issue. We did extensive research and found out what would be an appropriate recommendation. The recommendation was reviewed in detail by the HEW and came to $250,000. The House has $200,000. I give assurance to the Senator from Wyoming that we shall review this very, very carefully. We shall welcome the opportunity, prior to the conference, to go over this with the Senator from Wyoming and try to insure that the concerns of the Senator from Wyoming are brought out at the conference and in the conference recommendations.

I think the Senator raises a good, valid point. I think the best information that we have had today has been that the figures we have outlined in the bill will be necessary to permit the HSA's to fulfill their function. But we shall review that in careful detail and consider the remarks of the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. WALLOP. I thank the Senator from Massachusetts. I simply say that in the future, I hope we shall go to something more attuned to need than the present system. Obviously, from a population of a half million to 14.000, there has to be some difference. Perhaps the half million is underfunded. Certainly, 14,000 is overfunded. Somewhere between lie my State and some other States. I hope we can get down to the business of requiring budgets, asking for justification, and requiring a good deal more flexibility and accountability than the Senate bill does.

Mr. KENNEDY. The Senator knows we have enormous difficulty working out formulas around here, but the point the Senator raises is a valid one and we shall raise that in conference and demand some additional information from HEW. We shall try to come back from the conference with a position which is justifiable.

Mr. WALLOP. I thank my colleague and hope he will not focus entirely on my State, since I just raised the issue.

Mr. KENNEDY. I thank the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. KENNEDY. I think the Senator from New Jersey has an amendment.

AMENDMENT NO. 3239

(Purpose: To establish a Commission on Alcoholism and other alcohol-related problems)

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have an amendment, Mr. President. I call up amendment No. 3239 and ask that it be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from New Jersey (Mr. WILLIAMS), Mr. KENNEDY, Mr. JAVITS, and Mr. HATCH, proposes an amendment numbered 3239.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 86, after line 6, add the following:

TITLE IV—NATIONAL COMMISSION ON ALCOHOLISM

ESTABLISHMENT OF A NATIONAL COMMISSION ON ALCOHOLISM AND OTHER ALCOHOL-RELATED PROBLEMS

SEC. 401. (a) There is established a Commission to be known as the National Commission on Alcoholism and other Alcohol-Related Problems (hereinafter in this section referred to as the "Commission"). The Commission shall be composed of—

(1) four Members of the Senate appointed by the President of the Senate;

(2) four Members of the House of Representatives appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives; and

(3) 11 members appointed by the President upon recommendation of the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare. At no time shall more than two of the members appointed under paragraph (1), or more than two of the members appointed under paragraph (2), or more than six of the members appointed under paragraph (3) be members of the same political party.

(b) (1) The President shall designate one of the members of the Commission as Chairman, and one as Vice Chairman. Ten members of the Commisison shall constitute a quorum, but a lesser number may conduct hearings.

(2) Members of the Commission who are Members of Congress or full-time officers or employees of the United States shall serve without additional compensation but shall be reimbursed for travel, subsistence, and other necessary expenses incurred in the performance of the duties vested in the Commission. Other members of the Commission shall receive $100 per diem while engaged in the actual performance of the duties vested in the Commission, plus reimbursement for travel, subsistence, and other necessary expenses incurred in the performance of such duties.

(3) The Commission shall meet at the call of the Chairman or at the call of a majority of the members thereof.

(c)(1) The Commission shall have the power to appoint and fix the compensation of such personnel as it deems advisable, without regard to the provisions of title 5, United States Code, governing appointments in the competitive service, and the provisions of chapter 51 and subchapter III of chapter 53 of such title, relating to classification and General Schedule pay rates.

(2) The Commission may procure, in accordance with the provisions of section 3109 of title 5 United States Code, the temporary or intermittent services of experts or consultants. Persons so employed shall receive compensation at a rate to be fixed by the Commission, but not in excess of $75 per diem, including traveltime. While away from his home or regular place of business in the performance of services for the Commission, any such person may be allowed travel expenses, including per diem in lieu of subsistence, as authorized by section 5703(b) of title 5, United States Code, for persons in the Government service employed intermittently.

(3) The Commission may secure directly from any department or agency of the United States information necessary to enable it to carry out its duties under this section. Upon request of the Chairman of the Commission, such department or agency shall furnish such information to the Commission.

STUDY AND REPORT

SEC. 402. (a) The Commission shall conduct a study of alcoholism and alcohol-related problems including, but not limited to, the following areas:

(1) an assessment of unmet treatment needs of alcoholics and their families;

(2) an assessment of manpower needs in the fields of research, treatment, and prevention;

(3) an assessment of the integration of alcoholism treatment into ongoing health and social health care services within communities;

(4) an assessment of the need for integration of alcoholism services into existing fiscal support systems, including national health insurance;

(5) An evaluation of the accessibility of services and quality of care, including rural as well as urban areas;

(6) the relationship of alcohol use to aggressive behavior and crime;

(7) the relationship of alcohol use to family violence;

(8) the relationship of alcoholism to the high rates of illnesses, particularly those with a high stress component, among family members of alcoholics;

(9) an evaluation of the effectiveness of prevention programs, including the relevance of alcohol control laws and regulations to alcoholism and alcohol-related problems;

(10) a survey of the unmet research needs in the area of alcoholism and alcohol-related problems; and

(11) an evaluation of the needs of special and underserved population groups.

(b) The Commission shall submit to the President and the Congress such interim reports as it deems advisable and shall within eighteen months after the date on which funds first become available to carry out the provisions of this section submit to the President and the Congress a final report which shall contain a detailed statement of its findings and conclusions and also such recommendations for legislation and administrative actions as it deems appropriate. The Commission shall cease to exist sixty days after the final report is submitted under this subsection.

COORDINATION AND AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS

SEC. 403. (a) The Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare shall be responsible for the coordination of the activities of the Commission.

(b) There are authorized to be appropriated for the purposes of this section $1,000,000 to remain available until expended.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, this amendment would create a National Commission on Alcoholism and Alcohol-Related Problems. The Commission would consist of Members of both Houses of Congress and of public members appointed by the President, upon the recommendation of the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare.

The amendment provides for compensation of the public members and employees of the Commission and for access to such information from Federal agencies as the Commission might require to enable it to carry out its duties.

The Commission would conduct an in-depth study of alcoholism and alcohol-related problems and of the Federal effort to combat these problems. The work of the Commission would be coordinated by the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare, and an appropriation of $1 million would be authorized to carry out the work of the Commission.

Mr. President, I am pleased that this amendment has the unanimous support of the other members of the Subcommittee on Alcoholism and Drug Abuse, Senator HATHAWAY and Senator HATCH, of the distinguished ranking minority member of the Human Resources Committee, Mr. JAVITS, and of the distinguished chairman of the Subcommittee on Health and Scientific Research, Mr. KENNEDY. The proposal for a national Commission also has the support of the National Coalition for Adequate Alcohol Programs, which consists of all the major national organizations interested in the Federal alcoholism effort, as well as the National Association of State Alcohol and Drug Abuse Directors, an organization comprised of the officially designated single State authorities for alcoholism and drug abuse.

The need for such a Commission has also been recognized by Secretary Califano, who has a deep interest in the problems surrounding the use and misuse of alcohol. Indeed, the Secretary has initiated a study of the agencies within HEW to determine how their programs can be coordinated to help address these issues. That study will be an important resource for the Commission as it begins its work.

Mr. President, the basis for establishing this national commission is contained in the report of the President's Commission on Mental Health. The Mental Health Commission pointed out that the cost to the Nation of alcoholism and alcohol-related problems is nearly twice that of the cost of mental illness. The report stated:

In the case of alcohol-related problems, we believe it is urgent that we develop a national plan of action. As a first step, the Commission recommends the creation of a broadly representative national group to analyze existing public policies and programs and to make recommendations for the future.

The Commission's Liaison Task Panel on Alcohol-Related Problems described the need for and possible characteristics of such a Commission and made a logical and convincing argument for such a Commission.

The drain on the economic and human resources of our society from alcoholism and alcohol-related problems is overwhelming. The economic drain amounts to $42.5 billion annually. Alcohol misuse is a significant factor in the instances of mortality from a number of chronic diseases, as well as in suicide, homicide, and accidents. The majority of highway deaths are alcohol-related. The misuse of alcohol plays a major role in many other areas of national concern, such as child abuse and marital violence cases, industrial accidents, assaults, robberies, drownings, freezings, and fires.

Mr. President, the problems surrounding the use and misuse of alcoholic beverages have a decided impact in many areas of the Federal Establishment and there is an urgent need for a comprehensive study cutting across Federal agencies. In passing the 1974 amendments to the Comprehensive Alcoholism and Alcohol Abuse Prevention, Treatment, and Rehabilitation Act, we hoped that the new Interagency Committee on Federal Activities for Alcohol Abuse and Alcoholism would effectively coordinate alcohol-related programs and policies.

However, this committee has not functioned effectively, in part because of insufficient interest and representation by other Federal agencies. Yet, a wide variety of Federal agencies impinge on alcohol problems or are involved in treatment or prevention programs. This includes not only the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, but the Department of Transportation, the Civil Service Commission, the State Department, the Veterans' Administration, the Department of Defense, and others.

No coordinated or comprehensive Federal policy can be established without a searching look at the current scope and nature of the problems, an assessment of what is presently being done, and the development of recommendations to address these needs.

Mr. President, there are a number of reasons why this is an especially auspicious and crucial moment for a sustained reexamination of national policies on alcohol-related problems. These problems are increasing in every segment of our society. I am particularly concerned about the increasing numbers of our children who are involved in serious alcohol-related problems and, indeed alcoholism itself. Millions of children are being raised in families where one or both parents are alcoholics. These children run a substantially increased risk of serious emotional problem in later life. Children of alcoholics also run a high risk of becoming alcoholics themselves in later years.

Mr. President, I urge the Senate to adopt this amendment, and I ask unanimouse consent that excerpts from the report of the Liaison Task Panel on Alcohol-Related Problems of the President's Commission on Mental Health, be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the excerpts were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REPORT OF THE LIAISON TASK PANEL ON ALCOHOL-RELATED PROBLEMS

SUMMARY

The Liaison Task Panel on Alcohol-Related Problems has, as its primary recommendation, urged the President's Commission on Mental Health to propose a National Commission on Alcoholism and Other Alcohol-Related Problems. In support of this proposal, the Task Panel presents its findings with regard to the scope, magnitude, and nature of the diverse and complex problems surrounding the use of beverage alcohol in this country.

The second major position of the Task Panel has to do with coverage under any National Health Insurance plan. The medical complications associated with frequent, heavy alcohol usage are more prevalent and more serious than with most mental health conditions. These associated morbidities and sequelae support a stronger argument for inclusion of alcoholism on the same basis as any other chronic health condition. The contention of the panel is that the medical aspects are currently being treated without addressing the underlying causation, resulting in inappropriate—and perhaps more expensive—treatment.

Other options offered by the Task Panel relate to situations where there is an interface between mental health and alcohol-related problems. Even in these instances, both the commonality and uniqueness of the two areas, i.e., mental health problems and alcohol-related problems, are explicated.

Briefly, the findings of the Task Panel resulted in the following recommendations:

1. That the Commission recommend to the President that he initiate and support the establishment of a National Commission on Alcoholism and Alcohol-Related Problems to investigate the various aspects and manifestations of alcohol-related problems, examine and evaluate the existing remedial actions, and make recommendations on an integrated national alcohol problems prevention and treatment policy to both the President and the Congress.

2. That in the adoption of any national health insurance plan or alternative funding support for health care, the treatment of alcoholism, and of the problems of the family of the alcoholic, be categorically covered at a level no less than that of any other illness.

3. That adequate resources be committed to devise, implement, and evaluate strategies of prevention, recognizing that such strategies require long-term allowances for effective evaluation

4. That the Federal financial commitment for research on alcoholism and other alcohol-related problems be substantially increased to a level of at least $30 million for fiscal year 1979 and that both authorizations and appropriations for subsequent years be commensurate with the need for sound policy and planning efforts.

5. That the Commission emphasize the need for greater sensitivity by policymakers and service providers to the needs of special population groups who are at particularly high risk in connection with alcohol problems or who are now served either inadequately or inappropriately. Such groups include but are not limited to women, youth, the disabled, the aged, homosexuals, migrant workers, children of alcoholics, Blacks, American Indians, Spanish-speaking Americans, and Asian Americans.

6. That the Commission recognize and endorse the need for quality assurance programs in the areas of mental illness, drug abuse, and alcoholism treatment services and further recommend to the President that these fields be given responsibility, as appropriate, to develop their unique quality assurance programs under any national health insurance plan adopted in the future. Further, that these programs be oriented toward clients rather than providers and that there be monitoring of alcoholism services rendered including accountability to the planning process and the funds allocated.

7. That in view of the success of certain Community Mental Health Centers in rendering effective alcoholism treatment services, the Commission encourage the development of similarly effective and accountable programs in those Community Mental Health Centers whose service areas do not currently contain adequate alcoholism treatment capacity, as well as in those State mental hospitals where alcoholism treatment services are still in existence. This recommendation is not intended to designate a mental health setting as the treatment milieu of choice for alcohol problems but rather to recognize the substantive percentage of people currently seeking help for alcohol-related problems through the mental health delivery system.

The Liaison Task Panel on Alcohol-Related Problems has attempted to be responsive to the charge of the President's Commission on Mental Health. The Task Panel felt that it could only fulfill its responsibility if the report reflected its perceptions regarding the nature and size of the problem and if the recommendations it made grew out of those perceptions. If it were necessary to distill the Panel's priority concern into one recommendation, it would be that an adequately funded and staffed National Commission on Alcoholism and Alcohol-Related Problems be established to look at the problem area in the context and depth it so obviously requires.

ALCOHOL-RELATED PROBLEMS

Until recent years the scope, nature, and severity of problems stemming from the consumption of beverage alcohol in the United States has received minimal attention. Such data as were generated by responsible groups received at best ambivalent response from the public or from organizations, groups, individuals, and governmental agencies whose considerations and activities were, or should have been, affected. In fact, the use of beverage alcohol in this country lacks consistent cultural norms, reflecting the diversity of cultures from which our people stem, and this has hindered the formulation of any general pattern recognizably national in character. The use of alcohol, however, as much as many people find it gratifying and rewarding, is associated with many severe health and social problems. Ey some accountings, mortality from alcohol problems ranks third in size after heart disease and cancer. A recently completed study sponsored by the National Institute on Alcohol Abuse and Alcoholism (NIAAA) set the cost of alcohol problems at $42.75 billion for 1975, substantially above the costs assigned to any other public health problem area so studied. (Third Report to Congress on Alcohol and Health, National Institute on Alcohol Abuse and Alcoholism, Rockville, 1977.[1]) While the exact figures are arguable, there is no doubt that the social costs generated by alcohol-related problems are astronomical.

An examination of the supporting data reveals that the health care component of this total is $12.74 billion, the greater portion of which, $8.4 billion, is accounted for by hospital care for injury and illness. The latter figure represents 20 percent of the total cost to the Nation of this particular category of health care. Examination of the full extent of the negative consequences of alcohol misuse suggests that it plays a significant role in mortality from a number of chronic diseases as well as in such specific causes of death as suicide, homicide, and accidents, many of which are not traditionally associated with alcohol use. It is worth noting just a few of these to accent the size of alcohol-related problems. Literally a mass of evidence accumulated in over a score or more studies in this area demonstrates that drivers with blood alcohol levels of 0.10 percent or higher (the legal driving impairment level in many jurisdictions) are involved in from 35 percent to 59 percent of highway fatalities, depending on the particular methodology and population examined.

Fatalities from single vehicle crashes range from 41 percent to 72 percent alcohol involvement, while nonfatal crashes of drinking drivers appear to have more severe consequences than for nondrinking drivers. As death from falls is the second greatest cause of accidental death in the United States, it is notable that studies demonstrate alcohol involvement to a highly significant degree. Violent crime has long been associated with alcohol consumption; and research findings here demonstrate that in homicide alone, the range of offenders using alcohol at the time of the offense is from 28 percent to 86 percent, while victims show alcohol use involvement from 40 percent to 60 percent, again depending on the study being examined. Studies on suicide demonstrate a disproportionately high rate among people with a history of alcoholism or heavy drinking. Other casualties and crimes with alcohol use as a component include child abuse, marital violence, industrial accidents, assault, rape, robbery, drownings, freezings, and fires. Alcohol is involved in such casualties and crimes both in the sense of drinking and drunkenness in the event itself and in the sense of an overinvolvement of those with a history of heavy drinking or alcoholism.

Despite a comparatively conservative Federal commitment—a little over $1 billion total in the 7 years since establishment of the NIAAA—there have been positive changes in several problem areas. Thus, a modest research budget has produced valuable findings, not the least of which has been the recognition of the fetal alcohol syndrome, which has resulted in the dissemination of a cautionary statement by the Secretary of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare. Training programs have begun to have effects. Beginning in 1978, questions on alcoholism will for the first time be included in the examination of the National Board of Medical Examiners. There has also been an increasing acceptance of the appropriateness of including alcoholism treatment in health insurance plans. Despite this record, progress has been markedly limited in comparison with the clear need, and the indications are that greater effort by the Federal establishment is essential and potentially effective. The firm opinion of the Panel is that the current low level of Federal response should be raised to a priority commensurate with the magnitude of the problem, and that the Commission lend its support to this goal in view of the many areas in which mental health and alcohol problems bear strongly on each other. To this end, the Panel reiterates its recommendations and offers a basic rationale for each.

Up to the present the Federal response has been primarily through the National Institute on Alcohol Abuse and Alcoholism, which has been hampered by the lack of a firm knowledge base, a pattern of fundings that has frustrated coherent planning, and by staffing limitations that have impeded effective evaluation activity and attempts to ensure fiscal responsibility and accountability in the programs it has supported across the country. The overwhelming demand, and need, for treatment services has been a consistent drain on a limited NIAAA budget, to the almost total exclusion of other efforts. Only recently, for instance, has research begun to assume a priority position, and its budget still remains substantially below other agencies functioning within related problem areas. NIAAA's financially starved prevention demonstration program recently funded its first new grants in almost 3 years. With NIAAA staffing limitations barring effective program evaluation, and faced with a token research budget, much of the Federal effort centered in this agency has of necessity been promulgated more on faith than on known fact.

Staffing of the NIAAA, both as to numbers and as to composition, needs to be examined. Increased responsibilities for the lead agency at the Federal level in the alcohol field will require increased and improved staffing. NIAAA has historically been considerably understaffed for its responsibilities and has often not been able to recruit staff of appropriate abilities. This has frequently resulted in the use of contractual mechanisms for fulfilling responsibilities which should properly be accomplished by staff.

There is an immediate and pressing need for improved coordination of the Federal alcoholism effort. The existing interagency committee for coordinating alcohol-relevant programs and policies has not functioned effectively, in part because of insufficient interest and representation by other Federal agencies. A wide variety of Federal agencies impinge on alcohol problems or are involved in treatment or prevention programs. The existing committee should be strengthened and new mechanisms of bilateral and multilateral coordination developed.

Given the current state of the art and of the social attitudes toward alcoholism, drug abuse, and mental health, the Panel asks that the Commission recommend to the President the retention not only of categorical funding for alcoholism but the maintenance of NIAAA as a seperate entity. It is unrealistic to predict the feasibility at any fixed point in the future of some combination of the lead Federal agencies on mental health, drug abuse, and alcoholism. However, any merger of the three in the near term for administrative efficiency could seriously undermine the progress made to date in the visibility, degree of acceptance as a valid public health problem, and generation of support among both policymakers and the general public for efforts to reduce alcoholism and alcohol-related problems.

As noted above, the Liaison Task Panel found it impossible within the constraints of time and resources to develop and present recommendations on the full range of alcohol problems policy issues. The Panel also felt such an attempt would be inappropriate within the framework of the President's Commission on Mental Health; while many alcohol problems are mental health problems, and in fact a substantial part of treatment services for mental health is treating alcohol problems, there are also many important dimensions of alcohol problems which lie outside the scope of mental health problems. Hence our first and foremost recommendation below is for a national commission specifically addressed to alcohol problems.

Our other recommendations are made in the light of this first recommendation and in accordance with three criteria: (a) topics specifically relevant to mental health concerns and services; (b) topics where alcohol problems policy is likely to be affected by the Commission's recommendations on mental health; and (c) topics of sufficient urgency and with enough unanimity to merit action in advance of the deliberations of a commission on alcohol problems.

ISSUE NO. 1: NATIONAL COMMISSION ON ALCOHOLISM AND ALCOHOL-RELATED PROBLEMS

We have already sketched in our introductory comments some of the dimensions of alcohol's impact on American life, in terms of mortality, sickness, family and job problems, accidents, crime, mental illness, and quality of life. Repeatedly in the last decades Presidential or national commissions have noted alcohol problems as a substantial problem in terms of their field of reference, but have addressed themselves to alcohol problems issues only peripherally or in a limited frame.[2]

There is, of course, a very substantial overlap between mental health problems and alcohol problems, just as there are substantial overlaps of alcohol problems and a variety of health, public safety, and welfare problems. But, as suggested by the experience of commissions on law enforcement, drug abuse, and mental health, alcohol problems as a whole cannot be adequately addressed in any particular non-alcohol framework, since alcohol problems reach across so wide a variety of aspects of life.

There are a number of reasons why this is an especially auspicious and crucial moment for a sustained examination of national policies on alcohol-related problems. In the last 15 years, average consumption of alcohol in the drinking-age population has risen by over 30 percent, and survey data suggest that the proportion of heavy drinkers in the population grew substantially in the 1960's. Rises in the rate of heavy drinkers are generally associated with eventual rises in the long-term health consequences of alcohol such as cirrhosis mortality. Other major changes in drinking patterns have also occurred, often with unknown consequences. For instance, in the last 30 years there has been a decisive shift from tavern drinking to drinking in homes, and other private locations. Meanwhile, the basic frameworks of State and Federal alcohol control laws and regulations have remained unchanged and largely unexamined since their adoption at the repeal of prohibition. Only recently is it becoming recognized that these regulatory systems are relevant to alcohol problems policymaking.

Recent years have seen a substantial growth in the recognition of governmental responsibility for the prevention and treatment of alcohol problems. Beginning in many States in the 1950's, and at the Federal level in the 1960's and 1970's, substantial treatment systems and facilities for alcoholism and various alcohol-related problems have been organized and funded. An NIAAA table on Estimated Caseloads for 1976 suggests the dimensions and polymorphous nature of governmental alcoholism treatment efforts. If this aggregation of services can be called a system, it has never been comprehensively examined as such. Basic decisions about alcohol services need to be made in the near future, such as their relation to community needs, their sources of funding on a continuing basis, and their relationship to health maintenance organizations and national health insurance. Equally important, the nature and dimensions of alcohol problems prevention programs and measures need to be addressed as part of the construction of a national alcohol policy.

RECOMMENDATION

That the Commission recommend to the President that he initiate and support the establishment of a National Commission on Alcoholism and Other Alcohol-Related Problems. The panel urges that this commission be adequately funded and staffed for a 2-year term, with representation from appropriate areas of Federal, State, and local government, the Congress, the sciences, and knowledgeable spokespersons from the public, voluntary, and private sectors of the field. The charge of the commission should be to investigate the various aspects and manifestations of alcohol-related problems, examine and evaluate the existing remedial actions, and make recommendations on an integrated national alcohol problems prevention and treatment policy to both the President and the Congress.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I rise in support of the amendment .

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Would the Senator kindly suspend? Who yields time?

Mr. SCHWEIKER. I yield the Senator 2 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On the bill.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I rise in support of this amendment. I cosponsored this amendment because my own relationship to the subject goes back to 1970 when I first joined with the Senator from Utah (Mr. Moss), the predecessor of Senator HATCH, in the Comprehensive Alcohol Abuse and Prevention, Treatment, and Rehabilitation Act of 1970.

That act established a commission called the Commission on Alcoholism and Drug Abuse. The results of that Commission's work were very impressive. One of the major contributions of the Commission was the finding that alcoholism was a medical problem, which was later confirmed by the Supreme Court.

We are in the situation of arresting a tide which is created by the mixed problem of social drinking and alcoholism. This proposed Commission is essential for it will give us a new platform from which to proceed.

Mr. President, while the problems associated with alcoholism have been very clearly outlined by Senator WILLIAMS, I wish to address one other.

Alcoholism is one of the principal problems of American industry. Absenteeism attributable to alcoholism is a major factor which contributes to declining productivity in industry.

For all those reasons, Mr. President, I hope very much that the Senate will adopt this amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia.

Who yields time?

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Will the Senator from New Jersey permit me to ask several questions?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. The Senator from New Jersey mentioned a number of existing programs in this field. Does the amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey take the place of those programs or is this an additional program?

Mr. WILLIAMS. This is not a program. This is a commission. This amendment would create a commission to look at problems and the present programs to alleviate them. Hopefully, suggestions for greater efficiency in the carrying out of present programs will be developed. The report of the commission would suggest those things that are not being done to reach people in need in this area of alcoholism and alcohol abuse.

It does not specifically, to answer the Senator from Virginia, replace present programs, many of which we are finding so helpful in meeting the need of people who have this particular disease, and need treatment, rehabilitation, counseling, et cetera.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. What is the termination date?

Mr. WILLIAMS. This calls for a report in 18 months. That seems to be a rather short time, but that is a pattern that has evolved here for studies. It will be sunset in 18 months.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Sunset in 18 months?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. I thank the Senator.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I yield.

Mr. DOLE. I think the Senator may have answered the question of the Senator from Kansas.

On page 3, subsection (c), it indicates that the commission shall have the power to appoint and fix the compensation of such personnel as it deems advisable, without regard to provisions of title V, United States Code, governing employment in Federal service, and so forth.

I assume that we are not envisioning a large staff. There does not seem to be any limit on the size of the staff.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The limitation will be the amount of money that is authorized and appropriated. Of necessity, it will not be a large staff. We have drawn from the experience of other commissions in applying this language for the designation of staff for the commission.

There is no danger, I say to the Senator from Kansas, that there will be a large number of personnel in the creation of a staff. The study has its limitation of time as well.

Mr. DOLE. In 18 months. I guess you could hire a lot of people in 18 months. I do not know how to define "large." I know that the Senator from New Jersey would want it to be a responsive staff.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am glad the Senator has raised this question.

It seems to me that of those Members appointed from the Senate—there would be four Members—I believe it would be wise if present staff working on the subcommittee dealing with alcoholism, alcohol problems, and alcohol programs were drawn on, so far as we are concerned.

Mr. DOLE. We have had this come up with certain health commissions, where they have drawn on personnel who had the experience in HEW, to save the additional expense.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is wise. Of course, the Secretary of HEW is key in many ways to this Commission. He will be advising the President and will be in on the selection of ex officio members from departments, and we know that those departments have staff.

Mr. DOLE. I thank the Senator.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Carlton Betenbaugh be permitted access to the floor during the consideration of this measure.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HATHAWAY. Mr. President, I am pleased to cosponsor the pending amendment offered by the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Human Resources, my good friend Senator WILLIAMS, and I urge its adoption by my colleagues.

The amendment would establish a National Commission on Alcoholism, comprised of eight Members of Congress and an additional 11 public members appointed by the President, upon recommendation of the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare. The commission is charged with conducting a study of alcoholism and alcohol-related problems in our society, and is required to assess and evaluate a variety of factors relating to this disease, including treatment and manpower needs, quality of care, and the relationship to crime, family violence, and to other illnesses. The commission is also charged with conducting a survey of unmet needs, and the needs of special population groups, along with assessing the potential for integration of alcoholism treatment into ongoing health care services, and any national health insurance proposal which emerges.

Appropriations of up to $1 million are authorized to allow the commission to fulfill this mandate, and it is to report its results, along with legislative recommendations, within 18 months of being established.

The tragic and growing toll which alcoholism has upon our society has been well-documented by my colleague. The economic cost in excess of $42 billion annually, the person and family tragedies, the linkages to auto fatalities and other deaths all call for our best efforts at formulating a comprehensive national policy. Alcoholism is no doubt one of the most widespread, and destructive of diseases, but at the same time is perhaps the least understood.

The commission proposed by this amendment could make an invaluable contribution to the understanding of the American people with respect to this complex and pervasive problem and to the formulation of policies directed at curbing it. I commend the Senator from New Jersey for proposing it. It has been my privilege to serve under his leadership as chairman of the full Human Resources Committee, but I have especially appreciated being able to work with him on the activities of the Subcommittee on Alcoholism and Drug Abuse, which I chair. His work today is but one example of his dedication and commitment to proposing and implementing workable solutions to these problems, and I look forward to our continued work together.

There are many good aspects of this amendment, but I point out in particular item (10), on page 5:

A survey of the unmet research needs in the area of alcoholism and alcohol-related problems.

It is ironic, Mr. President, that in this society, in which alcoholism is rated as the third greatest health menace, next to cancer and heart disease, we are spending no more than $10 million a year in research; whereas, with respect to heart disease and cancer, we are spending $400 to $500 million.

I am glad that that provision is included in this bill among the 11 items that should be surveyed by the commission. I feel reasonably certain that they will report back and indicate a strong recommendation for additional funds for research.

I join the Senator from New York in pointing out the loss of productivity we have as a result of alcoholism. I believe the figure is that last year we lost $43 billion in production, to say nothing of the losses caused by highway fatalities and other accidents, just because of alcohol.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. DOMENICI. I have an amendment to the amendment. Is it in order at this time?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Not until the time has been used or yielded back on the amendment.

Mr. DOMENICI. I ask the Senator from New Jersey if he is prepared to yield back his time.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield back the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time has been yielded back.

The Senator from New Mexico is recognized.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Lisa Falconer, of Senator STEVENS' staff, have the privilege of the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BENTSEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Louis Watts be granted privilege of the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1519

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I send to the desk an unprinted amendment and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from New Mexico (Mr. DOMENICI) proposes an unprinted amendment numbered 1519 to amendment No. 3239:

On page 5, between lines 17 and 18, insert the following new section (12) "An evaluation of the needs of native Americans."

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I will not take much time. I have circulated this amendment to the floor managers and the sponsors of the amendment, and I believe it is acceptable to them. I believe the amendment I am introducing is a very important one. It expands the areas of study for the National Commission on Alcoholism to also evaluate the needs of native Americans.

The commission that Senator WILLIAMS' amendment contemplates is badly needed in this country, and I am among those who hope that it will accomplish a great deal.

Alcoholism appears to be an increasing problem among native Americans. I do not have the evidence with me, but I think everyone will agree that it is becoming a significant social problem.

For example, I am aware than in the Navajo Nation, the largest group of native American Indians, the most serious social problem today is alcoholism. It is growing among the nonreservation Indians and it seems to be the result of our times and their culture.

I believe it is most appropriate that we specifically ask for an evaluation of alcoholism as it applies to the native Americans.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOMENICI. I am delighted to yield.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I thoroughly agree with the Senator. So far as I am concerned, I would like to accept the amendment, and I hope Senator WILLIAMS will find it acceptable.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I appreciate the need for the specificity with respect to Indians, for the evaluation of their needs, and I accept the amendment.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I ask that I be included as a cosponsor.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the name of the Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. KENNEDY) be included as an original cosponsor of my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DOMENICI. I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield back the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from New Mexico.

The amendment was agreed to.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1520

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment to the Williams amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. KENNEDY), for himself, Mr. CRANSTON, and Mr. HATHAWAY, proposes an unprinted amendment numbered 1520 to amendment No. 3239.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 2, line 8, strike out "and", and strike out lines 9 through 15 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

(3) 11 members appointed by the President upon recommendation of the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare; and

(4) ex officio members from agencies of the Federal government, appointed by the President, whose programs affect the prevention and treatment of alcoholism and such ex officio members shall be individuals with knowledge of programs administered by such agencies affecting the prevention and treatment of alcoholism.

At no time shall more than two of the members appointed under clause (1), or more than two of the members appointed under clause (2), or more than six of the members appointed under clause (3) be members of the same political party.

On page 3, on line 1, strike all after "Other" through line 5 and insert in lieu thereof "members of the Commission shall each be entitled to receive the daily equivalent of the annual rate of the basic pay in effect for grade GS-18 of the General Schedule for each day (including traveltime) during which they are engaged in the actual performance of the duties of the Commission; and, while away from their homes or regular places of business in the performance of duties of the Commission, they shall be allowed travel expenses, including per diem in lieu of subsistence, in the same manner as persons employed intermittently in the Government service are allowed expenses under section 5703(b) of title 5 of the United State Code.".

On page 3, on lines 20 and 21, strike out "but not in excess of $75 per diem, including traveltime" and insert in lieu thereof "but at rates for individuals not to exceed the daily equivalent of the annual rate of basic pay in effect for grade GS-18 of the General Schedule".

On page 4, on line 7, insert "the head of" after "Commission,", and on line 9 insert "consistent with applicable laws and regulations with respect to the privacy of medical records" before the period.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, on behalf of the Senator from California (Mr. CRANSTON) and the Senator from Maine (Mr. HATHAWAY) I send to the desk an amendment to make a minor modification to the pending amendment. I understand that this modification is acceptable to the author of the amendment, the Senator from New Jersey (Mr. WILLIAMS).

Very simply, this amendment, first, insures that the personal privacy rights of patients will be protected in any disclosure of information to the commission by any Federal department or agency; second, it makes technical changes with respect to the per diem and travel reimbursements paid members of the commission and consultants to that commission; and third, it provides for ex officio members on the commission to represent those Federal agencies which have programs affecting prevention and treatment of alcoholism, such as HEW in order to insure that the expertise of those agencies in alcoholism and other alcohol-related problems is fully available in the deliberations of the commission.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be considered en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I support the amendment, and I yield back my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts.

The amendment (UP No. 1520) was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey, as amended.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1521

Mr. SCHWEIKER. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Pennsylvania (Mr. SCHWEIKER) proposes an unprinted amendment numbered 1521, an amedment to 3239:

On page 2, line 5 strike the semicolon and add the following, "upon the recommendation of the majority and minority leaders."

Mr. SCHWEIKER. Mr. President, this is an amendment so that Senator WILLIAMS' amendment will conform to the present procedure in the appointment of the representatives of the Senate. I have cleared it with the Senator from New Jersey. It simply says that Members of the Senate appointed by the President pro tempore will be appointed "upon the recommendation of the majority and minority leaders." It is intended to protect the prerogatives of the majority and minority leaders.

I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I approve, and I yield back the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania to the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey, as amended.

The amendment was agreed to.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1522

(Purpose: To extend eligibility for Federal matching of non-Federal contributions to minimally funded health systems agencies)

Mr. GRAVEL. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Alaska (Mr. GRAVEL) proposes an unprinted amendment numbered 1522.

Mr. GRAVEL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 57, line 2 and 3, insert the following new section and renumber subsequent sections accordingly:

"SEC. 130. Section 1516(b) is further amended by adding at the end of the following new paragraph:

'(4) For the fiscal year ending September 30, 1978 if the amount of the grant of a health systems agency is determined under paragraph (b)(3) of this section, and if the application of such grant contains assurances satisfactory to the Secretary that the agency will expend or obligate in the period in which such grant will be available for obligation non-Federal funds meeting the requirements of subparagraph (B) for the purposes for which such grant may be made such grant shall be increased by an amount equal to the lesser of (I) the amount of such non-Federal funds with respect to which the assurances were made, or (II) the product of $0.25 and the population of the health service area for which the agency is designated.'"

Mr. GRAVEL. Mr. President, I am offering an amendment to the Health Planning and Resources Development Act Reauthorization, which I think will correct a misinterpretation of congressional intent. This amendment would extend to the minimally-funded health systems agencies (HSA) eligibility for Federal matching funds of local contributions.

The law provides that HSA's who successfully raise local contributions to augment their Federal grant will be eligible for additional Federal assistance. However, the law limits Federal matching assistance eligibility to those HSA's already receiving substantial Federal grants. The smaller population HSA's which receive a minimal grant from the Federal Government are not eligible.

Many of the smaller HSA's would not be eligible for even the minimal Federal grant of $175,000 based on the formula of $.50 per capita. The Department of Health, Education and Welfare realizing the inequity and imprudence of restricting these small HSA's to the formula has raised the grant for all the minimally designated HSA's to the maximum for their category, that is, $175,000. Since they have done this, HEW believes that they have already compensated the small HSA's for their ineligibility for matching funds.

The past 2 years of experience with the HSA's has shown that, in fact, it is the smaller HSA's which need additional help. HEW has responded by giving each of the minimally designated HSA's the maximum legal amount, regardless of the formula. The Human Resources Committee has responded by amending the reauthorization to raise the minimum funding level to $250,000 and allow Federal match for all local contributions. This action taken by the committee indicates their understanding of the economic burden placed on many of our smaller HSA's.

We have asked them to perform the same functions as the larger HSA's necessitating professional staff and considerable travel with greatly limited resources. Many of them would not have survived without local contrbutions. Yet, we have refused to extend to them the reward for their labors that has been available to all other HSA's. I do not believe Congress intended to use the matching funds as anything but a reward for organizing community support behind the HSA's. Realistically it is the local contributions and matching funds, when available, that have played a significant role in making the HSA's viable.

While I applaud the committee's action in extending Federal matching eligibility to the smaller HSA's, I want to recommend that this action become applicable immediately. The HSA's has a staggered Federal funding period beginning in April and ending in September.

Therefore, for many of them fiscal year 1978 has not even begun. If we wait till fiscal year 1979 to extend matching eligibility to them, we are forcing them to continue to administer their program with limited funds when the committee has already decided that they should be eligible.

Since HEW does not disburse matching funds until September, it would not be unreasonable to require them to include the six or seven minimally funded HSA's who have collected local contributions. Based on a rather rushed survey of the minimally funded HSA's, I estimate that they would only be eligible for a maximum match of $400,000. This is based on the $0.25 per capital formula that HEW uses to allocate matching funds.

I want to stress that HSA's currently eligible for match and anticipating matching funds in September would not realize any significant depletion in their awards. HEW consistently has over estimated the amount of local contribution eligible for match. They set-aside an amount less than their estimate based on the annual appropriation level. Since the appropriations have not been adequate to award the maximum amount each HSA may be eligible to receive, HEW has been awarding a percentage of the maximum allowable. This year they have set-aside $7.2 million. HEW estimates they will be able to allocate nearly $0.90 on the dollar, or almost 100 percent of the maximum allowable this year. This would be an increase of $0.07 on the dollar over last year. The addition of six or seven small HSA's would not significantly alter the awards to other HSA's.

This is a matter of equity, Mr. President. Obviously the minimally funded HSA's will not receive anything approaching a windfall.

I hope the distinguished chairman of the Health Subcommittee, Senator KENNEDY, and the distinguished ranking minority member, Senator SCHWEIKER, will see the merits of my amendment and accept it.

Mr. President, all this does is allow minimally funded HSA's that are prepared to put up some matching money to take advantage of the program right now.

I believe it is acceptable to the manager of the bill.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, that is basically a technical amendment that makes clear the rights of the smaller HSA's in rural areas. It is completely acceptable.

Mr. GRAVEL. I thank my colleague.

I am prepared to yield back my time.

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield back my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Alaska.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GRAVEL. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. SCHWEIKER. Mr. President, I would like to state for the record my concerns about extending certificate-of-need to noninstitutional health facilities.

Specifically, I am concerned about attempts to use certificate-of-need as a license to do business. The Congress approved certificate-of-need for institutional health facilities because we determined that, for a number of reasons, hospitals were not truly competitive, very probably could not be made so, and that their duplication of beds and services was a major cause of spiraling health care costs. Congress sought to correct the situation by a certificate-of-need process designed to review existing facilities and services, identify future needs, and to then judge individual applications for new facilities with those factors given due consideration. One of the major reasons certificate-of-need is necessary is because facility and equipment costs are relatively fixed and cannot be altered quickly based on the law of supply and demand.

We are now, however, being asked to extend certificate-of-need to labor intensive, rather than equipment and facility intensive industries, such as home health agencies. We are asked to do so based on the argument that competition drives up the cost of care and in any event certificate-of-need is necessary to eliminate abuses in the home health program.

To the latter point I would argue that establishment and enforcement standards are a licensing function and, if necessary or desirable, ought to be done through enactment of a license statute.

I would also point out that all our experience would indicate certificate-of-need would not correct the abuse since by definition those guilty are already in existence. certificate-of-need would only perpetuate their existence while insuring that new agencies were not allowed to compete. It is "grandfathering" of the worst sort.

To the former point, I find it very difficult to understand why in an industry such as home health services competition would increase costs. This is a labor-intensive industry and there is no reason why an agency's costs cannot be adjusted based on the law of supply and demand. I suspect it is more a case of refusal to adjust rather than a lack of ability to do so.

In short, I fear we are being asked to extend certificate-of-need to certain industries, such as home health care not because it is necessary to control costs, but in an attempt to reduce or eliminate competition.

I strongly believe we should promote competition wherever possible in the health care industry and am opposed to the use of certificate-of-need to eliminate competition. I also oppose any attempt to use the certificate-of-need process as a licensing or standard setting function.

I therefore urge my colleagues to carefully review any proposals to extend certificate-of-need outside the institutional or equipment setting to insure it does not become an impediment to healthy competition.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is open to further amendment.

Mr. KENNEDY. I do not believe we have any further amendment to be proposed.

● Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I support S. 2410, the Health Planning Amendments of 1978. This bill, unanimously reported by the Human Resources Committee, revises and extends the National Health Planning and Resources Development Act which I coauthored in 1974 (Public Law 93–641).

The purpose of the original act was to establish a system which would rationally plan the use of, and allocate, increasing scarce health resources. Public Law 93–641 established a nationwide network of 205 health systems agencies and 56 State and territorial agencies to carry out health planning and resources development activities. These agencies are developing regional blueprints for the delivery of medical care. The HSA's are governed by boards of consumers and providers living in their respective regions so that local needs and local voices can determine the individual health priorities for each health service area. Although implementation of this program has not been without its problems, I am generally pleased with the progress we have experienced thus far. Within the next year all 205 health systems agencies will have health systems plans for their regions, thereby revealing a clear picture of the health needs of our citizens.

The amendments we are considering today represent the first major revision of Public Law 93–641 since its enactment. In developing the legislation, the committee made a concerted effort to seek the views and recommendations of all interested parties. During consideration of this measure, hundreds of groups and individuals were consulted through hearings, individual meetings, and correspondence. Virtually every recommendation was carefully analyzed, and the bill we have before us today represents the product of that effort.

I believe that each of these amendments will serve to strengthen the health planning process. To accomplish this objective, the bill includes important provisions designed to assure effective participation by the consumers who sit on the HSA governing boards; to strengthen the role of the Governor in the overall planning process; to require that certificate-of-need decisions be consistent with the State health plan; to specify the criteria to be used in making certificate-of-need decisions and in determining the appropriateness of existing services; to assure representation of medically underserved populations on the various planning agencies; and to improve the coordination between health planning entities and appropriate drug abuse, alcohol abuse, and mental health agencies.

The bill also contains provisions to revise and extend the health resources development authority under title XVI of the Public Health Service Act. One important provision contained in this section establishes a program to assist and encourage the voluntary discontinuance of unneeded hospital services.

Existing law—section 1625(d), provides for grants to public hospitals for construction and modernization projects designed to, first, eliminate or prevent imminent safety hazards, as defined by Federal, State, or local fire, building, or life safety codes or regulations; or, second, avoid noncompliance with State or voluntary licensure or accreditation standards.

The financial problems of local government make it difficult to raise capital for needed reconstruction or renovation of the public general hospitals. Tax revenues often cannot meet their needs, and localities often must borrow at extremely high interest rates. In some cases, localities are excluded from the bond market altogether. Often the physical plant is old and renovated only with extreme difficulty. Yet renovation is necessary if the hospital is to meet required life safety codes. One such facility that typifies these special problems is the Harlem Hospital Center in New York City, whose approved application for assistance under this section is pending the appropriation of additional funds.

Until last year, funding for this section depended upon a 22-percent set-aside of funds appropriated for all hospital construction under the act. Unfortunately, since the enactment of Public Law 93–641, no such funds have been appropriated, and the 22 percent set-aside has been limited to about $11 million, which was the required share of carry-over funds.

Last year during the Human Resources Committee's consideration of the Health Programs Extension Act of 1977, it was brought to my attention that HEW had received 136 applications for $138 million for renovation and improvement projects to make hospitals safe. Presently there are 53 urban and rural project grants which have been approved for funding at a total of $200 million.

It was for this reason that I offered a provision in the Health Programs Extension Act which was signed into law last year for a separate funding authority of $67.5 million for such projects. In the bill before us today, there are included authorizations totaling $300 million over 3 years. These funds are to be used to help the public general hospitals meet and maintain minimum life safety code standards and other licensure requirements. I believe it is incumbent upon the Congress to assure that the care rendered by these public facilities is delivered in a safe environment.

Finally, I would like to comment on the amendments which will be offered today. While I support the amendments which are being offered by the committee, I am opposed to the amendment to be offered by Senators HATCH and HUDDLESTON.

As we all know, the Senate last week voted overwhelmingly to pass S. 2534, the Health Maintenance Organization Amendments of 1978. This action occurred in response to the growing track record of HMO's which establishes them as a viable, cost-effective alternative for the delivery of health care services. The amendment which is contained in the committee bill is designed to eliminate discrimination of HMO's in the health care system.

During hearings on the extension of both the HMO and planning bills, the committee learned of numerous instances whereby HMO's were denied certificates of need simply because local fee-for-service providers fear the potential competition. Because I believe in the HMO concept and its potential for delivering comprehensive health care services and realizing significant cost savings, I believe the Congress should take steps to insure nondiscrimination against HMO's. The most positive way to accomplish this objective is to end the discrimination which currently faces many HMO's. The committee bill creates parity between HMO's and other providers of ambulatory care by prohibiting certificate-of-need requirements for HMO's which are more stringent than those requirements applied to other providers of ambulatory care.

Under the committee bill, a state is free to determine whether or not to cover other providers of ambulatory care in their individual State certificate-of-need laws. The committee bill in no way removes a State's right to make that determination. The committee bill does, however, insure that HMO's are not treated any differently than other ambulatory care providers. I believe this is an extremely important policy, and urge my colleagues to support the committee bill in this regard.

The Hatch-Huddleston amendment is also aimed at restricting certificate-of-need coverage with respect to the purchase of expensive medical equipment. The committee bill extends certificate-of-need coverage to any piece of equipment costing more than $150,000 regardless of its location.

In its deliberations on this issue, the committee found many examples of individual physicians and groups of physicians purchasing equipment which, if purchased by a hospital, would require the acquisition of a certificate of need. In my judgment, the planning process will be an effective mechanism for allocating increasingly scarce health care resources only when this unintended loophole is closed.

I believe it is most unwise to apply one set of requirements to one component of the health care system and not to other components when there is no rational justification for unequal treatment. I urge my colleagues to support the committee bill on this issue.

In general, I believe S. 2410 holds the promise of strengthening significantly the health planning process, and I urge my colleagues to act favorably on this bill.●

CERTIFICATE OF NEED

● Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I would like to clarify the impact of the language in the health planning amendments (S. 2410), which addresses the relationship between health maintenance organizations (HMO's) and State certificate-of-need review programs instituted under the 1974 Health Planning and Resources Development Act.

Under current law, health planning certificate-of-need review must cover all phases of HMO's, including establishment, capital expenditures, and changes in services. There is no Federal mandate for health planning approval of doctors' offices, services, or equipment. States may require such planning coverage if they choose.

Section 134 of S. 2410 is a compromise approved by the Human Resources Committee, which would result in comparable health planning treatment of HMO's and other providers of outpatient health care, such as private physicians and clinics.

The Subcommittee on Health and Scientific Research, in reviewing the Health Maintenance Organization and Health Planning Acts, concluded that current Federal law treats HMO's differently from other providers of ambulatory outpatient care. State laws enacted pursuant to the 1974 Federal health planning law require certificate-of-need approval for HMO's, but most States do not require such approval for equipment or services of other outpatient providers, such as private doctors and clinics.

The Health Subcommittee of the Human Resources Committee originally took the position—which I did not support—that HMO's should be exempt from the certificate-of-need review process. In my view, it would be extremely unwise to exempt HMO's—a major health service delivery system—from the health planning process.

The Human Resources Committee reconsidered the issue and approved the language in section 134 of the bill, which, for health planning purposes, requires States to treat outpatient activities of HMO's comparably to other providers of outpatient health care. It is a rational approach based on a simple premise: that comparable providers of care should be treated equally under the planning law. The approach in the bill would preempt State law.

Another section, 141 of S. 2410, also amends the Health Planning Act with respect to coverage of equipment in physicians' offices under certificate-of-need review which, under current law, is left to the discretion of the State.

Wisconsin is one of only 7 States that require health planning approval of equipment in physicians' offices or clinics under the State certificate-of-need law. Under the Wisconsin law, any health care provider must obtain a certificate of need prior to making capital expenditures for clinically-related equipment costing more than $100,000 for one piece or more than $150,000 for two pieces of equipment.

The need for health planning coverage of clinically-related equipment is demonstrated by the proliferation of costly, often underutilized equipment, which is located in nonhospital settings in order to circumvent health planning certificate-of-need review when hospitals have been denied approval for such purchases. This problem is described in a letter to our office from the Wisconsin Department of Health and Social Services. I shall submit for the RECORD the letter following these remarks.

I recognize that most States—including Wisconsin, which has the most comprehensive certificate-of-need law in the Nation—would have to amend their State laws to equalize coverage of HMO's and other providers of the same type of outpatient care. In the interest of being fair to all provider's of health care, these changes are justified, in my view.

These amendments to the Health Planning Act will result in equitable certificate-of-need review.

I support efforts to strengthen the health planning process as a means of controlling health care costs by planning for a community's health resources as a whole.

The letter follows:

DEPARTMENT OF HEALTH AND SOCIAL SERVICES,
State of Wisconsin, July 12, 1978.

HON. GAYLORD NELSON,
Senate Offie Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR NELSON: As I mentioned in a recent telephone conversation with your staff, the Wisconsin health planning experience with computed tomography scanners (CT) clearly indicates it is essential that physicians be covered by the same health planning laws applicable to hospitals in order to prevent circumvention of cost containment and the planning process. Aware of this health planning loophole, the Wisconsin Legislature enacted a Certificate of Need Law (CON) one year ago which covers capital expenditures for clinically related equipment (defined as an expenditure for a single piece of clinical equipment of more than $100,000 or an expenditure for clinical equipment which exceeds $150,000 for two or more pieces of related equipment).

In the 15 month period prior to physician coverage in the state, seven (7) CT scanners were purchased by physicians outside of the planning process and without health planning approval. Six (6) of these scanners are located in hospitals or in buildings which are connected and continguous with hospitals. Please refer to the attached table (p. 2, item "C") which lists the non-approved scanners in Wisconsin. In each case, it appears that the planning process was bypassed to locate a scanner immediately adjacent to a hospital. Underutilization of a majority of scanners in the state suggests there was no need for six of the seven scanners. This represents an unnecessary investment of over $3 million plus the added burden of operating expenses driving health care costs higher. Most of these scanners are in direct competition with approved scanners, preventing optimal utilization of any of the existing CT scanners in the state.

In the year since physicians have been covered by Wisconsin's CON law there have been no new CT scanners purchased by physicians. During this same time period Wisconsin has moved from a ranking of 11th in the nation for CT scanners per 100,000 population to a rank of 19th indicating that physician coverage under the law has enabled health planning to make some cost containment gains in Wisconsin.

There are other less well documented examples of physicians' circumventing the planning process, undercutting health planning, and cost containment, which we can share with you. It is my hope that this information will be of value in making a case for physician coverage under Federal Health Planning legislation. If I can be of further assistance, please call me.

Sincerely,

MICHAEL J. PHILPS,
Director, Bureau of Need Review.●

● Mr. EAGLETON. Mr. President, I would like to take a few moments to raise a concern about the bill's expansion of certificate-of-need to all equipment regardless of location. As you know, the House version of this bill excludes independent laboratories from the health planning process.

Although I am fully supportive of the chairman's objective of controlling unnecessary costs in the delivery of health care, I believe the independent laboratories present a somewhat different picture. First, independent laboratories are competitive in their billing operations. They do not have the same "captive audience" that other segments of the health care industry have. In addition, many of the labs are multistate operations. To which State agency would a lab apply? Would Iowa's statewide Health Coordinating Council be making planning decisions for a lab operating in Missouri?

I do not intend to propose an amendment to exempt independent labs from the Senate bill, but I would appreciate the chairman's consideration of what I view to be a somewhat novel segment of our health delivery system.

Mr. KENNEDY. I appreciate the Senator from Missouri's concerns about expansion of certificate-of-need to independent laboratories. You are correct that the competitive nature of the business, and its interstate operation comprise a somewhat different picture from the rest of the health care delivery system. I assure you that I will give careful consideration to the argument made by the House of Representatives on this particular issue.●

● Mr. HATHAWAY. Mr. President, I would like to consider for a moment the position of home health agencies with respect to the health planning process. The House bill adds home health agencies to the list of health providers specified in section 1531(5)(A) of the Health Planning Act as being covered by the certificate of need provision of the act. The Senate bill does not.

When the 1974 act was passed, it provided that the certificate of need program to be established in each state must cover, as a minimum, all health providers that were then included in the regulations issued under section 1122 of the Social Security Act—the precursor of the Health Planning Act. Home health agencies were among the health facilities and organizations subject to review under the regulations issued by HEW pursuant to section 1122. Thus, there was a clear legislative mandate to HEW to include home health agencies in the certificate of need program, inasmuch as they were part of the section 1122 regulatory program.

Accordingly, the Public Health Service recommended to the Secretary that the certificate of need regulations issued after the passage of the 1974 Health Planning Act cover home health agencies. However, as one of his last acts in office, the former HEW Secretary disregarded the Public Health Service recommendation and issued certificate of need regulations on January 13, 1977, which did not include home health agencies.

Last year, when Congress passed a bill providing for a 1-year extension of authorities under the 1974 act, the legislative history in both the House and the Senate took note of the failure of HEW to carry out this legislative mandate regarding home health agencies, and directed that the certificate of need regulations be amended to conform with the intent of Congress. The Conference Committee report on the 1-year extension bill—House Conference Report 95–500—stated that the omission of home health agencies from HEW's certificate of need regulations "should be immediately reconsidered and rectified."

No action has been taken by HEW to carry out this directive. Thus, if we want to insure the inclusion of home health agencies in the certificate of need regulations, we should do so in the statute.

Underlying the expressions of congressional intent that I have discussed, there are significant substantive reasons put forth in support of inclusion of home health agencies in the certificate of need program. These include prevention of duplication of services and unnecessary administrative costs. More importantly, without certificate of need regulations for home health agencies, it is argued, the prices of home health services could increase. Opponents of such a provision would argue, also convincingly, that the increased competition due to a free market—with certificate of need—would force the prices down.

Mr. President, good arguments can be made on both sides of the issue.

I am inclined to cover home health agencies in the certificate of need program, but would first like to see additional solid data regarding costs of home health services with respect to certificate of need and the effect of competition on price. The National Association of Home Health Agencies is currently collecting this data. Unfortunately, it is not yet available. Consequently, rather than offer an amendment at this time without sufficient backup information, I have decided to wait until conference to finalize my opinion. I strongly hope that by then the association will be able to produce the data so that we can make a studied judgment.

I might add here, Mr. President, that home health agencies are playing a vital role in our health care delivery system, and I commend them for their invaluable contribution. It is my desire to arrive at a logical and equitable solution to this issue, and I hope my colleagues will give it their careful consideration in conference.●

● Mr. TOWER. Mr. President, I am pleased that the Committee on Human Resources has accepted my amendments to the Health Planning Act, S. 2410. I would especially like to thank the chairman and ranking member of the Health Subcommittee, and their staffs for their able assistance on these amendments. It is my hope that adoption of my five amendments will go a long way in removing many of the potentially onerous aspects of Public Law 93–641. The original act too often destroyed local initiative and flexibility in health planning. It is time for the planning law to move more in the direction of responding to our citizens' needs by limiting Federal power and shifting more of the authority and responsibility for health planning back to the local community. My amendments to the Health Planning Act, by emphasizing Federal and local cooperation, will work to make needed medical services more available and more accessible, and yet work to preserve the very necessary local community control over the health care industry.

Since its passage in 1974, I have been increasingly concerned over several of the ramifications of the National Health Planning and Resources Development Act. While I agreed with the assessment that a need existed to formulate workable health planning programs, I opposed the passage of the original legislation because I felt that its comprehensive regulatory provisions would undercut the flexibility of State and local governments, undermine the freedom of individuals to determine their own health care needs, and impede necessary professional input by the medical community.

The issuance of the national health planning guidelines of September of 1977 regrettably exemplified the most negative aspect of Public Law 93–641. As mandated by this public law, the administration released these relatively inflexible standards that attempted to usurp local and State control over health care planning decisions and reinvest this power into the federally controlled regulatory network of health systems agencies. Although somewhat modified prior to their final adoption in March 1978, it is clear that the intent is for the HSA's to be required to meet the guideline standards in 5 years, or face the alternative of not being redesignated. I do not believe the Congress intended the guidelines to be mandatory or to be inflexible national standards. Although specific benchmarks, targets, or objectives are worthwhile, the determination of such benchmarks must be left to the local area which has the understanding of local resources and needs. Acceptance by the committee of my amendment will ensure the necessary flexibility in compliance with the guidelines. This action will make it clear that health planning will truly be a local phenomenon, utilizing the knowledge and understanding of the local consumer and provider of health care services.

Adoption of my second amendment will preclude a State's reviewing agency from denying a certificate of need application by not reviewing the application during the prescribed review period of 90 days. The effect of this clarifying amendment is to remove from the planning and/or regulatory agency the opportunity to "pocket veto" an application by the agency's failure to act within the prescribed time.

My third amendment eliminates the 10 percent incentive payment to the HSA's for any hospital facility or service discontinuance in their health systems area. In Texas, a majority of HSA executive directors see the 10 percent discontinuance incentive paid to the HSA's in the proposed section 1643 as no more than a "bounty" which may force the HSA's to identify not only unnecessary services or beds but marginal services and perhaps necessary services also, and to pursue their discontinuance with inordinate zeal in order to obtain development funds for projects and programs. Incentives or bounties should not be necessary for HSA's to have a reason or means for getting their planning job done. Developmental funds should be based on the ability of the HSA to identify and justify a community's health care needs and not as a result of its efforts to close facilities or services.

My last two amendments elaborate on the designation/termination process for the health systems agencies and for the State health planning agencies. My substitute language provides a statutory due process approach to the renewal or termination of HSA/State agency designation agreements with specific references to those who are to be consulted by the Secretary prior to the decision. Advance notice of HEW's intention to terminate, including specific reasons why this action is being taken, and actions the HSA may take to avoid the termination of the agreement is mandated. In addition, my amendments provide the opportunity for a public hearing on the matter before an office or employee of the Department of HEW. By requiring such a process, the Congress will be placing the entire HSA/State agency designation process before the public for review in a manner which will assure that all concerned have the opportunity for input. This language will reaffirm the congressional commitment for necessary local emphasis of the Health Planning Act.○

● Mr. NELSON. I would like to clarify the impact of the health planning bill, S. 2410, as it would impact on States, such as Wisconsin, for purposes of certificate-of-need review of health maintenance organizations and outpatient ambulatory physicians' services and equipment.

Does section 134 of the bill as reported from the Human Resources Committee require comparable health planning treatment of outpatient services for both HMO's and physicians' offices?

Mr. KENNEDY. Yes. It states that:

No such program shall have provisions for the review and determination of need of the services, facilities, equipment, and organization of health maintenance organizations that are in addition to provisions for the review and determination of need of the services, facilities, equipment, and organization of other providers of ambulatory health care.

The effect of this provision is that certificate-of-need review may not be more extensive for HMO's than it is for other providers of comparable outpatient services.

The committee determined that HMO outpatient activity should be treated comparably with other providers of outpatient care.

Mr. NELSON. Does this language refer only to outpatient services?

Mr. KENNEDY. Yes. HMO inpatient services, equipment, and facilities must be reviewed for certificate-of-need, as described in section 141, which defines "institutional health services" that must be covered under State certificate-of-need programs. HMO's do have special criteria for such review in the law.

Mr. NELSON. Wisconsin certificate-of-need law differs in its applicability to various ambulatory provider groups. Wisconsin law presently requires certificate-of-need review for all phases of HMO activity—establishment, changes in services, and capital expenditures. The law is one of only seven in the Nation that requires certificate-of-need review for physicians' offices and clinics, but only with respect to health-related capital expenditures exceeding $100,000 for one piece or $150,000 for more than one piece of clinical equipment.

Since Wisconsin certificate-of-need law does not apply to HMO outpatient activities comparably to physicians' outpatient activities, would Wisconsin be required to change its law?

Mr. KENNEDY. Yes. It could change the application of certificate-of-need either for physicians' offices or for HMOs: it could increase coverage of physicians' outpatient activities, or it could reduce coverage of outpatient HMO activity.

Mr. NELSON: What is meant by "other providers of ambulatory care" in section 134 of S. 2410? Does the language mean that such other ambulatory care services as home health agencies, or ambulatory surgical or renal dialysis centers cannot be covered more stringently than HMO comparable services? Or, does the section refer only to physician-based ambulatory care services, such as clinics and doctors' offices?

Mr. KENNEDY. The intent is to refer ambulatory care services such as physicians' clinics and offices.

Mr. NELSON. Does section 141 of S. 2410, which requires certificate-of-need review for: "Diagnostic, or therapeutic equipment acquired through purchase, rental, lease, or gift valued at the time of acquisition in excess of $150,000, used in the delivery of health care services by any person, institution, or other entity," allow a State to have more stringent coverage of such health equipment such as Wisconsin's law does, which requires coverage of equipment starting at $100,000?

Mr. KENNEDY. Yes.

Mr. NELSON. Would the amendment offered by Senators HATCH and HUDDLESTON require States to cover such equipment?

Mr. KENNEDY. No, it would leave the matter of such coverage of equipment outside of institutions up to the discretion of the States. It would require coverage of equipment only in institutions, which is what the current law requires.

Mr. NELSON. Thank you for clarifying these matters as they affect Wisconsin's health planning law.●

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. SCHWEIKER. I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. JAVITS. Did the Chair act on the Williams amendment, as amended?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair did.

Mr. JAVITS. I thank the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment, as amended.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the engrossment and the third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading and was read the third time.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Mr. President, will the Senator from Massachusetts yield for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time has been yielded back.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for 2 minutes for the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. The Senator better make it longer than 2 minutes. We will see how we get along. I want to understand the cost of the bill if I can. I understand that the figures brought to the Senate have been changed by amendment in the Senate.

The figures that I have provide for an authorization for 1979 of $688 million, 1980 of $827 million, and 1981 for $965 million.

My question to the Senator from Massachusetts is, are those figures accurate or have those figures been changed by amendment in the Senate?

Mr. KENNEDY. There have been changes. For the first year now it is $373 million.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. That is 1979?

Mr. KENNEDY. The Senator is correct.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. What was that figure again?

Mr. KENNEDY. $373 million.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Yes.

Mr. KENNEDY. For 1980, $512 million and for 1981 $680 million, effectively reducing the authorization by about $900 million.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Yes, I think that is a decided improvement, I say to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. KENNEDY. I simply mention to the Senator that the area we reduced was in transferring underutilized hospital beds that could have been used for other services which would have been less costly, and even though we are reaching the figure of reducing the authorization here in the Chamber I think over the long run we are going to end up probably paying more because we are still spending $2 billion a year on unused hospital beds. But the Senator is correct. We reduced it because I did not think that we will get the appropriations, and that is why.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. For 1979 the appropriation requested $152 million and the committee brought in a $688 million authorization. That has been reduced, as I understand it, to $373 million.

Mr. KENNEDY. The Senator is correct.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for 3 additional minutes on the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. KENNEDY. We added this transfer authority which effectively we have eliminated now. So we have eliminated the funding for new programing which it was the judgment of the committee over any reasonable period of time would have been really very cost effective. But we did not expect we would be able to get the money in terms of appropriation, and so that is why.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair interrupts to remind the Senator from Massachusetts that at 3:30 p.m. the Senate will resume consideration of the conference report of the New York loan guarantee.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. I thank the Senator.

Mr. KENNEDY. I thank the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill having been engrossed for a third reading and having been read the third time, the question is, Shall the bill pass?

The bill (S. 2410), as amended, was passed, as follows:

S. 2410

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SHORT TITLE: REFERENCE TO ACT

SECTION 1. (a) This Act may be cited as the "Health Planning Amendments of 1978".

(b) Whenever in this Act and amendment or repeal is expressed in terms of an amendment to, or repeal of, a section or other provision, the reference shall be considered to be made to a section or other provision of the Public Health Service Act.

TITLE I—REVISION AND EXTENSION OF NATIONAL HEALTH PLANNING AND DEVELOPMENT AUTHORITY

SEC. 101. (a) Section 1503(b)(1) is amended by (1) striking "fifteen" and inserting in lieu thereof "twenty"; (2) inserting "the Assistant Secretary for Rural Development of the Department of Agriculture," after "Defense,"; and (3) striking "not less than five shall be persons who are not providers of health services" and inserting in lieu thereof: "not less than eight shall be persons who are not providers of health services including individuals who are members of urban and rural medical underserved populations".

(b) The last sentence of section 1511(a) is amended by (1) striking "if the Governor of each State" and inserting in lieu thereof "if the Governor of any State" and (2) striking "in order to meet the other requirements of this subsection".

(c) Section 1501(b)(1) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following "Such standards shall reflect the unique circumstances and needs of medical underserved populations including isolated rural communities.".

SEC. 102. Section 1511(b)(4) is amended to read as follows:

"(4)(A) The Secretary shall review on his own initiative or at the request of any Governor or designated health systems agency the appropriateness of the boundaries of the health service areas established under paragraph (3) and, if he determines that the boundaries for a health service area no longer meet the requirements of subsection (a), or if the boundaries for a proposed revised health service area meet the requirements of subsection (a) in a significantly more appropriate manner in terms of the efficiency and effectiveness of health planning efforts, he shall revise the boundaries in accordance with the procedures prescribed by paragraph (3)(B)(ii). If the Secretary acts on his own initiative to revise the boundaries of any health service area, he shall consult with the Governor of the appropriate State or States, the chief executive officer or agency of the political subdivisions within the State or States that would be affected by the revision, the appropriate designated health systems agency or agencies and the appropriate established Statewide Health Coordinating Council. A Governor may request a revision of the boundaries of a health service area only after consultation with the Governor of any other appropriate State or States, the chief executive officer or agency of the political subdivisions within the State or States that would be affected by the revision, the appropriate designated health systems agencies, and the appropriate established Statewide Health Coordinating Council and shall include in such request the comments concerning the proposed revision made by such individuals and entities. A designated health systems agency may make a request to revise the boundaries of its health service area only after consultation with the Governor of the appropriate State or States, the chief executive officer or agency of the political subdivisions within the State or States that would be affected by the revision, the other appropriate designated health system agency or agencies, and the appropriate established Statewide Health Coordinating Council and shall include in such request the comments concerning the proposed revision made by such individuals and entities. No proposed revision of the boundaries of a health service area shall comprise an entire State without the prior consent of the Governor of such State. In addition, for each proposed revision of the boundaries of a health service area, the Secretary shall give notice and an opportunity for a hearing on the record by all interested persons and make a written determination of his findings and decision.

"(B) The Secretary shall, by January 1, 1979, by regulation establish criteria for the revision of the boundaries of health service areas.".

SEC. 103. Section 1511(c) is repealed.

SEC. 104. (a) Section 1512(b) is amended by adding the following new subsection at the end thereof:

"(7) CONFLICT OF INTEREST.—Each health systems agency shall adopt procedures in accordance with regulations promulgated by the Secretary to insure that no member, employee, consultant or agent participates in any matter regarding any person, institution, organization or other entity with which he or she has or has had within the past three years any substantial direct or indirect employment, fiduciary, competitive, medical staff, or ownership or other financial interest.".

(b) Section 1524(b) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"(4) A SHCC shall adopt procedures in accordance with regulations promulgated by the Secretary to insure that no member, employee, consultant or agent participates in any matter regarding any person, institution, organization or other entity with which he or she has or has had within the past three years any substantial direct or indirect employment, fiduciary, competitive, medical staff, or ownership or other financial interest.".

(A) by inserting "(A)" after "(c)(1)",

(B) by redesignating subparagraphs (A) and (B) as clauses (i) and (ii), respectively,

(C) by amending clause (ii) (as so redesignated) to read as follows:

"(ii) by the Secretary if the Secretary determines, in accordance with subparagraph (B), that the entity is not complying with the provisions of such agreement.", and

(D) by adding at the end the following:

"(B) Before the Secretary may terminate, under subparagraph (A)(ii), an agreement with an entity for designation as the health systems agency for a health service area, the Secretary shall—

"(i) consult with the Governor and the Statewide Health Coordinating Council of each State in which is located the health service area respecting the proposed termination,

"(ii) give the entity notice of the intention to terminate the agreement and in the notice specify with particularity (I) the basis for the determination of the Secretary that the entity is not in compliance with the agreement, and (II) the actions that the entity should take to come into compliance with the agreement, and

"(iii) provide the entity with a reasonable opportunity for a hearing, before an officer or employee of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare designated for such purpose, on the matter specified in the notice.".

(3) The amendments made by paragraphs (1) and (2) shall take effect with respect to designation agreements entered into under section 1515(c) of the Public Health Service Act after the date of the enactment of this Act.

(b) Section 1515(c) (as amended by subsection (a)) is amended by adding after clause (ii) of paragraph (1)(A) the following: "A designation agreement under this subsection may be terminated by the Secretary before the expiration of its term if the health service area with respect to which the agreement was entered into is revised under section 1511(b)(4) and the Secretary determines, after consultation with the Governor and Statewide Health Coordinating Council of each State in which the health service area (as revised) is located, that the health systems agency designated under such agreement cannot effectively carry out the agreement for the area (as revised). In terminating an agreement under the preceding sentence, the Secretary shall provide that the termination shall not take effect before an agreement for the designation of a new agency takes effect and shall provide the agency designated under the agreement to be terminated an opportunity to terminate its affairs in a satisfactory manner.".

"(B) If upon review (as provided in section 1535) of the agency's operation and performance of its functions, the Secretary determines that it has not fulfilled, in a satisfactory manner, the functions of a health systems agency prescribed by section 1513 during the period of the agreement to be renewed or does not continue to meet the requirements of section 1512(b), he may terminate such agreement or return such agency to a conditionally designated status under subsection (b) for a period not to exceed twelve months. At the end of such period, the Secretary shall either terminate its agreement with such agency or enter into an agreement with such agency under paragraph (1).

"(C) Before renewing an agreement with a health systems agency under this subsection, the Secretary shall provide the State health planning and development agency and the Statewide Health Coordinating Council of the State in which the health systems agency is located an opportunity to comment on the performance of such agency and to provide a recommendation on whether such agreement should be renewed and whether its renewal should be made subject to conditions as authorized by paragraph (3).

"(D) If the Secretary enters into an agreement under this subsection with an entity or renews such an agreement, the Secretary shall notify the Governor of the State in which such entity is located of the agreement, its renewal, and, if any conditions have been imposed under paragraph (3), such conditions.".

(d) The last sentence of section 1515(c)(2) is amended to read as follows: "In considering such applications, the Secretary shall give priority to any application which has been recommended by a Governor or a Statewide Health Coordinating Council for approval.".

(e) Section 1515(b)(4) is amended by striking out the last sentence and substituting: "In considering such applications, the Secretary shall give priority to any application which has been recommended by a Governor or a Statewide Health Coordinating Council for approval. When the Secretary enters into an agreement with a entity under paragraph (1), the Secretary shall notify the Governor of the State in which such entity is located of such agreement.".

SEC. 128. Section 1515(d) is amended by (1) inserting "agreement" after "If a designation" and (2) inserting "or is not renewed" after "prescribed for its expiration".

SEC. 129. (a) Section 1516(b)(2)(A)(i) is amended to read as follows:

"(i) the greater of (I) the amount determined under paragraph (1) without regard to this paragraph or paragraph (3), or (II) the amount determined under paragraph (3), and".

(b) Section 1516(3) is amended to read as follows:

"(3) The amount of a grant under subsection (a) to a health systems agency designated under section 1515(c) may not be less than $250,000 in the fiscal year ending September 30, 1979, $270,000 in the fiscal year ending September 30, 1980, and $290,000 in any succeeding fiscal year.".

"(6) an evaluation of the impact of such discontinuance or conversion on the employees of such hospital; and

"(7) such other information as the Secretary may by regulation require.

A hospital which has an application under this subsection approved by the Secretary is entitled to receive the payments applied for.

"(c) The health systems agency for the health service area in which an applicant under this section is located shall determine the need for the service (or services) proposed to be discontinued by such applicant or for the part of the hospital to be converted, as the case may be, and shall make a recommendation to the State health planning and development agency for the State in which the applicant is located respecting approval by the Secretary of such applicant's application. A determination of a health systems agency under this subsection shall be based upon criteria developed pursuant to section 1532(c).

"(d) A State health planning and development agency which has received a recommendation from a health systems agency under subsection (c) shall, after consideration of such recommendation, make a recommendation to the Secretary respecting the approval by the Secretary of the application with respect to which the health systems agency's recommendation was made. A State health planning and development agency's recommendation under this subsection with respect to the approval of an application (1) shall be based upon (A) the need for the service (or services) proposed to be discontinued by the applicant or for the part of the hospital to be converted, as the case may be, and (B) such other criteria as the Secretary may by regulation prescribe, and (2) shall be accompanied by the health systems agency's recommendation made with respect to the approval of such application.

"(e) In considering applications submitted under this section, the Secretary shall consider the recommendations of the State health planning and development agency and the health systems agency. The Secretary may not approve an application which a State agency recommends not be approved.

"(f) In determining the need for the service (or services) proposed to be discontinued by an applicant for payment under section 1643, a health systems agency and a State agency shall give special consideration to the unmet needs and existing access patterns of urban or rural poverty populations.

"(g) For purposes of this title, the term "hospital" means, with respect to any fiscal year, an institution (including a distinct part of an institution participating in the program established under title XVIII of the Social Security Act) which satisfies paragraphs (1) and (7) of section 1861(e) of such Act, but such term does not include a Federal hospital.

"AMOUNT OF PAYMENTS

"SEC. 1643. (a) The amount of a debt payment which shall be made to a hospital, with an approved application under section 1642 for the discontinuance of all of its inpatient services is the sum of—

"(1) (A) the lesser of—

"(i) the total outstanding financial obligation of the applicant attributable (as determined under regulations promulgated by the Secretary) to the acquisition of equipment and facilities of the hospital, or

"(ii) the amount of unexpensed depreciation attributable (as determined under regulations promulgated by the Secretary) to the equipment and facilities of the hospital, less—

"(B) the fair market value (as defined by the Secretary) of the equipment and facilities of the hospital; and

"(2) any other expenses (as defined by regulation by the Secretary) which result from the financial obligation of the applicant being satisfied before due.

"(b) The amount of an incentive payment which shall be made to a hospital, with an approved application under section 1642 for the discontinuance of all of its services or the services of an identifiable unit of the hospital is—

"(1) in the case of the discontinuance of all of the inpatient services of a hospital, an amount not to exceed the amount reported by the hospital under section 1642, and

"(2) in the case of the discontinuance of the services of an identifiable unit of the hospital, an amount not to exceed 30 per centum of the charges reported by the hospital for such unit in the previous hospital accounting fiscal year pursuant to generally acceptable accounting principles prescribed by regulations of the Secretary.

"(c) The amount of a conversion payment which shall be made to a hospital, with an approved application under section 1642 is 50 per centum of the reasonable (as determined by criteria established in regulations of the Secretary) cost of the conversion approved in such application.

"(d) The debt payment, incentive payment, and conversion payment to which a hospital is entitled shall be paid in a single payment.

"(e) The Secretary shall not make a payment pursuant to this section until the Secretary of Labor has certified that fair and equitable arrangements have been made to protect the interests of employees affected by the discontinuance of services against a worsening of their positions with respect to their employment including, but not limited to, arrangements to preserve the rights of employees under collective-bargaining agreements; continuation of collective-bargaining rights consistent with the provisions of the National Labor Relations Act; reassignment of affected employees to other jobs; retraining programs; protecting pension, health benefits, and other fringe benefits of affected employees; and arranging adequate severance pay, if necessary. Procedures for certification by the Secretary of Labor shall conform to standards established by the Secretary of Labor by regulation.

(f) To make the payments required by this part, there are authorized to be appropriated $50,000,000 for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1979, $100,000,000 for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1980, and $150,000,000 for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1981.

"STUDY

"SEC. 1644. The Secretary shall make a study of the first twenty-five applications approved under section 1642 to determine their effect on the elimination of unneeded hospital services. The Secretary shall report the results of such study to Congress together with his recommendations for any revision in the program which he determines to be appropriate, including any revision in the authorization of appropriations for such program.".

SEC. 207. Except as provided in section 206, the amendments made by this title shall take effect on the date of the enactment of this Act.

TITLE III—MISCELLANEOUS AMENDMENTS

SEC. 301. Section 314 is amended by repealing subsections (a), (b), and (c).

SEC. 302. Title IX is repealed in its entirety.

SEC. 303. The amendments made by this title shall take effect on the date of the enactment of this Act.

TITLE IV—NATIONAL COMMISSION ON ALCOHOLISM

ESTABLISHMENT OF A NATIONAL COMMISSION ON ALCOHOLISM AND OTHER ALCOHOL-RELATED PROBLEMS

SEC. 401. (a) There is established a Commission to be known as the National Commission on Alcoholism and other Alcohol-Related Problems (hereinafter in this section referred to as the "Commission"). The Commission shall be composed of—

(1) four Members of the Senate appointed by the President of the Senate upon the recommendation of the Majority and Minority Leaders;

(2) four Members of the House of Representatives appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives;

(3) eleven members appointed by the President upon recommendation of the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare; and

(4) ex officio members from agencies of the Federal Government, appointed by the President, whose programs affect the prevention and treatment of alcoholism and such ex officio members shall be individuals with knowledge of programs administered by such agencies affecting the prevention and treatment of alcoholism.

At no time shall more than two of the members appointed under clause (1), or more than two of the members appointed under clause (2), or more than six of the members appointed under clause (3) be members of the same political party.

(b)(1) The President shall designate one of the members of the Commission as Chairman, and one as Vice Chairman. Ten members of the Commission shall constitute a quorum, but a lesser number may conduct hearings.

(2) Members of the Commission who are Members of Congress or full-time officers or employees of the United States shall serve without additional compensation but shall be reimbursed for travel, subsistence, and other necessary expenses incurred in the performance of the duties vested members of the Commission shall each be entitled to receive the daily equivalent of the annual rate of the basic pay in effect for grade GS–18 of the General Schedule for each day (including traveltime) during which they are engaged in the actual performance of the duties of the Commission; and, while away from their homes or regular places of business in the performance of duties of the Commission, they shall be allowed travel expenses, including per diem in lieu of subsistence, in the same manner as persons employed intermittently in the Government service are allowed expenses under section 5703(b) of title 5 of the United States Code.

(3) The Commission shall meet at the call of the Chairman or at the call of a majority of the members thereof.

(c)(1) The Commission shall have the power to appoint and fix the compensation of such personnel as it deems advisable, without regard to the provisions of title 5, United States Code, governing appointments in the competitive service, and the provisions of chapter 51 and subchapter III of chapter 53 of such title, relating to classification and General Schedule pay rates.

(2) The Commission may procure, in accordance with the provisions of section 3109 of title 5, United States Code, the temporary or intermittent services of experts or consultants. Persons so employed shall receive compensation at a rate to be fixed by the Commission, but at rates for individuals not to exceed the daily equivalent of the annual rate of basic pay in effect for grade GS–18 of the General Schedule. While away from his home or regular place of business in the performance of service for the Commission, any such person may be allowed travel expenses, including per diem in lieu of subsistence, as authorized by section 5703(b) of title 5, United States Code, for persons in the Government service employed intermittently.

(3) The Commission may secure directly from any department or agency of the United States information necessary to enable it to carry out its duties under this section. Upon request of the Chairman of the Commission, the head of such department or agency shall furnish such information to the Commission consistent with applicable laws and regulations with respect to the privacy of medical records.

STUDY AND REPORT

SEC. 402. (a) The Commission shall conduct a study of alcoholism and alcohol-related problems including, but not limited to, the following areas:

(1) an assessment of unmet treatment needs of alcoholics and their families;

(2) an assessment of manpower needs in the fields of research, treatment, and prevention;

(3) an assessment of the integration of alcoholism treatment into ongoing health and social health care services within communities.

(4) an assessment of the need for integration of alcoholism services into existing fiscal support systems, including national health insurance;

(5) an evaluation of the accessibility of services and quality of care, including rural as well as urban areas;

(6) the relationship of alcohol use to aggressive behavior and crime;

(7) the relationship of alcohol use to family violence;

(8) the relationship of alcoholism to the high rates of illnesses, particularly those with a high stress component, among family members of alcoholics;

(9) an evaluation of the effectiveness of prevention programs, including the relevance of alcohol control laws and regulations to alcoholism and alcohol-related problems;

(10) a survey of the unmet research needs in the area of alcoholism and alcohol-related problems;

(11) an evaluation of the needs of special and underserved population groups; and

(b) The Commission shall submit to the President and the Congress such interim reports as it deems advisable and shall within eighteen months after the date on which funds first become available to carry out the provisions of this section submit to the President and the Congress a final report which shall contain a detailed statement of its findings and conclusions and also such recommendation for legislation and administrative actions as it deems appropriate. The Commission shall cease to exist sixty days after the final report is submitted under this subsection.

(12) an evaluation of the needs of Native Americans.

COORDINATION AND AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS

SEC. 403. (a) The Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare shall be responsible for the coordination of the activities of the Commission.

(b) There are authorized to be appropriated for the purposes of this section $1,000,000 to remain available until expended.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

Mr. SCHWEIKER. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Secretary of the Senate be authorized to make any necessary technical and clerical corrections in the engrossment of S. 2410.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I want to make generous comments about the members of the committee staff on the majority and minority side that did yeoman work in helping us achieve this successful piece of legislation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, will it be in order at this time to call up a conference report which will take only 3 minutes?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has that right.

ARMS CONTROL AND DISARMAMENT AUTHORIZATIONS, 1979

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, I ask that the Chair lay before the Senate a message from the House of Representatives on H.R. 11832.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following message from the House of Representatives:

Resolved, That the House agree to the amendments of the Senate Numbered 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6 to the bill (H.R. 11832) entitled "An Act to authorize appropriations for fiscal year 1979 under the Arms Control and Disarmament Act."

Resolved, That the House agree to the amendment of the Senate Numbered 1 to the aforesaid bill with an amendment as follows:

Page 2, line 9, of the Senate engrossed amendments, strike out all after "negotiations." over to and including "Senate." on page 3, line 2.

Resolved, That the House agree to the amendment of the Senate to the title of the bill.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House to the amendments of the Senate to H.R. 11832.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Alabama.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the motion was agreed to.

Mr. STONE. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

ORDER DISCHARGING BUDGET COMMITTEE FROM CONSIDERATION OF SENATE RESOLUTION 521

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Budget Committee be discharged from its consideration of Senate Resolution 521, and that further consideration of Senate Resolution 521 be indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

NEW YORK CITY FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE ACT OF 1978—CONFERENCE REPORT

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 3:30 having arrived, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the conference report on H.R. 12426.

The Senate continued with the consideration of the conference report.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Mr. President, much was said and written about the bailout of New York City with Federal tax dollars before the Senate on June 29 approved legislation which would—for the first time—provide Government-guaranteed loans to a city for its fiscal operations.

Much has been said and written about it since.

Now comes some astonishing new information, which I shall refer to later, that confirms my earlier suspicions.

When this legislation was discussed earlier, I outlined in a series of speeches on the Senate floor many of the objections I had to this matter.

I had hoped that the Senate would not take this piece of legislation too lightly, and that it would not be stampeded into too hasty action before all of the facts on this issue were brought forth and scrutinized closely.

Nevertheless, due to a very effective lobbying job put forth by the proponents of this legislation, it was passed rather handily.

It is ironic that at the very moment the Senate was approving this legislation there was being released the results of the latest New York Times/CBS News national poll which showed that those that responded to the poll were opposed 49 percent to 42 percent to loan guarantees.

The poll substantiated what I and other Senators had stated earlier—that the public was opposed to any loan guarantees for New York City.

Mr. President, at the conclusion of my remarks I shall ask unanimous consent to have inserted into the RECORD several GAO reports and newspaper articles, including the New York Times, June 30 article entitled "National Poll Indicates Less Support for Aid."

Now that the New York loan guarantee legislation has been acted upon and voted out of conference, this issue is once again before the Senate.

Mr. President, I am disappointed with the bill that has come out of conference.

The conference bill has drastically changed the bill voted upon and approved by the Senate.

Although I could not support the Senate bill I believed that the provisions that the Senate added to the bill made it the best bill of the lot.

The major changes which bring me dismay are:

First. Increase of $150 million in the amount of loans that can be guaranteed;

Second. Allow for seasonal financing to be guaranteed under this bill, such seasonal financing totaling $325 million; and Third. Lengthen the years of the guarantees that can be given after the bill's first year of operation from 10 years to 15 years.

Much has transpired between the time the Senate first considered this legislation in June and now when the Senate considers the conference report.

Many of the events that have taken place and the reports that have been written on this matter question the necessity for this legislation.

In an effort to have the Senate carefully weight the merits of—or the need for—this legislation, I would like to call to the Senate's attention some of these matters.

During the debate on this bill June 29, I indicated that while I could not support—because of the dangerous precedent it was establishing—the philosophy of this legislation, I believed that the Senate bill was the best of a bad lot. I was troubled, also, by what might become of the Senate bill in conference since it differed markedly from the House bill.

The Senate in a very strong, precise, and purposeful manner set forth its position on this legislation in Senate Report 95–952.

The Senate Banking Committee and the Senate took the position that the maximum amount of loans that could be guaranteed under this legislation could not exceed $1.5 billion.

This position was adopted because, in its report, the committee specifically noted:

> . . . The Committee believes that Federal guarantees in these amounts should be sufficient to enable the city to carry out its 4-year long-term financing plan with an adequate margain of safety, while placing primary reliance where it ought to be placed, on private placements of unguaranteed bonds to local parties and on public sales of MAC and city bonds in the credit markets.

The Senate Banking Committee and likewise the Senate also adopted the position in a determined manner that Federal guarantees would not be allowed to be used to guarantee any of New York City's seasonal financing.

After much debate, this position was agreed to for three basic reasons outlined in its report:

First. The city and its representatives along with the Treasury Department indicated that, if long-term financing were guaranteed by the Federal Government, the city could acquire on its own its seasonal financing needs;

Second. Since the greater risk of long-term financing was being guaranteed, then the local parties assume the limited exposure risk of seasonal financing; and Third. The city's financing plan, as outlined in Mr. Rohatyn's testimony does not specifically call for guarantees of seasonal financing.

The Banking Committee summarized its position on the nonguaranteeing of seasonal financing thus:

> The committee believes strongly that the city should be pushed to reenter the credit markets and to meet its financing needs from private placements with local parties and from public sales of its obligations in the credit markets as rapidly as possible. Requiring the city to provide for its seasonal borrowing needs by not authorizing guarantees for this purpose is a good first step in that direction.

After examining the Senate Banking Committee's report and the debate that ensued on the Senate floor over this legislation, one can readily see that the Senate was very concerned over the amount of loans that would be guaranteed under this bill and the nature of the loans.

The Senate's approval of this legislation was firmly founded on the suppositions that among other things: First, the amount of loans to be guaranteed would be no more than $1.5 billion; and, second, there would be no guarantees accorded seasonal financing.

In debating this conference legislation the Senate should give careful examination to the reasons cited by the conference committee report for the drastic changing of the Senate's strongly held position.

Turning to the conference report, House Report No. 95–1369 one finds it devoid of any reasons for either increasing the amounts to be guaranteed or the guaranteeing of seasonal financing for the first year only.

No reasons are given at all for changing two of the Senate's most important provisions on this legislation.

One is hard pressed to find the reasoning for the drastic changes.

Of course, I realize that every conference faces difficulties when one House takes one position and the other House takes a different position.

In an attempt to understand this action one is drawn to an article which appeared in the New York Daily News on July 12, 1978, entitled "Conferees Hit a Stall Over City Loan Bill."

The article indicated that the conferees were presented with a telegram from Governor Carey, Mayor Koch, and Felix Rohatyn which said that—

> A provision for seasonal financing was absolutely necessary, supported the $1.8 billion figure for guarantees, and opposed the Senate's "short leash" provision.

Mr. President, at the end of my remarks I shall ask unanimous consent that the above-mentioned article be inserted in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection it is so ordered.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Mr. President, if this telegram is the basis for the drastic additions to this legislation it should be noted that it flies in the face of the testimony presented before the Senate Banking Committee only 1 month before which stated that there was no need for the Federal Government to guarantee seasonal financing if it would guarantee the long-term financing of the city's proposed 4-year plan.

This causes one to wonder whether New York officials were being fair with the Senate when the bailout legislation was before the Senate.

After the Senate passed the New York legislation, the New York Times on July 19, 1978, in an article entitled "New York Unveils a Big Cash Balance" disclosed that—

> New York City had a cash balance on July 1, the start of the current fiscal year, of nearly $1 billion, almost twice as much money as had been previously projected.

Yet the conference report provides for a guaranteeing of seasonal loans, despite the fact that New York has reported a surplus of nearly $1 billion.

I continue quoting from the New York Times article:

> All of the explanations of how the cash balance came into being and how officials plan to spend it could not disguise their embarrassment at having $997 million in the bank after several years of crying poverty.

Mr. President, I say, again interjecting here during the reading of the New York Times article, why should the people of Virginia, the people of Texas, the people of California, why should the taxpayers of the United States, be called upon to guarantee the bonds of a city which reported a surplus, at the end of June, of $997 million?

I go back to quoting from the New York Times:

> One official who is intimately involved in the city's finances said yesterday, "We're not surprised that the cash is this great. All of us looking at the number suspected that the cash would be larger than was estimated during the spring . . ."

I point out that during the spring was the time when New York City officials were down here in Washington trying to get loan guarantees from the Federal Government.

This whole business of New York City, the way they keep their books, the way they are handling their finances, the information they are submitting to the people of this country and to Congress, causes one to wonder how Congress can possibly be justified in passing legislation, as it is planned to do, to guarantee New York City's bonds.

Mr. President, all of this, I think, calls into question whether New York City needs Federal guarantees. This does not sound like the city is in a dire fiscal emergency to me. It appears that the city can get along quite well on its own finances without the need of this legislation. It certainly calls into question whether the city needs Federal guarantees of up to $325 million of its seasonal financing for fiscal year 1979.

At the end of my remarks I shall ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the above-referenced article.

It appears that the city's fiscal health has recovered noticeably, paced by the fact that the city is planning to sell short-term bonds and/or notes within the next year. This was noted in the New York Daily News of July 10 in an article entitled, "Sees Public Sale of City Bonds Soon," and the Wall Street Journal article of July 17, 1978, entitled "New York City Plans to Resume Its Sale of Short-Term Notes."

Indeed, Mr. President, there is so much conflict in what the city has been telling the Senate what its fiscal condition is and what has actually been appearing in the news, that on May 9 I asked the objective General Accounting Office to review the New York City fiscal situation and report to me how the New York City public employee labor contract settlement would affect the city's budgetary situation.

I was troubled by the reports that the city intended to use its "reported surplus" of this year to fund the following 2-year labor agreement.

Just yesterday, July 26, Mr. President, GAO was able to officially respond to my request.

Its report, in its usual thorough and objective fashion, provides some rather interesting and at times alarming information.

Because this report is so pertinent and vital to the legislation before us, I will quote extensively from it.

Here are the pertinent excerpts I submit, quoting now from the GAO report:

USE OF THE 1978 SURPLUS AS FUNDING SOURCE IS NOT IN ACCORDANCE WITH GENERALLY ACCEPTED ACCOUNTING PRINCIPLES

You specifically asked that we look into the city's plan to utilize its 1978 "surplus" to fund this 1979–80 labor settlement and for our opinion as to whether this funding technique was in accordance with generally accepted accounting principles.[1]

The importance of your question, of course, lies in the fact that the city is functioning under strict annual financial plans, and so, charging the cost of this labor settlement totally to 1979 and 1980 would increase the deficit in those years and require the city to make offsetting budget cuts. On the other hand, if the city charged approximately $220 million in expense to 1978, that would substantially ease the budgetary pressures in 1979 and 1980 and obviate the need to make budget cuts to pay for this wage settlement.

In our opinion, the city's accounting treatment of the transaction is not in accordance with generally accepted accounting principles. The facts of the situation, as we see them, are as follows. In early April 1978, city officials indicated that they intended to use their 1978 underspending or surplus to provide some of the funding necessary to pay for the wage settlement which was being negotiated. At the time, however, it was not clear just what the surplus would be used for. The city's Deputy Mayor for Finance, had at one point, suggested the surplus might be used to pay for deferred cost of living adjustments. Subsequently, other city officials suggested the surplus might be used to pay for bonuses. During the course of all these discussions this issue had become a public one and was being explored in the local press in articles like "NYC and Unions Study Using 78 Surplus".[2]

In addition to these discussions about what the so-called surplus would be used for, there were also discussions about how to arrange to use it. From an accounting standpoint this presented a problem. Some city officials initially suggested bringing forward the surplus into 1979 and using it as a revenue in that year. This idea was quickly rejected by the Special Deputy State Comptroller for New York City as not being in accordance with generally accepted accounting principles. His conclusion was based on the fact that there was no true surplus, but one existed only after certain adjustments permitted by State law. In addition, the city has a large cumulative deficit so that, under generally accepted accounting principles, there were no available funds to bring forward to 1979. We believe the Special Deputy Comptroller's conclusions are sound.

Ultimately, this matter was resolved when the city and the unions agreed that of the $1,500 cash payment ($750 x 2 years) $937.50 would be considered to have been earned in 1978 and charged to that year. Subsequently, this amount was changed to $1,000. If the payment was considered earned by the employees in 1978, the accounting problem would be solved since the payment could then be properly accounted for as a 1978 expense.

City officials conferred with their certified public accountants and prepared a representation letter which stated that $1,000 of the $1,500 in cash payments had been earned by the employees in 1978 and that it was the city's intention to expense the payments against fiscal year 1978. The CPAs stated that, based on the city's representations as to when the payments were earned, the proposed accounting in their opinion would be in accordance with generally accepted accounting principles.

Our views of this transaction differs from that of the city and its CPAs. As set forth in a statement of the Accounting Principles Board, a basic feature of financial accounting is that it emphasizes the economic substance of events rather than their form. In this case, the parties publicly stated on several occasions their intention was to utilize the 1978 surplus thereby easing 1979 and 1980 budgetary pressures. They stated that they would do so by some appropriate accounting technique which they had not yet decided upon.

Therefore we believe the use of the surplus and the relief of budgetary pressure in 1979 and 1980 was the objective of the parties and that is the substance of the transaction. In our opinion, this cannot be overlooked in assessing the propriety of the accounting involved. Looking toward the substance of the transaction then, we can see no justification for charging it as a 1978 expense.

Beyond the question of substance over form, there is, in our opinion, another flaw in the justification for charging this as a 1978 expense. The agreement requires that for employees to be paid the full $1,000 payment they must continue to work for the city during 1979 and part of 1980. This requirement clearly suggests that the employees have not earned the $1,000 payment for services rendered in 1978, and therefore that expense should not be charged to 1978.

On July 17, 1978, we provided this section of the letter to the city for its review and comment. A copy of its comments is included as Enclosure III.

The city strongly disagrees with our opinion that its accounting for the costs of labor settlement is not in accordance with generally accepted accounting principles. The city contends that budgetary relief for fiscal year 1979 and 1980 was only one of the effects of the settlement and not a primary objective as we contend.

We recognize that payment for services rendered in a given fiscal year is an appropriate expense of that year. We nonetheless continue to believe that the size of the labor settlement coupled with the financial difficulties faced by the city and its need to ease budgetary pressures in fiscal years 1979 and 1980 were the motivating forces in arriving at the terms of the labor settlement. While relieving an immediate fiscal problem, this strategy compounds the financial pressures the city faces in the years beyond this contract. As a result, we feel strongly that charging part of the wage settlement to fiscal year 1978, a year in which the city anticipates a deficit under generally accepted accounting principles, not a surplus, obscures the impact of the settlement and will distort the results of the city's financial operations in fiscal year 1979 and 1980.

The overriding consideration from an accounting point of view is that under the terms of labor agreement there is no liability for fiscal year 1978. The $1,000 payment is, in effect, for services to be rendered in fiscal year 1979 and part of fiscal year 1980, subject to the condition that the employee worked in fiscal year 1978. This amount was not earned in fiscal year 1978, because employees who do not work in fiscal years 1979 and 1980 are not entitled to the payment.

BUDGETARY IMPACT OF CONTRACT IN FUTURE PERIODS

Generally speaking, this labor settlement has not been widely discussed and which There is one aspect of it, however, which has not been widely discussed and which may not ultimately prove to be so conservative.

This contract may have a significant budgetary impact on the city after June 1980 since the salary levels on which wage increases will be applied will be sharply higher at the end of the period than they were at the beginning of this contract (see Enclosure II). This difference between the so called "going-in" "going-out" rates is significant when viewed in terms of the next labor negotiation. For example, in this contract the employees won two increases of 4 percent each and these were viewed as moderate. At the end of the contract period, however, the full 8 percent will be in effect, and combined with the $750 annual cash payment provided for in the contract, this will give the employees a "going-out" rate which may be as high as 16 percent more than the "going-in" rate for the average employee ($15,500 per year). This increased rate will most likely become the base for the next negotiation and should have a budgetary impact not readily apparent when one examines the modest 4 percent increase in the contract at hand.

[1] This surplus exists only under special accounting criteria in State law. According to generally accepted accounting principles, no surplus exists; in fact, a deficit resulted from 1978 operations and a very large cumulative deficit exists from previous years.

[2] New York Times, May 9, 1978.

RESTORATION OF GIVEBACKS PREVIOUSLY WON BY THE CITY

One other aspect of this contract which has not been widely discussed, but which may nevertheless be significant, relates to the question of givebacks previously won by the city.

Early in the fiscal crisis the city negotiated a $24 million annual reduction in fringe benefits with its unions. This was part of the general austerity program in the city and was one of the city's budget cutting actions. Under this program the starting salaries of certain new employees were cut back 10 percent; vacation allowances for new employees were reduced from 20 to 15 days; check cashing privileges were cancelled; and other fringes were either cut back or cancelled.

Going into this current negotiation, city officials had announced that they were demanding further reductions in employee fringe benefits, or give backs, ranging from $70 to $100 million. As the negotiations progressed, however, the city softened its position on this matter and ultimately achieved no givebacks. Beyond that, the city also conceded to return some of the givebacks previously negotiated.

The 10 percent starting salary reductions and the vacation reductions were given back to the unions. We have not estimated the cost of the fringes returned, but city officials agree that the major concessions previously won from the unions have been returned.

That completes my reading from the GAO report. I will put the text of the report into the RECORD later.

Mr. President, when one examines the July 26 GAO report in conjunction with its June 7 report to me and its March 30, 1978, report to Congressman MOORHEAD, one is drawn to the conclusion that GAO has very serious reservations about New York City's fiscal matters and the solutions that the city has proposed to this problem.

The reports:

(1) Question the City's accounting methods in its attempts to fund the City's public employee labor contract settlement. The report and news articles indicate that the City is still using manipulative accounting gimmicks to achieve desired ends no matter whether or not the practice meets accounting standards.

(2) Question the City's reliance on very uncertain revenue sources to fund its labor settlement and provide for a balanced budget. As the revenue sources look less and less certain, the City's ability to balance its budget becomes less certain.

(3) Bring into question the ability of the City to handle within its budgetary plan future labor contracts whose foundation will be based upon the recently agreed employee contract settlement.

(4) Call into question the ability of the City to deal effectively with its labor unions. The City by giving back to the unions those benefits it had won from them in earlier contracts brings to question whether the City is able to deal from strength in their negotiations with their unions.

(5) Question whether the current independent fiscal monitoring board has the authority to effectively monitor the City's fiscal practices and oversee them in the manner which the Senate in its bill envisioned.

This point seems to have been supported by articles that appeared in the New York Times of June 29, and the New York Daily News of June 29, which point out that the independent fiscal monitoring board approved the City's budget over the objections of the Deputy State Comptroller that he had serious reservations whether the City's budget fell within proper accounting standards and some of the revenue projections could not—objections, which by the way were concurred with by GAO.

After considering the GAO reports, Mr. President, it is apparent that unless New York City curbs its spending and becomes fiscally responsible in its affairs according to generally accepted accounting practices, the city's 4-year fiscal plan will not bring about its intended result.

Currently, Mr. President, New York City refuses to curb its spending by any amount that would be helpful to its financial status, and it refuses to put its own fiscal house in order.

Until they do, the Federal Government should not rush into the fiscal gap to provide the city with expanded fiscal relief.

This is no time for the Senate to create a dangerous precedent, especially in the light of these comprehensive GAO studies and recent news items concerning the affairs of the city of New York.

The July 26 GAO report and the constantly late breaking news articles are new information—new documentation—which, because of their potent portent, require the Senate to give serious reevaluation of the entire program and legislation. I am convinced a dangerous precedent would be established by the Federal Government guaranteeing the bonds of a municipality.

(Mr. SPARKMAN assumed the chair.)

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I congratulate the Senator from Virginia for his statement. It is a remarkable statement. This is a very unusual action for any Senator to take. The Senator is not a member of the Banking Committee, although he is a member of the Finance Committee. This is something outside of his committee jurisdiction, but something he felt so deeply about that he took more extraordinary action than any Senator took: He asked for a GAO report on the city labor contract settlement, which he received in just the last few days, I understand.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Just yesterday.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Just yesterday.

It is a report to which all Senators should give some attention.

First of all, before going into that, I want to say to the Senator that I agree with him about this legislation and about the city's problems. I raised similar objections in committee. Although I disagree with him on some of the points, I think he has made a very strong statement.

I agree that the city does not need these guarantees, that we should not pass the conference report, that New York can do it by itself, and that to pass this conference report would be a mistake and a bad precedent.

Let me say to my friend from Virginia that there are several elements here that ought to be considered.

First, the Senator raised the question of the guarantees for seasonal financing. He pointed out that the bill as it passed the Senate did not provide for seasonal guarantees. That was based on testimony by New York officials that what they wanted was long-term guarantees, not seasonal financing. They said that if they got the long-term guarantees, then the city could do the seasonal financing on its own. Yet we went to conference, and the city and State officials and the House conferees insisted that they did need seasonal guarantees, too. The fact is that when we did make a concession to the House, we made only the slightest kind of concession. The House bill provided for seasonal as well as long-term guarantees over the life of the act, 4 years. The conference report provides for seasonal guarantees only in the first year, and these guarantees can be issued only the first 6 months of the first year, fiscal year 1979.

Furthermore, we instructed the Secretary of the Treasury, who will administer this, that no seasonal guarantees may be made available unless New York City can show there is no other way they can get the seasonal financing they have to have. Specifically, guarantees for seasonal financing can be provided only if, and to the extent that, the city pension funds are unable to provide all of the seasonal financing needed (over and above that provided by other private sources and through public notes sales) because of restrictions on their holdings of city securities which may be imposed by legislation now pending before the Finance and Ways and Means Committees.

This legislation, which provides exemptions from certain Internal Revenue Code provisions, is needed to permit the New York City and State pension funds to participate in the financing arrangements contemplated by this bill.

I talked to Mr. Toia, who is deputy mayor for finance in New York City. Mr. Toia told me, during the period in which the conference committee was meeting that if the Finance and Ways and Means Committees would get together on permitting the city pension funds to make the necessary investment and not impose any limitation that would prevent the city pension funds from doing seasonal as well as long-term financing, they could forget about seasonal guarantees and New York City would not ask for them.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. I think that will be done, does not the Senator?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I think it will be done, too. And I think that legislation along this line would accommodate New York. I talked to Senator BENTSEN at some length on it about this legislation, since he has been handling it. But this was the reason that the city and State officials gave, that this tax bill was problematical, and that they did not know whether they could get workable legislation or not. Under those circumstances, they felt they needed some security and, therefore, they felt it was necessary for us to provide seasonal guarantees in this legislation, in case the Finance Committee and Congress did not provide that accommodation for the pension funds. So on the seasonal guarantees point, that was their response.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. PROXMIRE. Yes.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. How does the Senator envision the purported $997 million bank balance will fit into this?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I want to come to that in a minute. The Senator makes a very good point. He points out that the New York Times itself, which is certainly favorable to New York City and its problems, indicated in its recent news article that there is considerable embarrassment in New York about this $1 billion cash surplus that they have in the bank, far above what they expected to have. As I understand it, there are three reasons for that.

One of the major reasons is that they asked for prepayment of real estate taxes, and collected about $330 million, far more than anticipated. That account for about a third of the additional money they had in the bank.

In the second place, there was a substantial amount of underspending. That is hard to believe with respect to New York, but it can happen. That has happened with respect to the Federal Government, as the Senator knows, where we had $11 billion of underspending a year or two ago. But there was some underspending relative to the original fiscal year 1978 spending estimates, and that accounts for about a third of the difference.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. If the Senator will yield on that point, I think the underspending on the part of the Federal Government comes from the fact that the Congress is dishing out so many dollars that the Federal Government cannot spent it all.

Mr. PROXMIRE. The other reason is that the city tried to provide for some end-of-year cash surplus. They made some progress in that direction, and since they made some progress, they were able to accumulate more than they thought they could.

So this additional money in the bank, which, as the Senator points out, should obviate any need for seasonal guarantees in the first 6 months of fiscal 1979, which is the only time we permit such assistance anyway, should make the seasonal guarantee issue moot in any event.

As far as the amount is concerned, the Senator had pointed out that the Senate bill provided $1.5 billion in guarantees of principal amount outstanding. In the debate we had, the distinguished Senator from Texas said we should not go over a billion dollars. The Senator from Texas was right. A billion dollars would have been plenty. The Senate decided on $1.5 billion, and the conference committee raised that to $1.65 billion. Why? The Treasury requested $2 billion in guarantees of principal. The House reduced that somewhat by having the $2 billion include accrued interest. The $1.65 billion in principal does constitute something of a compromise.

The Senator has been in many, many conferences. He knows how difficult it is to insist on your position, when you have set dollar figure, and to say you are not going to go above it. The other body has another figure and says you have to compromise, and usually, you feel you have to do it.

The conference report figure may be somewhat closer to the Senate position, maybe not. Anyway, that is the reason we settled at $1.65 billion.

Let me respond to the very interesting points the Senator has made regarding his GAO report, which I think are extraordinarily significant and go beyond anything that has been discussed or debated on the floor before. As the Senator has pointed out, the report has only become available in the last 24 or 48 hours.

I understand that the Senator from Virginia requested that the GAO analyze the budgetary impact of the city's labor contract settlement.

The report is only in draft form, but GAO is critical of the accounting for and costs of NYC's labor settlement. These are the major findings of the study, and the city's rebuttal:

GAO agrees with the city's estimate of the cost of the contract over the 2-year period: $1.088 billion, of which $868 million will be paid out of city tax levy funds during that period.

GAO had some questions about how the city would pay the $617 million it originally offered and, therefore, about its ability to pay $868 million, but the draft report does not detail these questions. They probably involve the various assumptions of additional revenues and underspending.

The city intends to use about $220 million of the fiscal year 1978 "surplus" (based on State law, not a surplus under GAAP) to make cash payments which are part of the settlement in fiscal years 1979 and 1980. These are lump-sum payments to each employee of $750 a year, $1,500 in all. For each employee, of which the city intends to fund $1,000 per employee out of the fiscal 1978 surplus. The agreement further provides that for the employee to get the full $1,000, he must continue to work for the city during fiscal year 1979 and part of 1980. The result will be to ease fiscal year 1979 and 1980 budgetary pressures. GAO says that a basic feature of financial accounting is that it emphasizes the economic substance of events rather than their form. Therefore, GAO believes that proper accounting principles should not permit these lump-sum payments to come out of fiscal year 1978 surplus funds, because they are really wage increases in fiscal years 1979 and 1980, but put back to 1978 to ease strains on the budget.

The city's counterargument is that they have checked this matter out extensively with their own independent accountants, with the emergency financial control board, and with the special deputy comptroller, and have done the accounting in a way which is acceptable to all of these parties. Furthermore, the city contends that the lump-sum payments are based on a fiscal year 1978 cash surplus which was partially derived from employee productivity gains and, therefore, it is proper that the cost of the payment be charged to 1978.

Now, GAO also contends that although the pay raises in the settlement appear modest—4 percent each year—but that at the end of the contract period, the full 8 percent will be in effect, and combined with the $750 annual cash payment, the "going-out" rate for some city employees could be as high as 16 percent more than the "going-in" rate at the start of the contract. This going-out rate would then become the base for negotiating the contracts for the fiscal year 1981–82 period, which could have a severe budgetary impact.

The city's only response here is that they do not intend to count the $750 cash payment in the base. That is a pretty weak response. However, the unions say they will push for this to be included in the base, and they got most of what they pushed for this time around.

Finally, GAO also points out the city's failure to get any givebacks of fringe benefits in this contract settlement, and the fact that the city actually gave back some of the fringe benefit concessions that were won last time around, in 1976.

So I think the Senator from Virginia has made a very powerful argument against the conference report, and also an argument that the city is digging itself into another serious financial problem, in view of the relatively feeble way it is handling its contract negotiations with its employees and the very large concessions given when you consider the trouble it has been in.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. I thank the Senator from Wisconsin.

I realize the very difficult position he is in as chairman of the subcommittee. I want to say that I am rather convinced the bill brought forth by the Senate Banking Committee would have been a less desirable bill from the point of view of the Senator from Virginia had it not been for the Senator from Wisconsin (Mr. PROXMIRE).

I think if anything is to be done in regard to Federal help for New York City that the Banking Committee bill was about as good a proposal as could have been brought to the Senate.

Let me say this, my opposition to loan guarantees for New York City does not in any way suggest any animosity on my part toward New York City. As a matter of fact, I stated on the Senate floor many times that New York City is one of the greatest, if not the greatest, city in the world.

I do not know whether we would say it is greater than London. As an American, I would like to think it is. But it is certainly comparable to London, to Paris, to Madrid, to Rome, to Vienna, and in many respects superior to any city in the world.

I lived in New York City for a year or 18 months at one point and I have a very high regard for that great city.

Mr. TOWER. None of it rubbed off on the Senator from Virginia and I am delighted to see that.

[Laughter.]

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. But I do have a very high regard for that city. I know the tremendous contribution which New York City makes to our Nation in many ways.

It is the financial capital of the world, just as Washington is the political capital of the world. New York, in my judgment, is the financial capital of the world and it is a vitally important city.

My opposition to this legislation, just as my opposition to the legislation 4 years ago, is that as a matter of policy I think it is wrong for the Government to get into the business of guaranteeing these finances of a municipality or a State of this Nation.

I think the precedent is dangerous. I think as time goes by it is going to be an invitation for politicians everywhere to give in to the demands of the pressure groups with the knowledge that if a particular city or a particular county or a particular State cannot pay the bill, they will just go to Washington and let the taxpayers take care of the matter.

So that is my opposition to the Federal Government guaranteeing the bonds of New York City, based on what I consider to be an unsound policy and a dangerous precedent.

Mr. MOYNIHAN addressed the Chair.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. I yield to the distinguished Senator from New York.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. I thank the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. President, I rise for the brief purpose of saying that I am profoundly disturbed by the information he has brought to the floor from the General Accounting Office audit which he requested.

The audit hovers at the point of questioning the propriety of recent actions by the mayor of the city of New York. The mayor has provided a reply to this, in the form of a letter from Deputy Mayor Toia to the GAO. I did not know of this matter until now, nor, I think, has Senator JAVITS been informed.

It would not be uncharacteristic of the political practices of our city not to share information openly, as information has often been regarded as a form of power that is diminished if it is ever divided and shared. And so, I never received word that the city had replied, and have not seen the city's reply.

I would undertake on my part to inquire into this matter. I cannot speak for Senator JAVITS, but I am sure he will wish to join me in this. We will seek to get to the essentials of it. There will be a side that New York City will present.

If Senator JAVITS and I conclude there is a question of propriety, we will come to the floor and so state.

I point out one last thing, however, it is the extraordinary fact of this legislation that it establishes a regime which almost to the end of this century will make it not only appropriate but necessary to bring to the floor of the Senate just the kind of questions the Senator has brought.

I would like to state that he has done us no disservice in this matter. It is never a disservice for a person of such a perfect sense of honor as the Senator has, and he has known the experiences we have had over many years in these matters, to raise these questions, because not just the probity of our city government but the appearance of probity is essential to the objectives which we all share here. I make that undertaking, and I thank the Senator from Virginia for raising the question.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. I thank the Senator from New York for the understanding way in which he accepts my comments today in regard to the great city which he has the high honor to represent.

The GAO considered the comments of the city officials and rejected them in the final report.

If I may have the attention of the Senator from Wisconsin, I should like to make a unanimous-consent request, but I want to be sure it meets with his approval.

I stated I would ask unanimous consent at the conclusion of my remarks that the GAO report and other documents be printed in the RECORD. The Senator from Wisconsin subsequently asked that another matter be inserted in the RECORD.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Yes—the response of Deputy Mayor Toia to the GAO report.

Incidentally, I say to the Senator from New York that, as a matter of courtesy, GAO just made the report available to the chairmen of the House and Senate Banking Committees. New York got it some time ago and was asked to respond to it, as a matter of interest to the GAO, so they would have a well-balanced report. This is standard procedure for the GAO.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. The New York reply is a part of the GAO report.

I shall ask unanimous-consent request that the documents that I wish to insert in the RECORD, and the material offered by Senator PROXMIRE be inserted at the end of the colloquy among the Senator from Wisconsin, the Senator from New York, and the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the material to which I have referred and to which the Senator from Wisconsin referred be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

COMPTROLLER GENERAL OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, D.C., July 26, 1978.

Hon. HARRY F. BYRD, Jr.,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR BYRD: In your letter dated May 9, 1978, you requested that we analyze the budgetary impact of the settlement of New York City's recent negotiation with its labor unions.

On June 7 we furnished you a preliminary response which projected a settlement with all unions, following the pattern of the transit workers contract which had been negotiated in April. After the preparation of our letter, a coalition of municipal unions, representing the majority of city workers, negotiated their own contract.

Although the labor picture is still unsettled, in that the negotiated contracts have not yet been ratified by the unions' memberships and other unions are still negotiating, we nevertheless want to respond to your letter at this time. We believe the contract negotiated by the coalition will undoubtedly form the pattern for all other settlements. Further, we wish to bring to your attention two matters which concern us and which have not been given widespread attention. These involve the budgetary impact of these contracts in future periods and the restoration of givebacks previously won by the city.

TERMS OF AGREEMENT

On June 5, 1978, a tentative agreement was reached between the city and a coalition of municipal unions representing most of the city's work force, except for police and firefighters. This contract was subsequently reduced to writing on June 20. The agreement covers the city's 1979 and 1980 fiscal years (July 1, 1978–June 30, 1980).

Its major terms are as follows:

A 4-percent wage increase (minimum $400) will be effective beginning October 1, 1978, and another 4-percent increase (minimum $400) will be effective October 1, 1979.

Cost of living increase I (COLA I) is to continue to be paid to workers in their paychecks and included in their base salary for fringe benefit and pension computation purposes. All workers will be paid COLA I at a rate of $441 per annum. (While most workers were paid COLA I at this rate in the prior contract, some received it in somewhat higher or lower amounts). COLA I will also be included in employee's base salaries for the computation of the second 4-percent wage increase.

Cost of living increase II (COLA II), paid in the previous contract in lump sum amounts, adjusted for the consumer price index, will be discontinued. Its effective rate at the end of the prior contract was $882 per annum. Replacing it will be a cash payment of $750 per annum, paid in the paychecks of employees at a rate of $28.76 biweekly. These amounts will not be included in base pay for pension purposes. While COLA II was to be offset by savings or revenues generated through worker productivity, the cash payment will be paid without consideration of productivity.

The requirement for documenting offsetting productivity savings for COLA II in the prior contract will be waived for the final payment due under that program ($567 per employee).

No additional reductions in fringe benefits (or givebacks) will take place.

City officials estimate the cost of the contract over the 2-year period as applied to all municipal workers will be $1.088 billion.

About $868 million of this amount represents added budget costs to the city which will have to be met by its own tax levy funds. The balance represents amounts chargeable to Federal and State reimbursable programs as well as additional pension costs the city will incur by virtue of this settlement. Our analysis of the city's estimates shows them to be reasonable. Enclosure I shows the city's estimate of cost by contract provision.

In addition to these costs, an arbitration board has recently decided that the city is also liable for approximately another $200 million representing deferred wages to its employees. However, this will only be payable if certain conditions related to the city's fiscal stability are met. Further, the board ruled that these amounts will not have to be paid until after June 30, 1982.

Furthermore, the city may incur added costs if those unions not accepting the coalition agreement (police and firefighters) receive a larger settlement. In that case, uniformed employees presently covered by the coalition agreement could "reopen" their contract and demand greater benefits as well. Approximately 15,000 workers have the right to exercise this "me too" clause. On July 19, 1978, a settlement was reached between the police and the city which is reportedly consistent with the coalition agreement. We have not yet reviewed this contract.

FUNDING OF CONTRACT SETTLEMENT

The city's fiscal year 1979 executive budget indicates that $617 million is available for labor settlements and other contingencies. The sources for that funding are as follows:

| | Millions |
|---|---|
| Amount already included in 4-year plan | $138 |
| Contribution by N.Y. State | 100 |
| Overestimate of pension cost included in 4-year plan | 71 |
| "Surplus" in current year's budget—1978 | 170 |
| Additional revenues and underspending—1979–80 | 138 |
| Total | 617 |

Now that a settlement has been reached which will result in total budgetary demands on the city of $868 million, the city has indicated that the added cost of $251 million will be funded as follows:

| | Millions |
|---|---|
| Additional "surplus" expected in 1978 | $46 |
| Additional State aid | 60 |
| Additional savings and city actions—1979–80 | 145 |
| Total | 251 |

Although we have not examined this incremental funding for the wage settlement, we are concerned by the uncertainty of some elements in the original $617 million funding. In our letter to you of June 7, 1978, we discussed these uncertainties and stated that we believe it is unwise to rely upon some of these uncertain sources to fund a wage settlement.

Use of the 1978 surplus as funding source is not in accordance with generally accepted accounting principles

You specifically asked that we look into the city's plan to utilize its 1978 "surplus" to fund this 1979–80 labor settlement and for our opinion as to whether this funding technique was in accordance with generally accepted accounting principles.[1]

The importance of your question, of course, lies in the fact that the city is functioning under strict annual financial plans, and so, charging the cost of this labor settlement totally to 1979 and 1980 would increase the deficit in those years and require the city to make offsetting budget cuts. On the other hand, if the city charged approximately $220 million in expenses to 1978, that would substantially ease the budgetary pressures in 1979 and 1980 and obviate the need to make budget cuts to pay for this wage settlement.

In our opinion, the city's accounting treatment of the transaction is not in accordance with generally accepted accounting principles. The facts of the situation, as we see them, are as follows. In early April 1978, city officials indicated that they intended to use their 1978 underspending or surplus to provide some of the funding necessary to pay for the wage settlement which was being negotiated. At the time, however, it was not clear just what the surplus would be used for. The city's Deputy Mayor for Finance, had at one point, suggested the surplus might be used to pay for deferring cost of living adjustments. Subsequently, other city officials suggested the surplus might be used to pay for bonuses. During the course of all these discussions this issue had become a public one and was being explored in the local press in articles like "NYC and Unions Study Using 78 Surplus."[2]

In addition to these discussions about what the so-called surplus would be used for, there were also discussions about how to arrange to use it. From an accounting standpoint this presented a problem. Some city officials initially suggested bringing forward the surplus into 1979 and using it as a revenue in that year. This idea was quickly rejected by the Special Deputy State Comptroller for New York City as not being in accordance with generally accepted accounting principles. His conclusion was based on the fact that there was no true surplus, but one existed only after certain adjustments permitted by State law. In addition, the city has a large cumulative deficit so that, under generally accepted accounting principles, there were no available funds to bring forward to 1979. We believe the Special Deputy Comptroller's conclusions are sound.

Ultimately, this matter was resolved when the city and the unions agreed that of the $1,500 cash payment ($750 x 2 years) $937.50 would be considered to have been earned in 1978 and charged to that year. Subsequently, this amount was changed to $1,000. If the payment was considered earned by the employees in 1978, the accounting problem would be solved since the payment could then be properly accounted for as a 1978 expense.

City officials conferred with their certified public accountants and prepared a representation letter which stated that $1,000 of the $1,500 in cash payments had been earned by the employees in 1978 and that it was the city's intention to expense the payments against fiscal year 1978. The CPAs stated that, based on the city's representations as to when the payments were earned, the proposed accounting in their opinion would be in accordance with generally accepted accounting principles.

Our view of this transaction differs from that of the city and its CPAs. As set forth in a statement of the Accounting Principles Board, a basic feature of financial accounting is that it emphasizes the economic substance of events rather than their form. In this case, the parties publicly stated on several occasions their intention was to utilize the 1978 surplus thereby easing 1979 and 1980 budgetary pressures. They stated that they would do so by some appropriate accounting technique which they had not yet decided upon.

Therefore we believe the use of the surplus and the relief of budgetary pressure in 1979 and 1980 was the objective of the parties and that is the substance of the transaction. In our opinion, this cannot be overlooked in assessing the propriety of the accounting involved. Looking toward the substance of the transaction then, we can see no justification for charging it as a 1978 expense.

Beyond the question of substance over form, there is, in our opinion, another flaw in the justification for charging this as a 1978 expense. The agrement requires that for employees to be paid the full $1,000 payment they must continue to work for the city during 1979 and part of 1980. This requirement clearly suggests that the employees have not earned the $1,000 payment for services rendered in 1978, and therefore that expense should not be charged to 1978.

In arriving at our assessment of this transaction we were guided in part by some particularly germane comments made some years ago in an accounting research study.[3] While the study does not have the force of accounting principles it is nevertheless part of the accounting profession's body of knowledge. The authors said in part:

"Unless accountants are forearmed, they could slip into acceptance of accounting 'principles' which are not independent expressions of the results of accounting considerations but instead simply validate the policies established in the field of collective bargaining."

On July 17, 1978, we provided this section of the letter to the city for its review and comment. A copy of its comments is included as Enclosure III.

The city strongly disagrees with our opinion that its accounting for the costs of the labor settlement is not in accordance with generally accepted accounting principles. The city contends that budgetary relief for fiscal year 1979 and 1980 was only one of the effects of the settlement and not a primary objective as we contend.

The city's comments contain information which supports its accounting treatment of the labor settlement. According to the city, at meetings in early April, representatives of the Mayor's office expressed the city's intent to share part of the estimated statutory surplus with its employees, because the surplus was partially derived from increased employee productivity. The city states it was advised by its independent auditors that if payment to employees was earned and related to services provided in fiscal year 1978, the cost of that payment should be charged to 1978. The city maintains that since this was its intent, negotiating this concept with the unions was the problem it faced and not accounting for the transaction.

We recognize that payment for services rendered in a given fiscal year is an appropriate expense of that year. We nonetheless continue to believe that the size of the labor settlement coupled with the financial difficulties faced by the city and its need to ease budgetary pressures in fiscal years 1979 and 1980 were the motivating forces in arriving at the terms of the labor settlement. While relieving an immediate fiscal problem, this strategy compounds the financial pressures the city faces in the years beyond this contract. As a result, we feel strongly that charging part of the wage settlement to fiscal year 1978, a year in which the city anticipates a deficit under generally accepted accounting principles, not a surplus, obscures the impact of the settlement and will distort the result of the city's financial operations in fiscal year 1979 and 1980.

The overriding consideration from an accounting point of view is that under the terms of the labor agreement there is no liability for fiscal year 1978. The $1,000 payment is, in effect, for services to be rendered in fiscal year 1979 and part of fiscal year 1980, subject to the condition that the employee worked in fiscal year 1978. This amount was not earned in fiscal year 1978, because employees who do not work in fiscal years 1979 and 1980 are not entitled to the payment.

BUDGETARY IMPACT OF CONTRACT IN FUTURE PERIODS

Generally speaking, this labor settlement has been presented as a conservative one. There is one aspect of it, however, which has not been widely discussed and which may not ultimately prove to be so conservative.

This contract may have a significant budgetary impact on the city after June 1980 since the salary levels on which wage increases will be applied will be sharply higher at the end of the period than they were at the beginning of this contract (see Enclosure II). This difference between the so called "going-in" and "going-out" rates is significant when viewed in terms of the next labor negotiation. For example, in this contract the employees won two increases of 4 percent each and these were viewed as moderate. At the end of the contract period, however, the full 8 percent will be in effect, and combined with the $750 annual cash payment provided for in the contract, this will give the employees a "going-out" rate which may be as high as 16 percent more than the "going-in" rate for the average employee ($15,500 per year). This increased rate will most likely become the base for the next negotiation and should have a budgetary impact not readily apparent when one examines the modest 4 percent increase in the contract at hand.

We discussed this with city officials who said there is no reason to assume that the $750 annual cash payment in this contract will be included in the going-out rates on which future increases will be based. They maintain this will be a matter for negotiation. In fact, they do not assume the payment itself will be continued beyond 1980. Therefore, the financial plan for 1981 and 1982 makes no provision for paying the approximately $160 million this payment would cost in each of these 2 years.

Union representatives, on the other hand, tell us their position will likely be that these amounts will be part of the base at which new negotiations will begin.

In our opinion, it is unrealistic to think otherwise.

RESTORATION OF GIVEBACKS PREVIOUSLY WON BY THE CITY

One other aspect of this contract which has not been widely discussed, but which may nevertheless be significant, relates to the question of givebacks previously won by the city.

Early in the fiscal crisis the city negotiated a $24 million annual reduction in fringe benefits with its unions. This was part of the general austerity program in the city and was one of the city's budget cutting actions. Under this program the starting salaries of certain new employees were cut back 10 percent; vacation allowances for new employees were reduced from 20 to 15 days; check cashing privileges were cancelled; and other fringes were either cut back or cancelled.

Going into this current negotiation, city officials had announced that they were demanding further reductions in employee fringe benefits, or givebacks, ranging from $70 to $100 million. As the negotiations progressed, however, the city softened its position on this matter and ultimately achieved no givebacks. Beyond that, the city also conceded to return some of the givebacks previously negotiated.

The 10 percent starting salary reductions and the vacation reductions were given back to the unions. We have not estimated the cost of the fringes returned, but city officials agree that the major concessions previously won from the unions have been returned.

As arranged with your office, we are sending copies of this report to the Chairman of the Senate Committee on Banking, Housing and Urban Affairs and the Chairman of the House Subcommittee on Economic Stabilization, Committee on Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs. Copies will also be available to other interested parties who request them.

We would be happy to meet with you or any of your staff members to discuss these issues further.

Sincerely yours,

ELMER B. STAATS,
Comptroller General of the United States.

THE CITY OF NEW YORK,
OFFICE OF THE MAYOR,
New York, N.Y., July 21, 1978.

Mr. EDWARD HEFFERON,
U.S. General Accounting Office,
New York, N.Y.

DEAR MR. HEFFERON: We are responding to the draft of your comments to Senator Byrd relating to "the use of the FY 1978 surplus as a funding source" in the City's labor settlement. We appreciate the opportunity to respond as it is a matter of great concern and importance to the City.

The City strongly disagrees with the opinion that the City's accounting for the costs of the labor settlement is not in accordance with generally accepted accounting principles (GAAP). The key issue raised by the General Accounting Office ("GAO") is that the primary objective of the City and the coalition unions was to provide budget relief in FY 1979 and FY 1980. It is the City's position that this was only one of the effects of the settlement. The City believes that the economic substance of the City's labor settlement is properly accounted for and specifically that the $1,000 non-pensionable cash payment ("cash payment) is a proper FY 1978 charge. This accounting is based upon appropriate facts and evidence to support the City's position.

Shortly after the conclusion of the labor negotiations with the Transit Workers, City officials met with representatives of the Emergency Financial Control Board, the Office of the Special Deputy Comptroller, the Citys independent auditors, Peat, Marwick, Mitchell & Co., and others to discuss the Citys pending coalition union labor negotiations. At these meetings in early April representatives of the Mayors Office stated that, as part of the labor negotiations, the City intended to share part of its estimated statutory surplus in FY 1978 with its employees because the estimated statutory surplus was partially derived from employee actions in providing service levels at reduced costs. The City asked its independent auditors what the proper accounting treatment would be and they responded that, if a payment to employees was earned and related to services provided in FY 1978, the cost of that payment should be charged to FY 1978. This was indeed the City's intention and therefore the accounting was not considered to be a problem early on in these discussions. Rather the problem was negotiating this concept with the unions as well as meeting other requirements of law.

The GAO claims that "some City officials" inquired about bringing forward the surplus into FY 1979 at one of these meetings. This concept was rejected not only by the Special Deputy Comptroller but aso at the same time by representatives of the Mayor's Office, the City Comptroller's Office and by Peat, Marwick, Mitchell & Company. During all these meetings, in the labor negotiations, and in public statements, the City consistently indicated that it was committed to budgeting and accounting for its operations in accordance with GAAP.

The City further articulated its negotiating position and intentions in the Mayor's Budget Message, dated April 26, 1978. In keeping with the policy for full and complete disclosure, funds were shown as reserved in FY 1978 as part of the costs of the labor settlement. This presentation reaffirmed the City's position that certain costs associated with a labor settlement would be earned and chargeable in FY 1978.

The Coalition Economic Agreement was executed on June 20, 1978 and under its terms, the City and the coalition unions agreed that "a cash payment shall be earned and paid to qualifying employees for services rendered during the City's fiscal years ending June 30, 1978, . . . " (emphasis added). This contract language represented an important gain for the City because it indicated that the coalition unions accepted the concept of a payment to employees for their services in a preceding year dependent upon the results of operations for that year. The payment did not become part of the employees' wage base nor was it included in determining an employee's pension.

Perhaps the only section of the contract referred to by the GAO as support for its opinion relates to the condition that employees who leave the employ of the City before they have received their full cash payment will not receive the unpaid amount. This singular reference ignores several additional important contract provisions, however.

For example, the agreement provides that employees entering City service in FY 1979 were not entitled to any portion of the FY 1978 cash payment. It should also be emphasized that salary levels of new employees have not been increased to compensate for this cash payment.

In addition, not all FY 1978 employees received the entire amount of the cash payment. The agreement clearly stipulated that the amount of the cash payment would be prorated for the length of service an employee worked in FY 1978. For one quarter of FY 1978 would only earn and, therefore, could not receive more than one-quarter of the cash payment. Thus, the amount of the employee's cash payment is directly related to the amount of service provided to the City in FY 1978.

The agreement further provides that the cash payments be paid over a period of months and not paid as a lump sum as of June 30, 1978, for example. This provision was made as a matter of sound fiscal management to reduce the cash needs of the City during a time when the City was seeking financing assistance in both the private and public sectors. Obviously, the effect of this agreement is to limit the overall economic cost of the settlement in each of the contract years as well as for future years. This was done to establish the principle that the cash payment is only available to the extent that it is earned within a particular fiscal year and to the extent that funds are available. The City has thus incorporated into its labor contract a fiscally responsible method of compensating its employees.

These conditions and terms of the Coalition Economic Agreement are not unlike those of compensation plans of private industry. For instance, under the concept of profit sharing plans, the profit of an enterprise, which is usually determined after the year is completed, is shared with the employees. Payment of the determined amount is usually made in the following year to employees for their service in the preceding year. The amount paid to the employees is treated as a change to the period in which earned, i.e., in the year to which services are related. This is the same accounting treatment the City proposes to follow. Many major publicly-owned corporations use this accounting treatment and such treatment has been accepted by the Securities and Exchange Commission as well as by the public accounting profession.

The GAO implies that, regardless of the form of the labor agreement, all costs should be charged to FY 1979 and FY 1980. However, there is no legal or accounting basis of which the City is aware that would require that all the costs of this labor agreement be charged to FY 1979 and FY 1980 irrespective of the terms of the agreement. In addition, the GAO has not specified an alternative accounting nor the basis for its application. If cash basis expenditure accounting for this payment were proposed, for instance, this would represent a return to some of the City's past practices which have been severely criticized in the SEC report, among others, and which the City would strongly resist.

We believe that we have responded to the issues raised in the opinion expressed in your letter. During the discussions prior to and during the labor negotiations, the City Comptroller, the Special Deputy State Comptroller, Peat, Marwick, Mitchell & Company, the Emergency Financial Control Board and others were aware of the issues and the accounting principles involved. They have not taken exception to the City's accounting for the costs of the labor settlement. The City reaffirms its position that its accounting for the costs of the Coalition Economic Agreement properly reflects the economic substance of the results of its labor negotiations.

Very truly yours,

PHILIP L. TOIA,
Deputy Mayor for Finance.

COMPTROLLER GENERAL OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, D.C., June 7, 1978.

Hon. HARRY F. BYRD, Jr.,
U.S. Senate,

DEAR SENATOR BYRD: In your letter dated May 9, 1978, you requested that we prepare a report on the budgetary impact of existing and prospective labor contract settlements in New York City. In a subsequent discussion with your office we advised that while we have been following the status of the city's labor negotiations, we are unable to furnish definitive answers to your questions because those negotiations are still in process. Rather than delay responding, however, we would like to furnish you some of the preliminary information which we have developed.

Essentially, there are three main sets of negotiations the city is faced with: (1) the transit workers' contracts expired March 31, 1978; (2) the main body of municipal workers are covered by contracts expiring June 30, 1978; and (3) the teachers' contracts expire in September 1978. The teachers, however, are negotiating in a coalition with the main body of municipal workers. The police and fire unions, on the other hand, have excluded themselves from the coalition and will negotiate independently. As of May 31, 1978, the city has negotiated a proposed agreement with the transit workers and they were in active negotiations with the coalition of municipal workers. The transit contract had not yet been accepted by the union membership, and, in fact, the union leaders had made public statements indicating that they might attempt to re-open negotiations with the city if the terms offered to the coalition exceeded the terms they had won. In essence, then, no contracts have been finally settled as of May 31, 1978.

Assuming that the contracts might offer equal benefits to all employees when finally negotiated, we analyzed the proposed transit contract and projected it over all municipal employees. Our projections indicated that the transit contract over 2 years (fiscal years 1979 and 1980) would cost the city $18 million and those same benefits extended to the main body of municipal employees over the same 2-year period would cost the city approximately $870 million.

Our understanding of the transit workers' contract, as outlined below, is based on what we were able to learn of the terms and conditions of the contract by speaking to one of the principals to the negotiation and several city officials who were on the periphery of the negotiation. The representative of the transit workers, who was the other principal, elected not to talk to us about the proposed contract until after it was finalized.

The major terms of the agreement, according to our discussions, are as follows:

A 6-percent wage increase, payment of which is deferred for 3 months. The increase is, therefore, applicable to the last 21 months (July 1978 to March 1980) of the 24 month contract.

A $250 lump sum payment, payable before July 1, 1978, not to be included in the workers' base salary for pension computation purposes.

Cost of living increase I (COLA I) is to be continued and frozen at the rate of $0.22 per hour and included in the hourly salary rate and base salary for pension computation purposes.

Cost of living increase II (COLA II) is to be continued and frozen at $0.40 per hour and included in the hourly rate but not the pension base for employees on board as of March 31, 1978. Under prior agreements this COLA was offset by savings generated from worker productivity. Under this contract, however, the COLA will be paid without consideration of productivity. The contract also provides that previously existing productivity programs will continue.

Cost of living increase III (COLA III) is to be paid after July 1, 1979, based on the Consumer Price Index rise for the period July 1978 to May 1979. The total COLA III increase will be included in employees' pay checks but will not be included in base salaries for pension computation purposes. This COLA is not expected to add any cost to the contract because it is to be funded totally by measured productivity savings.

Management's prerogative to hire part-time workers will be recognized in the hiring of 200 part-time change booth clerks in the subway system.

Because the transit operating authority in New York City is an independent authority and has substantial income from fares, the cost of this contract to the city is not major. The city's projections show that its subsidy to the transit system will increase by $18 million to fund this settlement.

Our preliminary projection of the cost of those conditions, if a similar pact is negotiated with all city workers, is summarized below.

ESTIMATED COST OF A TRANSIT-LIKE SETTLEMENT IF APPLIED TO OTHER MUNICIPAL UNIONS 2-YR CONTRACT

[In millions of dollars]

| | Total payout under contract | Nontax levy share [1] | Tax-levy share or city cost |
|---|---|---|---|
| Wage increase—6 percent | 481 | 63 | 418 |
| Bonus—$250 per employee | 66 | 9 | 57 |
| Continuation of COLA I [2] | | | |
| Continuation of COLA II | [3] 453 | [3] 58 | [3] 395 |
| Institution of COLA III [4] | | | |
| Total | 1,000 | 130 | [5] 870 |

[1] The nontax levy share represents that portion of the city's incremental costs which are normally projected to be passed on to the State and Federal governments under reimbursable grant programs. This is currently estimated to be 13 percent.

[2] COLA I is already included in employee hourly wage rates and accounted for in the 4-yr financial plan.

[3] COLA II might cost somewhat less if the existing productivity programs continue to generate savings in the future.

[4] COLA III is expected to be a no-cost COLA since it is to be paid only out of measured savings from productivity.

[5] This estimate does not include increased pension costs of approximately $50,000,000 per year. Since the city funds its pensions on a 2-yr lag this cost will not impact on its budgets until 1981.

A discussion of how the city would fund a settlement of $870 million is speculative to some extent because the city's offers have been for a 2-year settlement at lower amounts. They have, therefore, been planning on funding those amounts rather than the highest cost projected here.

The city's latest contract offer is for a package estimated to cost $700 million to be offset by $78 million in "givebacks" of fringe benefits. These givebacks are to be of the type which will actually reduce the cost of the labor settlement.

The city's fiscal year 1979 executive budget indicates that $617 million will be available during 1979 and 1980 for labor settlements and other contingencies. The sources for that funding are as follows:

| | Millions |
|---|---|
| Amount included in 4-year financial plan | $138 |
| Contribution by N.Y. State | 100 |
| Overestimate of pension cost included in 4-year plan | 71 |
| "Surplus" in current year's budget (1978) | 170 |
| Additional revenues and underspending 1979–1980 | 138 |
| Total | 617 |

We attempted to verify the availability of these amounts as possible funding sources. While our work was constrained because the amounts in question are budget estimates subject to change, we have been able to learn the following:

$138 million included in 4-year plan

This amount was included in the plan as the city's share of the anticipated cost of COLA II.

$100 million contribution by N.Y. State

City officials told us that the Governor pledged $100 million from State funds to assist in the 2-year contract settlement. We visited Albany and met with a State budget official who told us that the State was planning to provide the first half of its share of such funding as part of a total city aid package. The details of the funding for that aid package will require some State or Federal legislative action before it is firm. Details of the State's 1980 funding sources are as yet uncertain.

$71 million overestimate of pension cost

City officials told us that the cost of the city's pension contribution had been overestimated by about $39 million for 1979 and $32 million for 1980. We discussed these amounts with the actuary who showed us his estimates and explained that he had initially overestimated the needs of certain funds. The overestimates became evident upon a detailed review of the computations and when they were discovered he brought them to the attention of city budget officials.

$170 million "surplus" in 1978 budget

This $170 million in available funds resulted primarily from projected underspending by city agencies during fiscal year 1978.

We discused this underspending with representatives of the Office of the Special Deputy Comptroller for New York City, whose recent review of spending levels for the entire year projected them at roughly the same levels projected by the city. We analyzed the work of the Special Deputy Comptroller's staff and we reviewed the city's actual spending reports as of February 1978. Our work indicated that most of the projected underspending was reasonable. We do, however, have reservations about that portion of the underspending which city officials claim will result from a tightening of the procedures under which agencies can obligate appropriations at the end of the year. While this may result in reduction of spending, city officials could offer no support for the $50 million specifically earmarked to be saved under these new procedures.

There has been some controversy about the propriety of using this 1978 underspending to pay for the costs of the 1979 labor contract. If this controversy is not resolved in favor of the city, the availability of these funds to pay for the wage settlement would be uncertain. The matter, however, may be resolved in another way. If the language in the labor contracts identifies certain benefits as having been earned by employees in 1978, the costs of those benefits might be considered as 1978 expenses, and the 1978 underspending could then be applied to pay for those expenses.

The largest component of this amount is an estimated $80 million to be derived from the sale of the right-of-way for the construction and Westway, a highway project. These revenues were originally projected to be received in fiscal year 1978.

Before the project goes forward the city must obtain permits from Federal and State agencies. The Federal Environmental Protection Agency has already recommended against the project and although city and State officials believe all objections will eventually be overcome, the realization of these revenues is uncertain at this time.

The city is also projecting $20 million in additional revenues for fiscal year 1979, primarily in increased sales and personal income taxes. The Office of the Special Deputy Comptroller has reviewed the city's econometric projections of these items and found them reasonable.

Most of the remaining $38 million is expected to result from underspending similar to that being experienced in fiscal year 1978.

Given the uncertainty of several of the funding sources, there is a risk in relying on such sources to fund a wage settlement. It should be noted, however, that the city always has the option of making various budget cuts to fund the cost of the wage package.

In any discussion of the funding of pay increases it is important to keep in mind that the city has other funding problems as well, as its budget is still far from being balanced. Enclosure I shows the extent of the city's budget balancing problem assuming the transit settlement were extended to the other municipal unions.

As arranged with your office, we plan to make copies of this report available to other interested parties. We would be happy to meet with you to discuss any of these matters further.

Sincerely yours,

R. F. KELLER,
Acting Comptroller General of the United States.

COMPTROLLER GENERAL OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, D.C., March 30, 1978.

Hon. WILLIAM S. MOORHEAD,
Chairman, Subcommittee on Economic Stabilization, House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: In your letter of March 10, 1978, written jointly with the Honorable Stewart B. McKinney, you requested that we respond to the question of whether there would be a serious risk of default, insolvency or bankruptcy if the Federal Government provided only seasonal loans to New York City in lieu of some other proposals which have been discussed during your Subcommittee's hearings. You stated that you had no specific term in mind for the seasonal loans but a simple 1-year extension had been suggested as a possibility. The Subcommittee staff subsequently asked that we also comment on a 3-year extension.

We have closely followed the extremely complex New York City situation for the past 2 years, but like most other observers we cannot answer your questions with complete confidence. We are nevertheless offering our opinions on your questions, as well as some of our thoughts on the conditions we think should accompany any program of aid to New York City.

In our judgment, there is a risk associated with the seasonal loan approach. It is not possible to predict with certainty the actions of all the city's long-term financing sources—the pension fund trustees, the banks, and the investing public. Pension fund trustees, both State and city, have indicated they will not invest fund assets unless the securities are guaranteed by the Federal Government. In addition, the Chairman of the Municipal Assistance Corporation (MAC) has stated that MAC might not be able to market its securities without Federal involvement in a total financing package and he has contended that a stand-up Federal seasonal loan program, as well as Federal guarantees of long-term obligations, is needed.

The risk, then, lies in underestimating the sincerity or judgment of those individuals.

First and foremost, in considering the option of 1-year financing, there is a question as to whether the Secretary of the Treasury could make such a loan. The existing legislation requires the Secretary to make a determination that there is a reasonable prospect of repayment before he approves any loans. We assume new legislation would include a similar provision and there might be considerable doubt about the prospect of repayment in the absence of continued long-term financing for the city. Such long-term financing from MAC and the pension funds might be constrained without a strong indication of Federal involvement for longer than 1 year.

The city's 4-year financing plan projects long-term financing needs in fiscal year 1979 of $1.2 billion as follows:

| Purpose: | Millions |
|---|---|
| True capital needs (mostly owed on existing contracts) | $423 |
| Operating expenses in capital budget | 450 |
| Bonding of MAC capital reserve | 200 |
| Refunding of MAC bonds | 100 |
| Total | 1,173 |

The plan proposed that the true capital financing needs ($423 million) be provided through the proceeds of Federally guaranteed bonds to be sold to the city and State pension funds with the balance ($750 million) to be sold by MAC, without guarantees, to financial institutions and the public.

The Senate Banking Committee, in its February report, concluded the city's long-term financing needs were somewhat less and felt they could be met by essentially the same sources the city designated, but without any Federal guarantees.

Regardless of which estimate is correct, if Federal assistance is limited to a 1-year extension of seasonal financing, certain obstacles need to be overcome. The continuing investment of the city pension funds in city obligations without Federal guarantees must be considered questionable. While these funds have invested about $2 billion in New York City paper between 1975 and 1977 without a guarantee, there is no assurance they will continue to do so. The trustees have stated they do not intend to make such investments without a guarantee, emphasizing that their fiduciary duty compels them to seek a more diversified portfolio of investments. On the other hand, faced with a similar situation in 1975, the pension fund trustees did invest in New York City and they may have no option but to do so again to protect their existing investment.

The State pension funds do not currently hold any city or MAC securities. The sole trustee of these funds has stated that he will not invest in them without "iron clad" Federal guarantees.

Public reception to new MAC offering to meet the city's long-term financing needs also seems far from assured. The Chairman of MAC and other officials representing the city and State have insisted that the total financing package, both long-term and seasonal, called for in the city's plan, is needed to assure investor confidence in city securities. In view of these statements, the question arises as to whether any proposal that calls for substantially less Federal involvement, such as a 1-year extension of seasonal loans, will instill the necessary confidence in investors.

The 3-year approach may be somewhat less risky than the 1-year approach. There is a possibility that it might induce others to invest but the city's financing sources might view seasonal loans, even for 3 years, as too short a Federal commitment. If that view is taken, the city would continue to face difficulty in obtaining long-term funds and the Congress could expect to be faced with the same problem again.

The long-term financing needs over the next 3 years according to the city's plan are as follows:

[In millions of dollars]

| Purpose | 1979 | 1980 | 1981 | Total |
|---|---|---|---|---|
| True capital needs | 423 | 537 | 746 | 1,706 |
| Operating expenses in capital budget | 450 | 300 | 150 | 900 |
| Bonding State advance | | 200 | 300 | 500 |
| Bonding of MAC capital reserve | 200 | 50 | | 250 |
| Refunding of MAC bonds | 100 | 200 | 200 | 500 |
| Total long-term financing needs | 1,173 | 1,287 | 1,396 | 3,856 |

Under a seasonal loan approach, and assuming the same sources of financing the city has assumed, the city and State employees pension funds would be called on to invest $1.6 billion in unguaranteed city bonds, financial institutions and the public would be asked to invest $2.15 billion in MAC bonds, and the public would be expected to invest $100 million in city bonds. It is simply not possible to know if these sources would provide the funding necessary if Federal participation were restricted to 3 years.

If the Congress decides to continue a Federal financing role, we believe the wisest course of action would be one which offers a long-range solution rather than a series of temporary measures which tend to obscure and complicate the problem. We strongly believe that the terms of any Federal assistance should be quite stringent and provide a strong incentive for the city to end its reliance on the Federal Government as soon as possible.

In that regard, a strict fiscal control mechanism would be an essential condition. Further, an important precondition to continuing Federal assistance should be a resolution of the city's present labor negotiations in a manner which does not increase the projected deficits in the city's 4-year financial plan.

The pertinent portion of a report we issued on April 4, 1977, entitled "Assessment of New York City's Performance and Prospects Under Its 3-Year Emergency Financial Plan," is enclosed. In that report, we outlined the conditions we believe should be included in any long-term solution involving Federal loans or guarantees for New York City or any other local government. In essence these conditions, as we would view them as applying to New York City, are:

1. Federal loans or loan guarantees should only be made available after a clear demonstration to the Federal Government that the city has no alternate source for borrowing and the State is unable to provide the needed financing. There should also be a determination by the Federal Government that there is a reasonable prospect for repayment.

2. An independent State board of managers should be established for the duration of any Federal involvement. The board should be responsible for supervising the fiscal affairs of New York City and should have the power to approve, disapprove and modify the city's budgets or any line items within those budgets. That authority should enable it not only to assure that the budgets will be balanced, but also to approve the means by which the balance is achieved. The Secretary of the Treasury could be empowered to appoint an independent respected member of the financial community, knowledgeable in municipal affairs, as a Federal representative on the board. Any Federal loans or loan guarantees should be made through the board, or an appropriate State agency, rather than directly to the city.

3. To encourage State and city efforts to disengage from Federal dependence, monetary penalties should be attached. Interest rates on direct Federal loans should be set at a level so that the city receives less favorable treatment than others borrowing in the private market. For loan guarantees, a fee could be discretionary based on the Federal Government's evaluation of the risk involved.

4. The loan or loan guarantee agreements should provide an automatic review mechanism to assess the potential for refinancing the loans in the private market as soon as practical.

5. Provisions should be made for Federal audit and review.

6. Long-term borrowing for current operating expenses represents such an undesirable fiscal practice that the use of Federal loans or guarantees for such purposes should be prohibited.

In commenting on similar conditions in our prior report, city officials found them unduly onerous and thought some might be an infringement on the rights of elected city officials. We understand their concern. The potential disruption of our federal system of government is of great concern to us. However, we believe continued Federal assistance mandates strong independence involvement in, and control over, the financial operations of the city for what will be, hopefully, a short period of time. Through such involvement there will be best assurance that the difficult decisions will be made—

To close the city's revenue and expense gap;

To end the special Federal and State involvement in the city's affairs;

To return the management of the city to locally elected officials, and

To restore normalcy in intergovernmental relations.

Subsequent to the preparation of the above response, a bill was introduced in the House, cosponsored by you and eleven other Representatives, which addresses many of the issues we raise in this letter.

The basic thrust of this bill seems to promise the long-range solution that we discussed above. We believe, however, that a more specific statement of the terms to be imposed as a condition of Federal assistance would better insure a rapid recovery of the city to a position of fiscal stability.

In particular, we think that the powers of the "independent fiscal monitor" should be more specifically enumerated, along the lines of the second condition listed on page 5 of this letter. The monitor, or board as we call it, should be authorized to modify specific line items in the city's budget. The existing Emergency Financial Control Board generally looks only at the aggregates of the budget, and not the details making up those aggregates. The condition we outlined represents a significant change in the way the board would be expected to function.

We would also suggest that you consider the possible merits of having a Federal representative appointed to the board, possibly by the Secretary of the Treasury. Such an appointment, not unusual in a large credit arrangement, would provide a third-party voice to represent the national interest. This representative would be a party to all of the discussions and decision-making processes now participated in by only State and city officials or appointees of those officials.

We would be happy to meet with you to discuss these observations further.

Sincerely yours,

ELMER B. STAATS,
Comptroller General of the United States.

COMPTROLLER GENERAL'S REPORT TO THE CONGRESS: ASSESSMENT OF NEW YORK CITY'S PERFORMANCE AND PROSPECTS UNDER ITS 3-YEAR EMERGENCY FINANCIAL PLAN

CONCLUSIONS

New York City faced a financial crisis of major proportions during most of 1975. Toward the end of that year, a combination of Federal and State actions stabilized the situation somewhat. It permitted the city to function in an orderly fashion under a financial plan which called for a combination of revenue increases and budget cuts that would lead to a balanced budget by June 30, 1978.

The city has made progress toward resolving its problems, a goal it must achieve to restore its fiscal independence and stability. It is clear, however, that major problems confront the city during the remainder of the financial plan and in the period immediately following. Despite the obvious difficulties, city officials remain cautiously optimistic about meeting the goal of the financial plan. Their determination is encouraging and indispensable to the city's success.

Although no one can state with certainty whether or not the city will achieve the goals of the financial plan, our assessment, at this point, indicates there are sufficient uncertainties to suggest the city may fall short of its goals. Its success is highly dependent on actions of various levels of government as well as the private sector. Even if the city is successful, it remains uncertain whether it will be able to gain sufficient access to the private credit market or other non-Federal sources for its total financial needs after June 30, 1978.

MATTERS FOR CONSIDERATION BY THE CONGRESS

A variety of proposals for Federal action which would assist New York City have been, and no doubt will continue to be advanced. Proposals range from fundamental changes in the Federal domestic assistance system, such as Federal takeover of welfare, to Federal assistance in regional development efforts to stimulate the economy of the Northeast. This report focuses on the more immediate fiscal questions.

It is clear that the city will require substantial short- and long-term financing after the plan period. The amount of the financing will depend on a number of variables, including the degree of success the city has in carrying out its financial plan. Should the city be unable to meet its total financing needs in the private market, it will likely seek Federal assistance in the form of direct Federal loans, loan guarantees, or a combination of the two.

The Congress can, of course, decide to take no action and leave the problem at the State and local level for resolution. On the other hand, it may find that sufficient Federal interest continues to exist to justify further assistance in meeting the financing needs of the city.

Congress could provide for short-term financing by either extending the New York City Seasonal Financing Act of 1975 along with the terms and conditions associated with the present program or by enacting a loan guarantee program. This would leave long-term financing for operating deficits and the capital program to be provided by other sources. Should the city be unable to gain access to other sources of credit, the Congress could consider enacting a program of direct or guaranteed Federal loans for long-term financing needs.

Federal, State, and city officials have for some time been discussing the concept of loan guarantees. Loan guarantee proposals were considered and reported out of Committee in both Houses of the Congress in the fall of 1975. Neither proposal was accepted, primarily because of the President's announcement that he was prepared to veto any legislation designed to prevent a default by the city The President was concerned that Federal guarantees would reduce rather than increase the prospect that the city's budget would ever be balanced, and would establish an undesirable precedent which would relieve the pressure on other State and local governments for prudent management of their financial affairs.

In our judgment, any consideration of Federal approaches to assist the city in meeting its financing needs for the post-1978 period should take these concerns into account. The fiscal cornerstone of our decentralized governmental system rests on the proposition that States and their political subdivisions must raise the revenue required to pay for the level of services they elect to provide. The Federal Government, through a multitude of domestic assistance programs, provides massive supplements to State and local programs. However, responsibility for maintaining overall fiscal viability has and must continue to rest at the State and local level.

Therefore, we believe that any program of direct to guaranteed Federal loans to the city or any other local government should carry stringent conditions. Elements of many of the conditions we would envision are already in place under the New York City Seasonal Financing Act or were included in congressional loan guarantee proposals advanced in the fall of 1975. We would recommend the following:

1. Federal loans or loan guarantees should only be made available after a clear demonstration to the Federal Government that the local government has no alternate source for borrowing and the State government is unable to provide needed financing. There should also be a determination by the Federal Government that there is a reasonable prospect for repayment.

2. An independent State board should be established for the duration of any Federal involvement. The board would be responsible for supervising the fiscal affairs of the local government in that it would have the power to approve, disapprove, and modify the localities' budget. Any Federal loans or loan guarantees should be made through the State board, or other appropriate State agency, rather than directly to the locality.

3. To encourage prudent State and local management of financial affairs and to discourage applications, financial discentives should be attached to any program of Federal loans or loan guarantees. Interest rates on direct Federal loans should be set at a level such that the State or locality does not receive favored treatment over others borrowing in the private market. For loan guarantees, a fee could be required and the interest income could be made subject to the Federal income tax. The fee established could be discretionary based on the Federal Government's evaluation of local and national conditions at the time the guarantees were authorized.

4. The period of Federal loans or guarantees on specific transactions should be limited. For example, any long-term issue could include a provision for automatic termination of the Federal guarantee or for refinancing of direct loans at the end of a specified period, perhaps 5 years, provided the issue could be refinanced at reasonable interest rates in the private market.

5. Provision should be made for Federal audit and review.

6. Long-term borrowing for current operating expenses represents such an undesirable fiscal practice that consideration should be given to a provision which would preclude the use of Federal loans or guarantees for such purposes. The difficulty with such a provision in the case of New York City is that long-term financing of current operating expenses represents one of its major needs for the next several years. While its efforts might not be successful, in our judgment, the city should look to the State or to other sources, such as its pension funds, for this type of financing. As a minimum, long-term loans or guarantees of long-term loans which will provide funds for operating expenses should be approved only if it is absolutely clear that no alternate sources of financing are available and concerted efforts are being made to eliminate the need to borrow for operating expenses.

Federal assistance in the form of loans or loan guarantees would only address the comparatively short-range fiscal aspects of the New York City crisis. While much of the city's crisis can legitimately be attributed to a history of poor financial management, the problem has been exacerbated by social and economic forces which are largely beyond the control of local officials. The seemingly intractable social problems that confront many of the nation's older cities represent one of our major domestic problems and present a range of issues and potential Federal policy responses which are beyond the scope of this report. These issues are considered in a separate GAO report dealing with the longer-term fiscal problems of the New York City area as they relate to the economic conditions of the area.

COMMENTS OF CONCERNED OFFICIALS

We received comments on this report from officials of New York City, the Office of the New York State Special Deputy Comptroller for New York City, and the Emergency Financial Control Board. Their comments are summarized below. The full text of the comments are included as appendixes III through V.

On January 14, 1977, the same day that comments were requested from State and city officials, we also requested comments on this report from the Office of Management and Budget and the Department of the Treasury. Comments have not been received from either agency.

City comments

City officials commented that overall our report was comprehensive, thoughtful, and helpful in discussing the immediate fiscal questions confronting the city. The city reaffirmed its intent to balance its budget for fiscal year 1978 but reiterated its belief that the recovery of New York City will be possible only if the coalition of interests in the unions, financial community, State and Federal Governments, and the public at large continues to work together.

The city believes that a discussion of the alternatives open to the Federal Government in the event it must request Federal assistance is helpful from a planning standpoint. It agrees with the need to provide disincentives for the use of Federal financing aid since it is not desirable to have such aid become a regular part of municipal finance. It contends, however, that some of our proposals are unduly onerous and take on a punitive aspect.

Also, the city believes that Federal assistance should not be contingent on all alternate sources of borrowing being exhausted. It believes that Federal help should come early rather than as a last ditch effort, and the conditions for assistance imposed on the city should be carefully drawn so as not to infringe on the rights of elected city officials or be so punitive as to add to the city's problems.

Special Deputy Comptroller's comments

The State's Special Deputy Comptroller concurred with our conclusion that it is uncertain whether the city will gain sufficient access to the private credit market or other non-Federal sources for its total financial needs after June 30, 1978. He suggested that the most prudent course would be to enact a loan program as soon as possible that would make available, on a standby basis, any necessary financing that was not otherwise available. He believed such a program would assure prospective lenders there was no risk of bankruptcy in the event the city's aggregate needs could not be met and would minimize, if not eliminate, the need for Federal loans or loan guarantees.

Emergency Financial Control Board comments

The Board's Executive Director observed that if the city cannot meet all of its credit needs privately by fiscal year 1979, then it has no other option but to turn to the Federal Government for some form of assistance. He was pleased that this issue was being raised in a new forum, but was concerned that GAO viewed further Federal assistance as running counter to our decentralized form of government and that loans or loan guarantees were acceptable only if the terms were made punitive.

We do not view Federal assistance which stimulates and supports State and local programs as undesirable. However, direct Federal aid to a State or local government with the objective of meeting its overall fiscal needs is a different policy question. In our opinion, safeguards are needed to assure that the pressure for prudent financial management is not lessened.

NATIONAL POLL INDICATES LESS SUPPORT FOR AID

Federal aid to New York City, approved yesterday by the Senate, had a much easier time in Congress this year than it did in 1975, but public support for it across the country appears to be weaker.

The latest New York Times/CBS News national poll showed that those responding were opposed, 49 percent to 42, to loan guarantees. In November 1975, when the city's fiscal difficulties were a much sharper issue across the country, 55 percent of those surveyed said they felt that the Federal Government should provide funds to the city. Thirty-three percent disagreed then.

CONFEREES HIT A STALL OVER CITY LOAN BILL

(By Bruce Drake)

WASHINGTON (News Bureau).—House and Senate conferees made little progress yesterday in trying to iron out key differences between their versions of the New York City loan guarantee bill, but efforts to find a compromise continued.

Senate Banking Committee Chairman William Proxmire (D-Wis.) arrived at the second day of the conference with a proposal that appeared to make some concessions to the House bill, but essentially it contained all the major, stricter conditions of the Senate version.

Proxmire's gambit was similar to that of his House counterpart, who opened the conference on Monday by offering a "compromise" that in effect retained all the more generous provisions of the House bill.

Rep. William S. Moorhead (D-Pa.), the New York bill's House manager, said of Proxmire's offer: "When you get down to the guts of it, it is the Senate bill in every respect." But a veteran Senate staffer said that despite the lack of movement, "it's premature to call this a standoff."

Moorhead and his House colleagues met later in an attempt to work out a new compromise offer. He conceded that "we can't just stick to my original proposal."

A NARROWING OF ISSUES

The main points of disagreement narrowed yesterday to these issues:

Proxmire insisted that the conference stick with the $1.5 billion in guarantees voted by the Senate. However, House Banking Committee Chairman Henry S. Reuss (D-Wis.) said that House conferees still wanted to stick with their offer of a $1.8 billion bill. Of all the key disagreements, this issue appeared to be one where a compromise might be easiest.

Proxmire assailed the House proposal to keep a provision in the bill allowing some guarantees to be used for short-term as well as long-term borrowing. Saying that such New York fiscal officials as Felix Rohatyn had told his committee that the city really only needed long-term help, Proxmire cracked: "Now that Felix has the long term locked up, he says, 'Give us the seasonal, too.' He wasn't singing that tune back then."

Proxmire also insisted that the final bill go along with the Senate version and dole out the guarantees in installments over the next four years and provide for a one-house veto of the program in 1980 if the city does not live up to its financial plan. The House members believe the guarantees must be authorized in one lump sum.

READS A TELEGRAM

Resuss read to the conference a telegram from Gov. Carey, Mayor Koch and Rohatyn which said that a provision for seasonal financing was absolutely necessary, supported the $1.8 billion figure for guarantees, and opposed the Senate's "short leash" provision.

Proxmire did note one possible inspiration for a compromise. He displayed the tie he was wearing—a gift from Mayor Koch that was patterned with replicas of the New York City seal—and pointed to the date 1625 that appears under the seal.

"Mayor Koch sent this tie and it has the figure 1625," Proxmire said. "I asked the Library of Congress what that meant and they said they couldn't find anything that happened in 1625. A member of the staff suggested that maybe this was the last time there was no fiscal crisis in New York. But maybe 1625 is the figure we're looking for" as a compromise loan guarantee.

After the conference committee broke up for the day, House conferees met privately to try to work out a compromise loan guarantee figure that Proxmire and the Senate members would accept.

NEW YORK UNVEILS A BIG CASH BALANCE

(By Lee Dembart)

New York City had a cash balance on July 1, the start of the current fiscal year, of nearly $1 billion, almost twice as much money as had been previously projected, city officials said yesterday.

The amount includes $330 million of real-estate taxes that were prepaid in June, which means that the city's cash needs are assured probably until September, when it plans to resume its seasonal borrowing. City financial officials said yesterday that they expected New York to try to sell short-term notes to the public no later than November.

The prepayment of the real-estate taxes was made necessary last month when the willingness of the municipal pension funds to make $700 million in loans was in doubt. At the end of the month, the funds bought $564 million in bonds, which, combined with the $330 million of prepaid real-estate taxes, resulted in the swollen cash balance.

Officials at City Hall and the City Comptroller's office could not say yesterday how much of the cash on hand reflected a true budget surplus. "That is a number that is very difficult to come by," said a senior official on the Comptroller's staff.

Part of the difficulty in assessing the true size of the surplus is that much of the cash balance is spoken for.

$975 IN SEASONAL LOANS

The contract agreement that the city entered into with most of its unions last month calls for using $216 million of the 1978 money to pay for wage increases in 1979 and 1980 and more than $80 million more to pay the 1978 cost-of-living adjustments that the workers will receive this year.

The data on the city's cash balance were contained in a cash-flow report for the current fiscal year that was prepared for Donald D. Kummerfeld, executive director of the Emergency Financial Control Board, by Deputy Mayor Philip L. Toia.

According to Mr. Toia's projections, the city will need $975 million in seasonal loans this year, starting with $225 million in September and October, increasing to $325 million in November and dropping off to $100 million in December and January.

As now contemplated, most of the seasonal borrowing will be done privately with the clearinghouse banks and the municipal pension funds. But the city will try to sell some of its short-term debt publicly, probably in November and possibly in October, depending on when the auditors complete their examination of the city's books for the last fiscal year.

Completion of the audit is a prerequisite for the city's notes to receive an investment rating. Last fall, a city note sale was scuttled after the notes received the lowest investment-grade rating.

EMBARRASSED BY RICHES

The cash-flow projection for the fiscal year also shows a reduction in the annual state advance from $800 million to $100 million, in part as a result of converting the short-term debt into long-term bonds and in part as a result of the city's desire to show that it can stand on its own two feet.

All of the explanations of how the cash balance came into being and how officials plan to spend it could not disguise their embarrassment at having $997 million in the bank after several years of crying poverty.

As recently as last fall, the cash balance for June 30 was projected in the $200 million to $300 million range.

After the first of this year, it became clear that the agencies were overbreaking their spending and that capital construction was proceeding at a slower rate than had been anticipated.

For most of the spring, the projected cash balance swung between $500 million and $600 million, a figure that was raised by the real-estate tax prepayments, officials said.

Nonetheless, one official who is intimately involved in the city's finances said yesterday, "We're not surprised that the cash is this great. All of us looking at the numbers suspected that the cash would be larger than was estimated during the spring."

NEW YORK CITY FINDS WINDFALL IN BUDGET FOR 1978 FISCAL YEAR

NEW YORK.—New York City, which has been crying poverty, suddenly finds itself with an embarrassment of riches.

Budget officials currently expect New York to end its fiscal year tomorrow with at least $300 million in unexpended funds, and the figure could go considerably higher by the time the books close officially.

City officials attribute the $300 million windfall to conservative budgeting practices, which they say led them to underestimate revenue, and to tighter controls on city spending. New York frequently has proclaimed its new devotion to accurate financial projections, and it is generally agreed that the city has greatly improved its financial statements since 1975, when the chaotic books concealed an accumulated $5 billion deficit.

But the unspent money appears to lend credence to the belief that former Mayor Abraham Beame padded the 1978 budget with extra funds for the election year, only to lose the Democratic primary and leave the benefits to the man who defeated him, Edward I. Koch.

Mayor Koch has decided against using the excess funds to reduce the city's massive $783 million budget deficit. Instead, he plans to employ much of the money to help defray the cost of his labor settlement with city unions, which exceeds the fiscal guidelines he had set previously. By using $216 million of the 1978 money, the major can pay for a settlement covering two years, fiscal 1979 and 1980, out of three years' revenue.

The state's fiscal watchdog for New York, the Emergency Financial Control Board, ratified the mayor's actions yesterday by approving the labor agreement; the city's new 1979 financial plan, which includes a $13.5 billion city budget, and modifications to the current 1978 plan. State Comptroller Arthur Levitt, in a rare action, abstained from the vote, echoing warnings by his staff that diverting so much 1978 money could leave a gap in the budget.

Some critics contend that New York should use any extra funds to reduce its deficit, which has impeded a return to the public credit market. But city officials repeatedly characterize the budget windfall as a "surplus," sustaining public belief that the money is above and beyond the city's normal budget needs. State-sanctioned accounting loopholes permit the city to describe the 1978 budget as balanced. Stricter, generally accepted accounting principles for municipal government, which New York won't adopt fully until 1982, show a big budget deficit.

The growing "surplus" first became evident late last year, when the city reported that it had unusually large sums of cash on hand. James R. Brigham Jr., the city's budget director, said yesterday that unexpended 1978 funds may well grow beyond $300 million. One possible source of funds: a $100 million reserve fund that the city hasn't touched. However, Mr. Brigham said that he expects the outside auditors, Peat, Marwick, Mitchell & Co., to direct the city to make some charges against the fund when they examine the books.

New York officials emphasize that the big budget windfall won't reduce the city's need for a Carter administration-backed plan to supply New York with federal loan guarantees. The officials say that the guarantees are needed so New York can persuade state and city pension funds to buy city bonds.

Meanwhile, Felix Rohatyn, chairman of the Municipal Assistance Corp., said that he hoped to assemble, by the third week in July, $6 billion in lending commitments to meet New York's seasonal and long-term borrowing needs over the next four years. He indicated that the plan assumes that the city will obtain $1.7 billion in federal loan guarantees.

REDUCE CITY'S BORROWING OUTLOOK TO $975M

(By Mark Lieberman)

The city will have to borrow $975 million in the current fiscal year through the sale of short-term notes—$900 million less than it borrowed last year and $500 million less than earlier estimates—city fiscal officials reported yesterday.

The lowered cash needs, fiscal observers said, increase the likelihood of a public sale of city notes this year—the first such sale since March 1975.

The city revised its cash needs forecast on the basis of a higher than anticipated closing cash balance at the end of the fiscal year that closed June 30 and in a new schedule for the sale of long-term bonds as part of the $4.5 billion four-year city financing plan.

WANTS BACK-UP PLEDGES

Municipal Assistance Corp. Chairman Felix Rohatyn said that the city might be able to come up with between $200 million and $300 million through a public note sale. He said though that Big Mac would seek commitments from commercial banks and city pension systems for the full $975 million as a backup.

"The city's first priority ought to be to get to the market with a note offering of respectable size," Rohatyn said, "but to have this whole $975 million backed by private placements in case the market really turns sour."

WILL CONFER WITH CAREY

Rohatyn, one of the architects of the Municipal Assistance Corp., plans to quit as unsalaried chairman next month and is reportedly urging Gov. Carey to name financier George Gould, now Big Mac's finance chairman, as his successor.

Rohatyn, 50, said yesterday that he would talk with Carey again next month "about my future and the future" of the corporation after Big Mac completes arrangements for the city's four-year plan and seasonal financing.

Eugene Keilin, Big Mac's $57,000-a-year executive director, also has indicated that he plans to resign.

At least one of the major bond-rating agencies—Standard & Poor's—has expressed concern about Big Mac's future, noting that "continuity of management" is a key factor in determining bond ratings. If ratings are lowered on Big Mac's bonds, it could mean higher interest rates and higher costs for the city.

Gould, 51, is now chairman of four state agencies—Housing Finance Agency, Project Finance Agency, Medical Care Facilities Agency and Municipal Bond Bank Agency—all of which issue tax-exempt bonds.

To accept the Big Mac post, Gould would have to resign from the other agencies to avoid conflicts involved as head of agencies competing with each other in the tax-exempt bond market.

LEADING CANDIDATE

Gould is president of the Madison Fund, an investment company. Before joining the fund in 1976 he served as board chairman and chief executive officer of Donalson, Lufkin and Jenrette Securities Corp.

While Gould, with Rohatyn's backing, is considered the leading candidate for Big Mac's top spot; another possibility is Edward Kresky, a nonvoting representative to Big Mac.

Kresky, 54, a general partner in the investment banking firm of Wertheim & Co., is Senate Majority Leader Warren Anderson's official nonvoting representative to the corporation.

SEES PUBLIC SALE OF CITY BONDS SOON

(By Mark Lieberman)

New York City may be able to sell short-term notes in the public market by late summer or early fall according to a top executive of the city's largest bank.

Jac Friedgut, vice president of Citibank, made the cautious prediction in a report on city finances prepared for bank customers. While city officials and Municipal Assistance Corp. Chairman Felix Rohatyn have been suggesting a possible return to public credit markets by the city this year, Friedgut's comments were the first public indication by any bank executive that such a proposal was feasible to the financial community.

The city has been unable to raise cash in public credit markets since March 1975.

Friedgut said that "a modest amount of market acceptance (of city notes) could be expected" in the next few months if the city's four-year financial plan gets off "to a reasonable start" and if the audited financial statements for the fiscal year which ended last month "contain no major adverse surprises."

ONE CAUTIOUS NOTE

Despite his otherwise optimistic report, Friedgut cautioned that the city might not be able to attain its goal of a truly balanced budget by the 1982 fiscal year.

"Factoring in the full costs of the new contract for city employes and taking into consideration the likelihood of additional costs in the next round of bargaining two years from now, true budget balance in fiscal 1982 cannot be considered a foregone conclusion," Friedgut wrote.

"The city must run very fast to stand still," Friedgut said. He added that the city would have "to close what now looks like a rapidly growing budget gap after fiscal 1980."

NEW YORK CITY PLANS TO RESUME ITS SALES OF SHORT-TERM NOTES

[From the Wall Street Journal, July 17, 1978]

NEW YORK.—New York City, closed out of the public credit market in early 1975 and rebuffed by the market last year, plans to resume the sale of its short-term notes in November.

The sale, if successful, would significantly advance New York's fiscal recovery and would bring closer the day when the city can again meet its borrowing needs without Federal help.

Last November, New York tried to sell $200 million in notes to the public, but the sale collapsed after Moody's Investors Service gave the notes its lowest rating and underwriters pulled out.

The city's plan to meet seasonal cash needs for the fiscal year begun July 1 calls for public marketing of $300 million in notes through sales starting in November, Philip L. Toia, deputy mayor for finance, said yesterday.

The city projects total seasonal borrowing needs for the year at $975 million and expects to get most of the money through short-term loans by city commercial banks and public pension funds.

COVERS SHORTAGES

The money, which goes to cover temporary cash shortages during the year, would be repaid by June 30, 1979.

Mindful of the unsuccessful note sale last year, city officials will delay the planned new sale until November when the city is scheduled to get audited financial statements for fiscal 1978, following the city's first independent outside audit. Mr. Toia said the statements will be used in seeking a more favorable rating from Moody's for the city's notes

City officials expect to finish assembling by early August a long-term lending package based on Federal guarantees that will preserve the city's solvency over the next four years. Once the loan package is completed, "the market will be much more receptive" to city notes than it was earlier, predicted Felix Rohatyn, chairman of the Municipal Assistance Corp.

The city's plan, however, calls for banks and pension funds to supply extra loans in case the new sale of notes fails.

NEEDS BOARD APPROVAL

The short-term borrowing plan, which is being submitted to the Emergency Financial Control Board, must be approved by that watchdog agency and by the banks and pension funds.

For the past 2½ years, New York's temporary cash needs have been supplied by the Federal Government, but the Federal program of seasonal loans expired June 30. A new Federal aid program, in the final stage of congressional approval, provides some Federal guarantees to back up the city's short-term borrowing in fiscal 1979.

New York doesn't plan to sell long-term bonds to the public until fiscal 1981.

New York projects its 1979 short-term borrowing at $975 million, down sharply from the roughly $2 billion it borrowed in the past year. The city's coffers are swollen with nearly $1 billion in cash, because spending has been slower than anticipated and because major property owners prepaid real estate taxes. In addition, the city plans to sell bonds to pay off much of an $800 million deficit hidden on the city's books. The State currently advances New York $800 million each year to cover this budget hole, and the city then borrows to repay the State, swelling its total short-term borrowing.

City officials expect New York to market notes in batches of roughly $100 million in the conventional manner. But they are considering a plan, advanced by Jac Friedgut, a Citibank vice president, to auction smaller quantities of city notes as often as twice a month. The plan would resemble, in certain respects, the weekly auctions of U.S. Treasury bills.

CITY BUDGET BACKED BY CONTROL BOARD

(By John Kifner)

Brushing aside a warning from Special Deputy State Comptroller Sidney Schwartz, the Emergency Financial Control Board yesterday approved the city's 1979 budget, its labor settlement and its financial plan.

State Comptroller Arthur Levitt abstained from voting on the budget because of Mr. Schwartz's reservations, marking only the second time since the Control Board was established at the height of the 1975 fiscal crisis that its vote on any proposal has not been unanimous. Moments later, he also abstained from voting on the labor settlement, saying its provisions were "interwoven" with those of the budget.

Mr. Schwartz said that restrictions should be placed on how much of the $216 million of 1978 surplus funds could be used to finance the labor settlement, lest unexpected revenue shortfalls put the 1978 budget in deficit.

OTHER FACTORS

He also expressed fear that the cost of judgments and claims brought against the city might run higher than the $77-million budgeted and that all of the $55-million in real estate taxes expected from the bankrupt Penn Central might not materialize.

However, the Control Board's chairman, Donald D. Kummerfeld said at the meeting that all the "downside uncertainties" had been carefully considered, and approval was swiftly voted.

After the meeting, Mr. Kummerfeld told reporters that the independent auditing firm of Peat, Marwick, Mitchell had disagreed with Mr. Schwartz's interpretation and that following his recommendtion would mean the entire labor settlement would have to be renegotiated.

"We'd be back to square one," he said.

A STAFF REPORT

Last week, the Control Board issued a staff report warning that the $13.5 billion budget might still be out of balance and asking the city how it might make up potential deficits. Before approving the budget yesterday, the board voted resolutions requiring the city to submit by July 10 a contingency plan with a $100 million emergency reserve for fiscal 1979 and a $200 million contingency fund for 1980.

In addition, by July 15, the city is to submit a cash-flow plan showing monthly revenue and spending expectations.

The hour-long meeting on the 58th floor of the World Trade Center ended in a lengthy flurry of self-congratulations.

Meanwhile, three municipal pension funds—those of the teachers, Board of Education and city employees—reached agreement to buy their $564.6 million share of the $683 million worth of city bonds the pension funds are pledged to purchase by the end of the fiscal year.

The pension funds of the police and firemen, who are currently negotiating labor contracts with the city, appeared less eager, however. Their shares are $12 million for the police fund and $105 million for the firemen's. Both set meetings on the matter for Friday afternoon.

The purchases are needed to provide cash to fund the city through July and August.

FINANCE BOARD OKAYS CITY'S LABOR PACT BUT STATE OFFICIAL OBJECTS

(By Mark Lieberman)

Despite objections of State Special Deputy Controller Sidney Schwartz, the Emergency Financial Control Board yesterday approved the agreement reached earlier this month between the city and most of its unions.

The control board approved the broad outlines of the labor agreement by a 6-to-0 vote, with Controller Arthur Levitt not voting. The measure was one of the few acted on in the board's three-year history which did not have the support of all seven members of the watchdog panel.

Schwartz' objections to the pact centered on the city's proposal to use $216 million of a current year's budget surplus to pay $750 per year bonuses for city workers in the new fiscal year which starts Saturday.

Schwartz specifically objected to a proposed modification to the city's current financial plan which details the $216 million. With Levitt abstaining, the board approved that change in the financial plan also by a 6 to 0 vote.

ABSTENTIONS BY LEVITT

Levitt said he would have to abstain on both votes to remain consistent.

According to Schwartz, uncertainties still exist in the city's current budget and that using the $216 million of current-year funds to pay future expenses could result in a budget deficit.

During the hourlong session at the World Trade Center, Municipal Assistance Corp. Chairman Felix Rohatyn said that Big Mac hoped to put together a $6 billion financing package for the city within the next three weeks. He said the pieces of the package—$4.5 billion of long-term financing and $1.5 billion of seasonal financing—would depend on the type of federal guarantees on city bonds okayed by Congress.

The Senate began debate yesterday on a city aid bill which calls for $1.5 billion in guarantees. A House-passed bill would provide $2 billion in guarantees.

EXPLANATION BY ROHATYN

Rohatyn said that Big Mac had scaled down the amount of guaranteed bonds it would offer to city and state pension systems from $500 million apiece to $375 million apiece and would hope to sell additional unguaranteed bonds to financial institutions.

The control board yesterday gave final approval to the city's fiscal 1979 budget, but directed city officials to produce a program of standby cuts by July 10 to overcome possible budget deficiencies cited in reports by Schwartz, the control board staff and Big Mac.

FISCAL PLAN HAS LONG WAY TO GO: FELIX

(By Mark Lieberman)

Municipal Assistance Corp. Chairman Felix Rohatyn said yesterday that state and city employee pension funds, commercial banks and other financial institutions are "days, maybe weeks" away from agreement on short and long-term financing plans for the city.

The city's proposed four-year financing plan involves $4.5 billion of long-term bonds on top of $975 million of short-term notes to provide cash in the current fiscal year. Rohatyn said the parties involved in the financing had "agreed in principle" to the investments, but added "that was in from the beginning.

The pension systems are seeking approval of federal legislation which would permit their investments without a loss of federal tax exemption status. The financial institutions want a clear fix on the life of the new Emergency Financial Control Board, which would go out of existence when the city achieves "market access." The definition of that term has not been resolved.

Two alternatives have been proposed: either that the state controller or an expert of his choosing certify that the city could sell its securities or, as the banks have insisted, the city obtain cash through public note sales.

According to Rohatyn, the city plans to raise the $4.5 billion by selling between $600 million and $650 million of unguaranteed bonds each to commercial banks and city retirement systems, $375 million of guaranteed bonds each to city and state pension systems, between $250 million and $300 million of unguaranteed bonds each to savings banks and insurance companies. The remaining funds would come through public sales, of Big Mac and city bonds with the remaining federal guarantees—about $900 million—held in reserve if the city bond sale fails.

NEW YORK CITY AND ITS UNIONS STUDY USING 1978 SURPLUS

(By Lee Dembart)

New York City and the municipal labor unions are working on a package of wage increases that will use the surplus from the city's 1978 budget for what will be called 1978 expenses even though the money will be paid in 1979.

Knowledgeable participants in the labor negotiations indicated yesterday that the parties were confident that there were enough deferred payments that the unions could claim through 1978 to enable a pact to be written that would pass muster with Sidney Schwartz, the state's special deputy comptroller, who last week insisted that the 1978 surplus could not be used for 1979 expenses.

The two major items now being discussed are the one-year deferral of wage increases that occurred in 1975–76 and the deferral of part of the cost-of-living payments under the present contract.

"Those are legitimtae 1978 expenses that could easily be paid from the 1978 surplus," said Deputy Mayor Philip L. Toia.

DEVELOPMENTS IN SOLVENCY EFFORT

Discussion of the deferred payments as part of the new wage package came on a day when there were these developments in the city's multifront effort to stay solvent.

Felix G. Rohatyn, chairman of the Municipal Assistance Corporation, and State Senator John J. Marchi "kissed and made up," according to Mr. Rohatyn, after last week's brouhaha stemming from his "intemperate" remarks about the State Legislature.

In any case, State Senator Roy M. Goodman expressed doubts about creating a new M.A.C. bond at this time for purchase by the municipal pension funds. "I'd like to keep the new bonds in our vest pocket for some future purpose," Mr. Goodman said.

Secretary Treasury W. Michael Blumenthal summoned Governor Carey, Mayor Koch, Mr. Rohatyn and representatives of the banks and the unions to a meeting with him tomorrow morning at the Federal Reserve in New York to exhort them to move quickly toward settlement of all outstanding issues.

Mr. Blumenthal also sent a letter to City Comptroller Harrison J. Goldin to remind him of the pension funds' commitment to buy city bonds. Mr. Goldin is a trustee of four of the five pension systems, and Mr. Blumenthal called his position opposing further purchase of city bonds "troublesome."

Mr. Koch said that he expected the pension funds, in the end, to make the loans this month because "in a sense, it would be self-immolation" for them not to.

While the various threads of the city's financial difficulties continued unwoven, considerable attention focused yesterday on the labor contracts and the requirement to use the $280 million surplus from 1978 to pay for 1978 expenses. Mayor Koch has said that $170 million of that amount will be included in the $610 million package the city has already offered.

In 1975, the unions agreed to defer for one year most of the 6 percent wage increase that city workers were contractually entitled to receive that year. The unions estimate that a total of $180 million was deferred.

Under the agreement with the unions, the money can be repaid if two conditions are met: the city must have a balanced budget and the city must have access to the private credit markets. City officials agreed yesterday that the last condition had certainly not been met, but some people familiar with the bargaining suggested that the city might find some way to relax that requirement.

The matter of the deferred cost-of-living payments involves a complicated calculation under which each worker would be entitled to $294, representing the difference between two formulas for determining the payments. If paid in full, the cost to the city would be between $50 million and $60 million.

Another likely possibility for use of the 1978 budget surplus is based on the unions' assertion that the surplus arose as a result of underspending by the city, principally leaving job slots unfilled. The unions say that the excess attrition that resulted is a productivity saving from 1978, which the remaining workers are entitled to benefit from in 1979.

City officials seemed disposed yesterday to go along with that thinking, in part because otherwise there would not be enough money left in the Mayor's $610 million package to pay real 1979 wage increases.

The contract speculation took place against the swirling backdrop of the city's need for cash this month from the pension systems. Mr. Goodman conducted a hearing of the Senate Committee on Taxation and Government Operations, of which he is chairman, at which Mr. Rohatyn; the city's Corporation Counsel, Allen G. Schwartz; Third Deputy Comptroller Paul M. O'Brien and representatives of the investment community testified and reviewed both the pending M.A.C. legislation and the city's proposed Emergency Financial Control Board legislation.

Mr. Rohatyn repeated his warning that without the Federal loan legislation now pending in Washington, the city would go bankrupt this summer. "Without the Federal legislation," he said, "I see absolutely no prospect of financing."

Mr. Goodman tried to steer the discussion away from Mr. Rohatyn's flap with Senator Marchi, which Mr. Goodman called a "tempest in a teapot."

Afterward Mr. Rohatyn remarked of last week's contretemps, "I lost my temper out of frustration. I don't think losing one's temper is either elegant or constructive."

CITY MOVES TO REVISE 4.5B FISCAL PLAN

(By Mark Lieberman)

City and state fiscal officials moved yesterday to revise the city's $4.5 billion four-year financing plan in the wake of action by the Senate Banking Committee okaying $1.5 billion of federal loan guarantees rather than the $2 billion originally sought by the city.

Municipal Assistant Corp. Chairman Felix Rohatyn said the revised package would not alter the size of the plan but rather the amounts of financing sought from participants in the plan.

The original financing plan, using $2 billion in loan guarantees had been to sell $500 million of guaranteed bonds each to city and state pension systems, $500 million of unguaranteed Big Mac bonds each to city pension systems and commercial banks, $250 million of unguaranteed Big Mac bonds each to savings banks and insurance companies, and to seek public sale of $1 billion of Big Mac bonds and $1 billion of city bonds.

The unused $1 billion of federal guarantees were to have been held in reserve to back up the public sale of city bonds.

Rohatyn said he hoped to have a new financing package pieced together before the full Senate takes up the committee bill. The new package, he said, would substitute Big Mac bonds for some or all of the city bonds initially proposed and would increase sales to pension funds, banks and insurance companies.

He refused to offer any specifics of the changes, however.

The city would use $2.3 billion of the financing for capital budget items, $900 million to pay for expense items in the capital budget.

NATIONAL POLL INDICATES LESS SUPPORT FOR AID

Federal aid to New York City, approved yesterday by the Senate, had a much easier time in Congress this year than it did in 1975, but public support for it across the country appears to be weaker.

The latest New York Times/CBS News national poll showed that those responding were opposed, 49 percent to 42, to loan guarantees. In November 1975, when the city's fiscal difficulties were a much sharper issue across the country, 55 percent of those surveyed said "they felt that Federal Government should provide funds" to the city. Thirty-three percent disagreed then.

(Mrs. ALLEN assumed the chair.)

Mr. TOWER. Madam President, I strongly oppose the adoption of the conference report, not out of any malice for New York City. I think the record of 3 years ago will show that, at some political hazard to myself, I supported the seasonal loan for New York City. I said at the time that I would not ever support loan guarantees. So I think I am consistent in my position there.

I had hoped that that seasonal loan would be adequate and that the leadership in New York City would discipline themselves to do what was necessary to make this kind of action unnecessary.

In my view, New York City has been given every opportunity, and I do not believe that at this time we should be put in the position of assisting them through the vehicle of a long-term loan guarantee.

I agree with what many have said, that the precedents are wrong. I would simply say to other cities that might be looking at this, particularly cities which have some managerial and fiscal problems of their own at the moment, that this should not be considered a precedent for our dealing on an ad hoc basis with the financial difficulties of other cities.

I hope all Members of the Senate will take note of the changes that have been wrought in this measure since it passed the Senate and went through the conference proceeding. It is not what the Senate passed originally. I hope that some who voted for the bill in the Senate, who gave some indication that they thought this is the maximum we should do, will consider voting against the conference report; and I suggest that that would not be inconsistent with anyone's position in having voted for this measure in the first place.

I believe the yeas and nays have been ordered, and unless anyone else is prepared to speak, I believe we can go ahead to the vote on this measure.

Again I say that my attitude toward this measure does not spring from any malice toward New York City. It is a great city; it is a great national asset.

I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report. On this question the yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. CRANSTON. I announce that the Senator from South Dakota (Mr. ABOUREZK), the Senator from Minnesota (Mr. ANDERSON), the Senator from Mississippi (Mr. EASTLAND), the Senator from Minnesota (Mrs. HUMPHREY), and the Senator from South Dakota (Mr. MCGOVERN) are necessarily absent.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Minnesota (Mrs. HUMPHREY) would vote "yea."

Mr. STEVENS. I announce that the Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. BROOKE) and the Senator from Wyoming (Mr. WALLOP) are necessarily absent.

The result was announced—yeas 58, nays 35, as follows:

[Rollcall Vote No. 258 Leg.]

YEAS—58

BUREAU OF LAND MANAGEMENT QUADRENNIAL AUTHORIZATIONS, FISCAL YEARS 1979 THROUGH 1982

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senate will now proceed to the consideration of S. 2234, which the clerk will state by title.

The second assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 2234) to authorize appropriations for activities and programs carried out by the Secretary of the Interior through the Bureau of Land Management.

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill which had been reported from the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources with amendments as follows:

On page 2, line 5, strike "$290,000,000" and insert "$292,200,000";

On page 2, line 5, strike "$320,000,000" and insert "$329,300,000";

On page 2, line 6, strike "$350,000,000" and insert "$361,300,000";

On page 2, line 7, strike "$380,000,000" and insert "$393,300,000";

On page 2, line 10, strike "$20,000,000" and insert "$20,900,000";

On page 2, line 24, strike "$45,000,000" and insert "$40,000,000";

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That pursuant to section 318(b) of the Federal Land Policy and Management Act of 1976 (31

U.S.C. 1301 note), there are hereby authorized to be appropriated the following sums for activities and programs administered through the Bureau of Land Management:

(a) for management of lands and resources, excluding emergency firefighting and rehabilitation: $292,200,000 for fiscal year 1979, $329,300,000 for fiscal year 1980, $361,300,000 for fiscal year 1981, and $393,300,000 for fiscal year 1982;

(b) for land acquisition, construction, and maintenance: $20,900,000 for fiscal year 1979, $22,000,000 for fiscal year 1980, $25,000,000 for fiscal year 1981, and $27,000,000 for fiscal year 1982;

(c) for implementation of the Act of October 20, 1976 (31 U.S.C. 1601): $105,000,000 and such additional sums as are necessary for payments for fiscal year 1979, $108,000,000 and such additional sums as are necessary for payments for fiscal year 1980, $111,000,000 and such additional sums as are necessary for payments for fiscal year 1981, and $114,000,000 and such additional sums as are necessary for payments for fiscal year 1982;

(d) for implementation of section 317(c) of the Federal Land Policy and Management Act of 1976 (43 U.S.C. 1747): $40,000,000 for loans for fiscal year 1979, $50,000,000 for loans for fiscal year 1980, $57,000,000 for loans for fiscal year 1981, and $65,000,000 for loans for fiscal year 1982; and

(e) such additional or supplemental amounts as may be necessary for increases in salary, pay, retirements and other employee benefits authorized by law, and for other nondiscretionary costs.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Time for debate on this bill is limited to 1 hour to be equally divided and controlled by the Senator from Arkansas (Mr. BUMPERS) and the Senator from Wyoming (Mr. HANSEN), with 30 minutes on any amendment; 20 minutes on any debatable motion, appeal, or point of order; and with a provision that when the bill has been advanced to third reading, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of H.R. 10787, the House companion bill, that all after the enacting clause be stricken, that the Senate language be inserted in lieu thereof, that the bill be advanced to third reading without further amendment, debate, or motion, and that the Senate then proceed with final passage.

Mr. BUMPERS. Madam President, I ask unanimous consent that privileges of the floor be extended to the following staff persons of the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources during debate and vote on the BLM bill, S. 2234, and the dam safety bill, S. 2820: Dan Dreyfus, Mike Harvey, R. D. Folsom, and Russ Brown.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BUMPERS. Madam President, add to that from the same committee: Fred Craft, David Swanson, Tom Imeson, Tony Bevinetto, Ted Orf, and Carol Sacchi.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Madam President, I think the indications are that there will be no rollcall votes on this bill or on amendments or motions in relation thereto. But could we get an agreement from the managers and other Senators that if any rollcall votes are ordered in connection with this bill that they go over until tomorrow?

Mr. JACKSON. Madam President, we have no objection to that.

Mr. HANSEN. No objections on this side.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I thank all Senators.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. BUMPERS. Madam President, I yield myself such time as I may use.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. BUMPERS. The Federal Land Policy and Management Act of 1976 established for the first time a requirement for separate authorization legislation for funding of Bureau of Land Management programs.

S. 2234 would authorize appropriations for the 4-year period of fiscal years 1979 to 1982 for the Bureau of Land Management (BLM), totaling $458,200,000 for fiscal year 1979, and increasing to $604,300,000 for 1982.

The requirement for congressional action on this authorization offers the opportunity for the Congress to provide direction to BLM programs. It represents a prototype of the detailed long-term oversight role that many have advocated for congressional legislative committees in the "sunset" concept.

S. 2234 covers four appropriations accounts which finance most of the operations of BLM. These are: management of lands and resources; acquisition, construction, and maintenance; payments in lieu of taxes; and mineral development impact loans.

S. 2234 does not contain authorizations for the Oregon and California grant lands, the range improvement fund, service accounts, and permanent appropriations.

The BLM administers more Federal lands than the Forest Service, National Park Service, and Fish and Wildlife Service combined. BLM manages 470 million acres of national resource lands—60 percent of all federally owned land of the United States, or 20 percent of the Nation's entire land base. In addition, BLM has management responsibilities for 840 million acres of federally owned mineral rights, and 1,100 million acres of the Outer Continental Shelf. Because of their vast size and their immeasurable value, the management and use of these lands and resources touch the daily life of every American. As a people, we depend upon the national resource lands as a source of jobs, energy, minerals, food, fiber, and forest products. The protection of soil, water, and air quality on these lands affects areas far larger than the lands themselves. Just as importantly, the public lands represent a valuable resource for less tangible benefits such as recreation and wildlife habitat. Additionally, these lands contain a physical record of much of the Nation's rich historical and cultural background.

Given the expectations of a modern and diverse society whose legitimate concerns range from absolute preservation to intensive resource development, the basic mission of the BLM—to achieve balanced and effective multiple-use management of the national resource lands—is very difficult.

In recent years, there has been a heightened interest in the national resource lands. Certainly a principal reason for this interest has been the potential contribution of these lands to meet shortages of energy and minerals. Proposals for development of the public lands have aroused concerns of the public and environmental groups that development take place with a minimum of adverse environmental damage or risk.

A less visible, but nonetheless intense interest has also developed in the renewable resources on the national resource lands. Numerous executive branch reports, including the 1973 report of the President's Advisory Panel on Timber and the Environment, the 1975 BLM range condition report, and the 1976 Forest Service's forest and rangeland renewable resource assessment, have disclosed that the productivity of the Nation's forest and range lands is relatively low and the quality of a significant portion of these lands is declining. In short, the statutory goal of "sustained-yield" management has not been fully realized.

For years, the Bureau of Land Management found its management responsibilities impeded by its dependence on a vast number of outmoded public land laws which were enacted when disposal and largely uncontrolled development of the public domain were the dominant themes. Unlike the Park Service or the Forest Service, the BLM had no "Organic Act" to provide guidance and authority for its actions. With uncertainty as to the continuation of its lands in Federal ownership and the lack of a well-defined mission within its confusing and often contradictory statutory base, the BLM has not been very successful in the competition for scarce Federal land management funds.

However, on October 2, 1976, the President signed into law an organic act for the BLM—the Federal Land Policy and Management Act of 1976 (FLPMA)—which repealed many of the outmoded public land laws and provided the agency with a coherent mandate and sufficient authority to implement it. Also, in 1976, the Congress passed the Payments-in-Lieu-of-Taxes Act (PILT Act), and the authorization contained in this bill is to meet those payments.

For fiscal year 1979, the President has asked for an increase ($52,086,000) in the agency's budget over the prior year's appropriation. The magnitude of this increase is actually less than it appears, however, because much of it is accounted for by a change in financing of "Firefighting and Rehabilitation." Starting with fiscal year 1979, this item would be financed in the initial appropriation rather than in a supplemental appropriation which has been the normal funding practice in prior years. This financing change amounts to an apparent increase of $25,250,000 that does not provide any real program growth. When this financing change is subtracted, the actual program increase proposed is $26,836,000 over the 1978 appropriation.

Section 318 of FLPMA required the Secretary of the Interior to submit last year a proposal for a 4-year (fiscal years 1979-82) authorization for most of the Bureau's programs. This proposal was to include funding levels which the Secretary "determines can be efficiently, and effectively utilized in the execution of his responsibilities for each such program, function, or activity, notwithstanding any budget guidelines or limitations imposed by an official or agency of the executive branch."

The Secretary transmitted his first request under this provision last September. It provided estimates for fiscal years 1979 through 1982. In January, the President's budget for fiscal year 1979 was transmitted. While the Secretary has requested more than is in the President's budget, there is some question as to whether the Secretary has asked for all that he really needs and can employ as section 318 requires.

It was of particular concern to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources that there is such a large disparity between what the Secretary proposed for fiscal year 1979 in the 4-year BLM authorization submittal and what is included in the President's budget request for fiscal year 1979. The Secretary's submission (S. 2234) calls for $100 million more in the comparable budget items in fiscal year 1979 than does the President's budget request. The committee gave very careful attention to the President's budget and the Secretary's estimates for 1979 because a greater degree of specificity is available for 1979 and the direction taken in 1979 can be expected to continue for several years thereafter. Furthermore, fiscal year 1979 is a crucial budget year for public land renewable resources management. The period of study is over and, with the exception of the National Rangelands Policy Act, the authorizing legislation has been enacted. While the study and legislative efforts have not required significant budgetary outlays, implementation of the more costly study recommendations and statutory mandates will require a significant increase in funding levels.

The attention of the committee has focused primarily upon the first year of the authorization period, 1979. Because the committee had explored the BLM quadrennial authorization estimates so thoroughly, it was able to comment and make budgetary recommendations in considerable detail in its report (committee print 95-95) to the Budget Committee for use in formulating the first budget resolution. The committee believes that its recommendations for 1979 reflect the proper balance among BLM programs and will insure that the directions which the committee's fiscal year 1979 authorization would require the BLM to take will be followed in fiscal years 1980 through 1982. Thus, the following views of the committee and the basis for its actions are largely a recapitulation of the committee's previous recommendations concerning the 1979 budget. They are repeated in this report to provide a consolidated statement of the committee's views.

The committee has made only two program additions, one for a wildlife program that is considered to be inadequately funded and one for mining claim recordation, a task that was not provided for in the Secretary's estimates. Otherwise, the committee's authorization figures at the appropriation account level are identical to those recommended by the Secretary. The committee believes that the levels requested will provide adequately for implementation of the Federal Land Policy and Management Act of 1976, perhaps not at the pace this committee and other interested groups would prefer, but at a rate that appears to be about the maximum rate economically feasible.

Madam President, I wish to reiterate that this is a rather unique authorization. I have always felt that Congress ought to authorize all budgets for 2 years at a time, so that in the off years we could deal with substantive policy legislation. But this legislation is a giant step, in this particular program, because we are authorizing money for 4 years in advance. I think it will help revitalize the grazing lands of the West. It will take much less of the time of Congress, and the Bureau of Land Management will have a policy to guide them for 4 years, which is unprecedented.

● Mr. HANSEN. The House passed the Bureau of Land Management's (BLM) quadrennial authorization, which includes authorization of $10 million to pay the costs of processing right-of-way (R/W) applications. Do you favor such a provision?

Mr. BUMPERS. No, I do not. There are several distinct and pertinent reasons to support my point of view. First, there is a court case involving cost recovery which the Government will appeal at the 10th Circuit Court of Appeals late this summer. I do not believe it would be appropriate to prejudice this case by authorizing funding of the very item at issue. Second, including authority for this purpose reverts to a procedure used by BLM to carry out its responsibility to process and grant R/W permits and was proven to be unsatisfactory to all parties concerned. This was prior to the passage of their Organic Act in 1976. Under the previous procedure, funds were made available for processing R/W applications through regular budget requests. This was cumbersome, and caused processing delays.

Mr. HANSEN. Why?

Mr. BUMPERS. One, R/W applications are largely uncontrollable—the needs and timing of different energy transmission sectors are different—making the workload difficult to predict in relation to key decision points in the budget process.

The problem in providing for the costs of processing these R/W's lies in the question of not knowing how much to include in budget requests and at what time. This uncertainty has led to situations whereby processing of some R/W applications had to be delayed until funds were made available through the regular budget process or through supplemental appropriations.

Third, R/W and ancillary facilities under consideration may not be clearly or completely defined at the time of filing. As a result uncertainties in preparing budget estimates often contributed to underestimating costs causing further processing delay. Delays frequently mean added costs to the applicant. At times these costs can be substantial. In similar fashion, compliance, and monitoring terms cannot be spelled out far enough in advance to be able to include, with any precision, the amounts required in budget requests. Again, delays result in higher costs to the applicant.

Mr. HANSEN. Does not the amended Mineral Leasing Act require cost reimbursement on all oil and gas pipeline R/W proposals?

Mr. BUMPERS. Yes, and therein lies the question of equity between different types of pipeline applicants. Oil and gas pipeline R/W permit applicants are required to reimburse the Government for costs of processing their applications. Other types of R/W applicants, transmission lines for example, would not have to pay similar costs if funds were appropriated for that purpose.

Mr. HANSEN. Are there any particular advantages to the current procedure?

Mr. BUMPERS. Yes, the current procedure which requires reimbursement of costs by the applicant has one very special advantage—the ability to respond quickly to new, often unforeseen, R/W requests. There are little to no delays in getting started on application for R/W as they are received. A potential 18-month delay in even initiating work on a large-scale project due to budgetary leadtime can cost industry many times the amount associated with processing that application.

Furthermore, the current procedure is based on provisions in the Federal Land Policy and Management Act and the fiscal year 1978 Appropriations Act which specifically provide for cost reimbursement on R/W proposals and an appropriation derived from advance applicant deposits. Congressional action on the budget indicates a clear intent that all major right-of-way projects be largely self-financing.●

Mr. BUMPERS. Madam President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would remind the Senator from Arkansas that the committee amendments must be disposed of first.

Mr. BUMPERS. Will the Chair restate her last statement?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The committee amendments must be disposed of first, unless the amendment proposed by the Senator from Arkansas is an amendment to the committee amendments.

Mr. BUMPERS. Madam President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BUMPERS. Madam President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BUMPERS. Madam President, I ask unanimous consent that the committee amendments be adopted and considered as original text for purposes of further amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1523

Mr. BUMPERS. Madam President I send to the desk an unprinted amendment and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Arkansas (Mr. BUMPERS) proposes an unprinted amendment numbered 1523.

Mr. BUMPERS. Madam President I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 3, after line 6 insert a new paragraph (f) to read as follows:

(f) Paragraph (c) of section 317 of the Federal Land Policy and Management Act of 1976 (90 Stat. 2743, 2771; 43 U.S.C. 1701, 1747) is amended to read as follows:

"(c)(1) The Secretary is authorized to make loans to States and their political subdivisions in order to relieve social or economic impacts occasioned by the development of minerals leased in such States pursuant to the Act of February 25, 1920, as amended. Such loans shall be confined to the uses specified for the 50 per centum of mineral leasing revenues to be received by such States and subdivisions pursuant to section 35 of such Act.

"(2) The total amount of loans outstanding pursuant to this subsection for any State and political subdivisions thereof in any year shall be not more than the anticipated mineral leasing revenues to be received by that State pursuant to section 35 of the Act of February 25, 1920, as amended, for the ten years following.

"(3) The Secretary, after consultation with the Governors of the affected States, shall allocate such loans among the States and their political subdivisions in a fair and equitable manner, giving priority to those States and subdivisions suffering the most severe impacts.

"(4) Loans made pursuant to this subsection shall be subject to such terms and conditions as the Secretary determines necessary to assure the achievement of the purpose of this subsection. The Secretary shall promulgate such regulations as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this subsection no later than three months after the enactment of this paragraph.

"(5) Loans made pursuant to this subsection shall bear interest equivalent to the lowest interest rate paid on an issue of at least $1,000,000 of tax exempt bonds of such State or any agency thereof within the preceding calendar year.

"(6) Any loan made pursuant to this subsection shall be secured only by a pledge of the revenues received by the State or the political subdivision thereof pursuant to section 35 of the Act of February 25, 1920, as amended, and shall not constitute an obligation upon the general property or taxing authority of such unit of government.

"(7) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, loans made pursuant to this subsection may be used for the non-Federal share of the aggregate cost of any project or program otherwise funded by the Federal Government which requires a non-Federal share for each project or program and which provides planning or public facilities otherwise eligible for assistance under this subsection.

"(8) Nothing in this subsection shall be construed to preclude any forebearance for the benefit of the borrowe- including loan restructuring, which may be determined by the Secretary as justified by the failure of anticipated mineral development or related revenues to materialize as expected when the loan was made pursuant to this subsection.

"(9) Recipients of loans made pursuant to this subsection shall keep such records as the Secretary shall prescribe by regulation, including records which fully disclose the disposition of the proceeds of such assistance and such other records as the Secretary may require to facilitate an effective audit. The Secretary and the Comptroller General of the United States or their duly authorized representatives shall have access, for the purpose of audit, to such records.

"(10) No person in the United States shall, on the grounds of race, color, religion, national origin, or sex, be excluded from participation in, be denied the benefits of, or be subjected to discrimination under, any program or activity funded in whole or part with funds made available under this subsection.

"(11) All amounts collected in connection with loans made pursuant to this subsection, including interest payments or repayments of principal on loans, fees, and other moneys, derived in connection with this subsection, shall be deposited in the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.".

Mr. BUMPERS. Madam President, in the House bill, which we will hopefully adopt after we insert the committee text, the House has provided for impact loans from the Secretary to those communities and governmental subdivisions that have suffered some inordinate impact as a result of energy activities in their areas.

Those loans would be secured by anticipated funds which States would be entitled to receive as part of their royalty from minerals extracted within their States.

Here is an example which my distinguished colleague from Wyoming has previously used:

Wyoming has somewhere between 100 and 200 billion tons of coal. As the United States leases that coal and it is dug, the State of Wyoming is entitled to 50 percent of the Federal royalties from that land.

Gillette, Wyo., is a city in that State which has been very severely impacted by the tremendous activity and influx of people resulting from the activities in the Powder River Basin. So Gillette would be eligible under this amendment to go to the Secretary and say, "We need to borrow $1 million against these royalties we will receive in the ensuing year. Those royalties are a dead certainty. We will pay you an interest rate based on the lowest interest rate received by the State in the issuance of bonds during the preceding year."

Does the Senator from Wyoming agree with my statement of the amendment?

Mr. HANSEN. I say to my good friend, the floor manager of the bill, I think the statement that he has made is essentially correct. I think technically in Wyoming the money goes to the State and then is made available to the counties. That is a rather minor point, however. Essentially what the distinguished Senator from Arkansas has said is true.

Mr. BUMPERS. The loans would go to the States and be funneled into the political subdivisions?

Mr. HANSEN. Yes.

Mr. BUMPERS. That is my understanding.

This amendment is a duplicate text of the House bill, with a minor clarification. Madam President, I move its adoption, with a minor clarification.

The House version under paragraph 5 of the amendment provided that loans made pursuant to this subsection shall bear interest equivalent to the lowest interest rate paid on an issue of at least $1 million of tax exempt bonds of such a State or local government, or any agency or subdivision thereof, within the preceding calendar year.

This amendment does change the House text. I felt that it was ambiguous and could lead to different interpretations by both the Secretary and the political subdivisions applying for loans.

We have changed the amendment so that it complies with the statement I just made, which is that the political subdivision or State making application for the loan will receive the loan based on the lowest interest rate paid by the State, and the State only, during the preceding year.

With that clarification, Madam President, I move the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. HANSEN. Madam President, the distinguished late Senator from Montana, Mr. Metcalf, the Senator from Colorado, Mr. HASKELL, and myself as sponsors of the mineral revenue sharing section of Public Law 94–579 were pleased to see the administration support this concept in principle.

Early last year we asked Secretary Andrus to seek funding for the loan provisions in section 317(c) of the Federal Land Policy and Management Act. We also asked that guidelines and regulations be written to help the many communities and political subdivisions obtain loans to address the multiple problems that face many of these areas as energy fuels are extracted from the Federal estate, State and private lands. The provision—section 317(c)—permits these communities to borrow against the future return of mineral royalties, and allows these areas access to the dollars needed "up front," when the need is the greatest, before production or extracting the revenue return.

Let me stress that this provision does not authorize massive new authorizations for funding the programs directed to relieving energy impact problems. Instead it provides a mechanism where those funds already allocated may be used when the need is greatest at the start of the energy development cycle and in the form of loans against the sure return of the mineral royalties as previously addressed by Congress. This is simply fine tuning of existing law.

I support my distinguished friend from Arkansas and urge adoption of the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MATSUNAGA). Do both Senators yield back their time?

Mr. BUMPERS. I yield back my remaining time.

Mr. HANSEN. I yield back my remaining time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1524

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, I send another amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Arkansas (Mr. BUMPERS) proposes an unprinted amendment numbered 1524.

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 2, line 5, strike "$292,200,000" and insert "$312,100,000".

On page 2, line 10, strike $20,900,000 and insert "$22,600,000".

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, this amendment would increase two of the fiscal year 1979 authorizations. The first would add $19.9 million to the authorization for management of lands and resources. The second would add $1.7 million to the authorization for land acquisition, construction and maintenance. These additions are designed to allow the authorization level for fiscal year 1979 to accommodate a proposed appropriation level already approved by the House of Representatives. I believe this flexibility of authorization is necessary to accommodate possible resolution of differences between the Senate and the House as to appropriations levels and purposes for fiscal year 1979. I urge adoption of the amendment.

Mr. HANSEN. Mr. President, I join with the Senator from Arkansas and urge the adoption of this amendment. I support it.

I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1525

Mr. HANSEN. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Wyoming (Mr. HANSEN) proposes an unprinted amendment numbered 1525.

Mr. HANSEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

Add at the end the following new section:

SEC. 2. The Act entitled "An Act to provide for the establishment of the King Range National Conservation Area in the State of California", approved October 21, 1970 (Public Law 91-476), is amended—

(1) by adding at the end of subparagraph (b) of section 5(3) the following sentence: "Any such payment made to the Secretary shall be deposited in the Treasury as a miscellaneous receipt.";

(2) by inserting "(a)" in section 12 after "Sec. 12."; and

(3) by adding at the end of section 10 the following new subsection:

"(b) In addition to any amounts authorized to be appropriated under subsection (a), there are authorized to be appropriated for fiscal years beginning on or after October 1, 1980, for the acquisition of lands and interests in lands under this Act—

"(1) from the Land and Water Conservation Fund (established under the Land and Water Conservation Fund Act of 1965) not to exceed $5,000,000, and

"(2) from any other sources an amount not to exceed the sum of (A) $5,000,000, and (B) an amount equal to the amount deposited in the Treasury under section 5(3)(B) of this Act after the date of the enactment of this subsection, such sums to remain available until expended.".

Mr. HANSEN. Mr. President, the purpose of this amendment is to raise the authorizing ceiling contained in the King Range National Conservation Area Act to permit the Bureau of Land Management to complete its land acquisition and land exchange program in the area.

The act was signed on October 21, 1970. The primary purpose of the legislation was to establish a national conservation area and to help the Bureau of Land Management in consolidating lands into a more manageable unit thus permitting BLM to better accomplish its preservation and multiple use objectives.

In 1970, the ownership pattern in the area was "checkerboard" in nature with intermingled public and private ownership. Of the total acreage, the Bureau of Land Management controlled approximately 31,500 acres with the remaining 21,000 acres held in private ownership. The act authorized the Secretary to acquire these private lands through exchange for public lands, outside the planning unit, located in the same county. Where the exchanges were unequal in value some cash was required to make the exchange process come out even. The original legislation, therefore, authorized $1,500,000 for this purpose and for land purchases where exchange was not possible.

To date 8,322 acres of the original private lands have been either exchanged or purchased with a remaining 13,000 acres to be acquired. In order to complete the consolidation it is necessary for us to raise the authorization ceiling to provide the additional funds needed. Our original authorization ceiling was intentionally set low to encourage the Department to negotiate as many exchanges as possible and to discourage land purchases.

Availability of large sums of money would have discouraged land exchanges in favor of outright purchases.

We have been successful in meeting this objective with the majority of the lands acquired to date obtained through exchanges. The acreage left to be acquired consists of a number of difficult areas which may ultimately require their purchase. Escalating land costs have also increased the cost. An additional $10 million is needed to complete all land negotiations in the King Range area.

This amendment also provides that any funds received by the Secretary from private landowners in exchange for public lands will be deposited in the Treasury under miscellaneous receipts with the authorization ceiling credited by an equal amount.

Since enactment of the legislation funds have been flowing into the Treasury as a result of land exchanges but these funds have not been available for use in additional exchanges and purchases. Our amendment corrects this accounting error and insures that adequate funds will remain available to complete King Range.

I urge my colleagues to adopt this amendment. It has the full support of both the majority and minority members of our committee.

I yield back my time.

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, I yield back my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time having been yielded back, the question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Wyoming.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, so far as I know, that completes all the amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there further amendments?

Mr. HANSEN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HANSEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HANSEN. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, I take this time only to indicate that the bill now before the Senate should not be considered to be the end of the problems in dealing with BLM. I think the fact that we passed the organic act last year gives us the framework for management direction and criteria, and the authorization for a 4-year period gives us the promise of a continuity and a steadiness of purpose that has lacked in the past. Any idea that, simply because we have now passed or are now passing an authorization for a 4-year period, that puts an end to the discussion of problems can only be laid to rest by a look at the problems that exist at this moment.

A number of those problems need to be addressed and are being addressed in the dialog with the Bureau of Land Management and their personnel, a dialog between environmental groups and user groups with respect to the management, direction, and criteria. But let me point up a couple of very specific difficulties.

We have now a new evaluation of grazing on public lands managed by the Bureau of Land Management that will put Western livestock men out of work. I am not talking about just minor adjustments; I am not talking about a simple readjustment of the levels of grazing. We have two that have already started in Idaho, one on the Challis district and one on the Shoshone district, that reduce grazing allotments by from 40 to 80 percent. I talked to one woman up on the east fork of the Salmon River 3 weeks ago whose family has been in operation in that area for three generations. The allotment which is being suggested to them now will reduce their operation to 75 head, and there is not anyone who can stay in business with a grazing allotment of 75 head.

What will happen is that those people are forced to make one of three decisions: They have to go out and find somebody else who is going out of business so they can consolidate operations, which is a bare possibility; they will be forced to sell to someone else who will use it for nonincome property—in other words, recreation property; or they will do what more and more livestock operators in the West are being forced to do—that is, subdivide their land.

Most people who are concerned about the land base in the West would regard the last option as being the worst option. Yet it is the option that more and more ranching operators are being forced to go to.

Let us take a look for a moment at the specific problems that lead to this kind of result, where people that have been on that land for generations are being forced, literally forced, out of the communities.

I might just mention that this happens to be a county that is 97 percent Federal land. They have no options. Federal land is all there is. If the Federal land cannot be used to maintain their livelihood, they simply have to leave the community. And there will not be much left, I guarantee you, if that is all there is, of people who can exist on what the BLM is suggesting to them now.

We have the criteria being used by the BLM for suitability as grazing land. They say cattle will not graze on a slope greater than 55 percent; therefore, the forage that is on a steep hillside has to be totally ignored. We took them out there and showed them slopes that were greater than 55 percent. While they were looking at them, right up there in the middle of the slope were a couple of cattle eating grass. They say you cannot count that, because those cattle ought not to be up there eating grass. After all, they have not been to college and been educated enough to know they cannot eat grass on a slope that steep.

They say you cannot have forage on land that is more than 3 miles away from water. There is a lot of that land, and I know my friend from Wyoming will recognize that instantly. There is a lot of land that is more than 3 miles away from water that has been grazed for years and is still being grazed. That has to be left out completely. That, I think, is absolutely ridiculous.

We have in that area, also, the problem of wild horse herds which we directed, under the Wild Horse and Burro Act, that the BLM manage. What are they doing? They have allowed that to quadruple in size.

It was 150 head. It is now over 600 head. They are saying that while we study this, we will freeze the situation. They should go out and freeze those stallions. The stallions are not being frozen and the situation is not being static. The population is growing and it is destroying the range.

Maybe some fellow has one really fine idea of how to control the birth rate of the wild horses out on the range. But they have not come up with it yet and the horses are destroying the ranges that were supposed to be protected.

That is another of the very serious problems not being addressed, but it is a critical problem that must be addressed.

We have another problem that must be addressed within far less than 4 years. We have got the necessity for range improvement. We have to somehow deal with this wild horse and burro problem and get the BLM into a management mood, not simply ducking the issue and avoiding confrontation that must inevitably come.

We have to somehow assure that on these public lands that are so important in our Western States and much of the country that there will be a continuation of multiple use management on these public lands.

It is necessary if the western livestock industry is to survive. It is important for the consumers of this country that the western livestock industry not be driven out of business and that we have to depend on foreigners to provide our food as well as our oil and other essentials for our society.

It seems to me we have to again emphasize what the BLM Organic Act was designed to emphasize, and that is management of the public domain for the American people, and not the kind of restriction, not, certainly, the kind of paralysis, that has characterized it now.

Range improvement and grazing legislation is now awaiting hearings before the Senate Natural Resources Committee and it is imperative that Congress finish this matter this year.

The House has passed their bill, H.R. 10587, and they have passed it overwhelmingly.

It will today introduce legislation in the Senate as a companion bill and I hope we will get to the decision on that legislation yet this year.

I hope the committee will take a long look at the excellent legislation which the House has already passed and get it to the floor as soon as possible.

Every major farm organization, including the Farm Bureau, the Farmers' Union, the National Farmer's Organization, the American National Cattlemen, the Grange, the Public Lands Council, and others, have endorsed this legislation. I can say without any doubt that that is truly one of the first times in a long, long time that all of those groups have joined together in support of any issue, but certainly it is significant that all join in support of this.

I hope when we take a look at that legislation we will also look at the possibility of granting the users the right to make improvements in lieu of the payment of fees, legislation that I have had pending for 2 years, and I think would greatly alleviate some problems in public land management caused by lack of appropriate levels of funding.

Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Wyoming for yielding me this time. I thought it was necessary to at least alleviate some of these problems that remain that this legislation today in authorization does not address and must be addressed soon.

Mr. HANSEN. Mr. President, I want to thank my colleague from Idaho for his very excellent and perceptive observations on some of the problems that we face and are becoming increasingly aware of as an effort is made to implement the laudible concepts Congress had in mind in passing the BLM Organic Act.

The Senator from Idaho has called attention to a number of problems that are common to many areas of the West. He has spoken specifically about situations in Idaho that could be duplicated in Wyoming, in Montana, in Nevada, in Utah, and most of the public lands of the West where grazing is commonly practiced.

In Wyoming we have one other situation that I know he is well aware of, but to which he did not allude. That is that in trying to change the grazing from one class of livestock to another, from sheep to cattle, for example, we have had inordinate delay brought about in part by the NRDC against the Hughes case. As a consequence of that suit it has been necessary in the opinion of the solicitor for the department to go into this complicated EIS exercise.

It is frustrating to see stockmen trying to reflect the desires and needs of consumers by changing from one class of livestock to another and unable to make that change.

Whatever can be done to expedite that, clearly, would be in the public interest.

I must say also that I am not certain just where the thinking of the Department at this particular moment may be. But if, as earlier was determined, each grazing district should require an EIS statement, the amount of money that would be required to be spent by the Government in the preparation of those statements seems to me to have no useful purpose that will be served.

Mr. McCLURE. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. HANSEN. I am happy to.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, a comment to me from my friend from Wyoming was that the Bureau of Land Management is requiring that an environmental impact statement be developed on every individual grazing unit. As a matter of fact, the Shoshone unit in Idaho is one of the first they have undertaken to do that on and the preliminary analysis beginning to flow out of that indicates they have made in that particular one an assignment of 60 percent of the available forage to wildlife.

I asked the land manager where that figure came from. He said it was arbitrary. Since that wildlife forage assignment has been made, they also assume it is competitive with the domestic livestock.

That would indicate the first cut at the pie would say there has to be 60-percent reduction in the available livestock grazing.

It is that kind of problem that is being focused on in the EIS which is being required.

I am not opposed to EIS. But, certainly, I agree with my friend from Wyoming that it is time consuming, it is expensive, and unless they develop better criteria, it is going to be devastating.

Mr. HANSEN. I thank my friend from Idaho.

I might say also that a lot of well-intentioned people just cannot be aware at all of what is happening to the range, to the destruction in the habitat that results from excessive numbers of wild horses and burros.

The fact is that these animals have no natural enemies out there and they have proliferated. Sooner or later, there will be a reduction, a very sharp and drastic reduction, in the herds if for no other reason than they will starve themselves to death because they have eaten up all their range. It is that simple.

It is distressing to me to see some of the efforts we have gone to in trying to adopt a wild horse or a wild burro. We give far more concern and spend more money in that kind of operation by far, I would expect, than is spent on the adoption of a human being.

I think the difficulty arises from the symbolism that a horse or a burro represents to many Americans, particularly those in the urban centers, and reveals the lack of an understanding that the part of the resource, the whole aspect of life that is most important has to be the habitat, which provides the grazing and the sustenance and the feed for animals, whether it is livestock, wild burros, or game.

It is not hard to manipulate numbers if you have the base, the forage, available for that. Without that, nothing else is going to work. I want to underscore that, because I think the Senator from Idaho has called attention very succinctly to some real concerns we have.

My understanding is that we have 212 EIS statements in the stipulated agreement. I think perhaps only three have been completed. When we think about the amount of man-hours, the amount of time that will have to be expended on completing the other 200, or however many there may be, we will be into the next century before we get that job done.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, one of the other questions we have also lies in the desirable and mandated review of roadless areas. In the definition of roadless areas, they have written out a large percentage of the total mileage of roads that exist on the public lands and have existed for many, many years. That is not only exposed into a greater impact, but also, the potential impact of the end result of the roadless area review on the public lands may be even greater than anybody now imagines; because they simply ignore roads that have been in use for 75 or 100 years by saying they do not exist. The definition does not allow them to exist. They are simply wiped off the map, as if they never did exist.

We also can discuss creditor problems and a number of other things that are problems on the public lands. However, it is not my intention to look at all the problems of Bureau of Land Management, but to highlight some of the most pressing problems.

I do appreciate the comments and the assistance of the Senator from Wyoming and that of Senator BUMPERS, the chairman of the subcommittee, for the work he has done in this area. We are going to be asking him to do a great deal more work as we look at these problems in the months ahead.

Mr. HANSEN. I thank the Senator.

I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. BUMPERS. I yield back the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is open to further amendment. If there be no further amendment to be proposed, the question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading and was read the third time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senate will now proceed to the consideration of H.R. 10787, which will be stated by title.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill (H.R. 10787) to authorize appropriations for activities and programs carried out by the Secretary of the Interior through the Bureau of Land Management.

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that all after the enacting clause of H.R. 10787 be stricken and that the text of S. 2234 be substituted therefor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill having been read the third time, the question is, Shall it pass?

The bill (H.R. 10787) was passed.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that S. 2234, the Senate bill dealing with the Bureau of Land Management authorization, be indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

PSYCHOTROPIC SUBSTANCES ACT OF 1978

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of Calendar No. 889.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be stated by title.

The second assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 2399) to amend the Comprehensive Drug Abuse Prevention and Control Act of 1970 and other laws to meet obligations under the Convention on Psychotropic Substances relating to regulatory controls on the manufacture, distribution, importation, and exportation of psychotropic substances, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with amendments as follows:

On page 3, line 16, beginning with the comma, strike through and including line 19, and insert in lieu thereof "as determined by the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare on the basis of a consensus of the views of the American medical and scientific community.";

On page 5, line 20, after "notification" insert "or receives notification (referred to in this subsection as a 'schedule notice') that existing legal controls applicable under this title to a drug or substance and the controls required by the Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act do not meet the requirements of the schedule of the Convention in which such drug or substance has been placed";

On page 6, line 6, after "notification" insert "or schedule notice";

On page 6, line 18, after "decision" insert "or schedule notice";

On page 7, line 1, after "decision" insert "or schedule notice";

On page 7, line 14, strike "or";

On page 7, line 21, strike the period and insert "; or" and the following:

"(iv) in the case of a schedule notice, request the Secretary of State to take appropriation action under the Convention to initiate proceedings to remove the drug or substance from the schedules under the Convention or to transfer the drug or substance to a schedule under the Convention different from the one specified in the schedule notice."

On page 9, line 11, strike "paragraph (3)(C)(ii) or (3)(C)(iii)" and insert "clause (ii) or (iii) of paragraph (3)(C) or after a request has been made under clause (iv) of such paragraph notice";

On page 9, line 22, after "Convention" insert "in the case of a drug or substance for which a notice of qualified acceptance was transmitted or whichever the Attorney General determines is appropriate in the case of a drug or substance described in a schedule notice";

On page 10, line 8, striking "such scheduling decision" and insert "the scheduling decision with respect to which a notice of qualified acceptance was transmitted in accordance with clause (ii) or (iii) of paragraph (3)(C)";

On page 10, line 19, after the period, insert the following: "If, as a result of action taken pursuant to action initiated under a request transmitted under clause (iv) of paragraph (3)(C), the drug or substance with respect to which such action was taken is not required to be controlled under schedule IV or V, the order issued under this paragraph with respect to such drug or substance shall expire upon receipt by the United States of a notice of the action taken with respect to such drug or substance under the Convention."

On page 11, line 9, strike "1977" and insert "1978";

On page 11, line 20, after "1971" insert a semicolon and "and the term 'Single Convention on Narcotic Drugs' means the Single Convention on Narcotic Drugs signed at New York, New York, on March 30, 1961";

On page 11, beginning with line 24, insert the following:

"(c) For the purpose of carrying out the minimum United States obligations under paragraph 7 of article 2 of the Convention on Psychotropic Substances, signed at Vienna, Austria, on February 21, 1971, with respect to pipradol and SPA (also known as (-)-1-dimethylamino-1,2-diphenylethane), the Attorney General shall by order, made without regard to sections 201 and 202 of the Controlled Substances Act, place such drugs in schedule IV of such Act."

On page 12, line 25, after "Drugs" strike the comma and "1961, signed at New York, New York, on March 30, 1961,";

On page 14, line 10, strike "INTERNATIONAL";

On page 14, line 10, strike "OR" and insert "AND OTHER INTERNATIONAL";

On page 14, line 21, strike "international";

On page 14, line 21, strike "or" and insert "and other international";

On page 15, line 7, strike "international treaties or agreements" and insert "treaties or international agreements";

On page 15, line 19, strike "international treaties or agreements" and insert "treaties or international agreements";

On page 16, line 22, after "Act" insert "and the amendments made by this Act";

Mr. CULVER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Mr. Stephen Rapp and Mr. Cliff Vaupel, of the staff of the Subcommittee on Juvenile Delinquency, have the privilege of the floor during the consideration of this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. CULVER. Mr. President, S. 2399 is enabling legislation for U.S. implementation of the provisions of the Vienna Convention on Psychotropic Substances. This bill was introduced by 14 Senators and was unanimously reported by the Committee on the Judiciary on June 21, 1978.

Mr. President, the adoption of S. 2399 and the ratification of the convention would provide for the same kind of international controls on drugs such as PCP, LSD, the amphetamines, and barbiturates that the Single Convention on Narcotics provided for drugs like heroin and morphine since 1961.

A great deal of attention has recently been focused on the problem of diversion from licit to illicit channels of legally manufactured psychotropic substances. On the domestic level Congress has enacted legislation to restrict such diversion by mandating certain enforcement activities to the Drug Enforcement Administration. Domestic legislation alone cannot prevent invasion by supplies from other countries. Preventing such illicit inflow is particularly difficult, if not impossible, if other countries by their own lack of adequate controls facilitate the diversion of dangerous drugs into illicit channels. Despite our own strong legislation, the United States has become, in the words of a DEA official, "a victim of the current international inadequacies."

An example of this situation was presented during the course of one of the Juvenile Delinquency Subcommittee's hearings by an official of the Drug Enforcement Administration who testified that—

The U.S. Mexican border area has become the locus of many clandestine operations using barbiturate and amphetamine powders diverted from legitimate international commerce. Seizures continued to escalate at a rapid pace. In 1971 some 8 million illicit amphetamine tablets believed to be of clandestine Mexican manufacture were confiscated by U.S. enforcement agencies in the United States. In 1972 approximately 13 million tablets were seized, and in 1973 the total exceeded 26 million tablets.

It is this type of activity that the Convention on Psychotropic Substances seeks to prevent by limiting stimulant, depressant, and hallucinogenic drugs to medical and scientific purposes.

If we are to succeed, it will be necessary for importing as well as exporting countries to become parties to the convention. The United States, as one of the largest manufacturers of psychotropic substances, cannot prevent or significantly reduce the illicit availability of such drugs unless we become a party to the convention.

In addition, ratifying the convention would strengthen our leadership in international drug abuse control by increasing our credibility as a nation willing to apply effective controls at home while cooperating in the prevention of illicit trafficking in other countries.

S. 2399 seeks to amend the Comprehensive Drug Abuse Prevention and Control Act and other drug laws to implement the provisions of the convention which was signed in Vienna on February 21, 1971, and has been in force since August 16, 1976.

It has been transmitted to the U.S. Senate for advice and consent. The convention is currently before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee which has deferred further action until the necessary enabling legislation has been enacted.

Substantively, the requirements of the convention are already largely satisfied by current U.S. drug laws. However, these laws do not authorize administrative action to conform U.S. drug controls to those under international agreements ratified by the United States after the date of their enactment. They only authorize action to conform domestic controls with controls under earlier international agreements such as the 1961 Single Convention on Narcotics. New legislation is, therefore, necessary to provide the administrative mechanism to permit U.S. implementation of the provisions of the Psychotropic Convention.

The Convention on Psychotropic Substances has as its focus, the international control of substances that are not included under any of the existing multilateral drug treaties. These treaties are directed toward international control of opium and other narcotic substances. This particular treaty governs the nonnarcotic drugs known as psychotropic substances which produce central nervous system stimulation or depression with resulting disturbances in perception, thinking, and behavior. These drugs include hallucinogens such as LSD and mescaline, amphetamines, barbiturates, and certain tranquilizers.

Structurally, the convention is similar to both the Single Convention on Narcotic Substances, ratified by the United States in 1967 and the Comprehensive Drug Abuse Prevention and Control Act. The convention lists substances in schedules depending on the extent of their abuse, their potential for abuse, and their therapeutic usefulness. It contains procedures for adding new substances to schedules, moving them among schedules and deleting them from the schedules. It provides gradations of control, with the most stringent controls applied to schedule I substances, such as LSD, and less forceful retrictions on substances in schedules II, III, and IV.

Mr. President, in summary, S. 2399 would have very little substantive effect on our drug laws. It would simply require us to apply minimum controls to any drug the World Health Organization and the U.N. Commission on Narcotic Drugs voted to control. It would not prohibit us from controlling any other drug that we might wish to restrict.

It would have a substantial effect on international control of drugs. To date, 49 nations have ratified the convention and many others are waiting on our ratification. Our approval will lead to ratification by nations which have no controls and thus put an end to the business of drugs being legally shipped from a producer country to a country without controls and then shipped back through the illicit market.

It would aid our efforts to persuade underdeveloped nations to control opium and coca. Quite often when we ask them to participate in international controls on the production of these substances they resist, pointing to our failure to participate in such controls on the drugs we produce.

Mr. President, our adoption of S. 2399 is long overdue. I urge the Senate to take this important step toward greater international cooperation in the control of dangerous drugs by approving S. 2399.

Mr. President, the Judiciary Committee has adopted several technical amendments. I ask unanimous consent that the committee amendments be agreed to en bloc and that the bill as thus amended be regarded for the purpose of amendment as the original text.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. CULVER. Mr. President, at this time I yield to the distinguished Senator from Texas (Mr. BENTSEN) for the presentation of an amendment.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1526

Mr. BENTSEN. I thank the distinguished Senator.

Mr. President, I offer this amendment on behalf of myself, Senator CULVER, and Senator HATHAWAY.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Texas (Mr. BENTSEN), for himself and others, proposes an unprinted amendment numbered 1526.

Mr. BENTSEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 1, at the bottom of the page add the following:

"TITLE I—ENABLING PROVISIONS FOR THE CONVENTION ON PSYCHOTROPIC SUBSTANCES".

On page 16, line 22 strike out "Act" and insert in lieu thereof "title".

On page 16, line 23 strike out "Act" and insert in lieu thereof "title".

At the end of the bill add the following new title:

TITLE II—PCP CRIMINAL PENALTIES AND PIPERIDINE REPORTING

SEC. 101. Subsection (b) of section 401 of the Controlled Substances Act (21 U.S.C. 841(b)) is amended—

(a) by inserting after the phrase "such person shall" in the first sentence of paragraph (1)(B) the following: ", except as provided in paragraphs (4) and (5) of this subsection,", and

(b) by adding after paragraph (4) the following new paragraph:

"(5) Notwithstanding paragraph (1)(B) of this subsection, any person who violates subsection (a) of this section by manufacturing, distributing, or possessing with intent to manufacture or distribute, except as authorized by this title or title III, phencyclidine, shall be sentenced to a term of imprisonment of not more than 10 years, a fine of not more than $25,000 or both. If any person commits such a violation after one or more prior convictions of him for an offense punishable under paragraph (1)(B) of this section or for a felony under any other provision of this title or title III or other law of the United States relating to narcotic drugs, marihuana, or depressant or stimulant substances, have become final, such person shall be sentenced to a term of imprisonment of not more than 20 years, a fine of not more than $50,000, or both. Any sentence imposing a term of imprisonment under this paragraph shall, in the absence of such a prior conviction, impose a special parole term of at least 2 years in addition to such term of imprisonment and shall, if there was such a prior conviction, impose a special parole term of at least 4 years in addition to such term of imprisonment. For the purposes of this paragraph, 'phencyclidine' means 1-(1-phenylcyclohexyl) piperidine, its salts and any analog, derivative, or variant of 1-(1-phenylcyclohexyl) piperidine that is in a schedule pursuant to section 202 of this title.".

SEC. 102. The Controlled Substances Act (Subchapter I of chapter 13 of title 21 of the United States Code) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new part:

"PART H—PIPERIDINE REPORTING

"§ 800. Reporting requirement

"(a) It shall be unlawful—

"(1) For any person to sell, transfer, or otherwise furnish any piperidine unless such person reports such sale, transfer, or exchange to the Attorney General pursuant to regulations promulgated under section 801.

"(2) For any person to sell, transfer, or otherwise furnish any piperidine unless the purchaser, transferee, or other recipient of such piperidine presents positive personal identification pursuant to regulations promulgated by the Attorney General under section 801.

"(3) For any importer of piperidine to receive piperidine without reporting such receipt to the Attorney General pursuant to regulations promulgated under section 801.

"(b) The provisions of paragraph (a) of this section shall not apply to—

"(1) Intracompany sales or transfers of piperidine.

"(2) A common or contract carrier or warehouseman, or an employee thereof, whose possession of piperidine is solely for the purpose of transporting such substance in the usual course of his business or employment; Provided, That the Attorney General may require any such carrier or warehouseman to retain and report any shipping documents for such substance.

"§ 801. Nature of reports

"(a) Any person required to submit a report pursuant to section 800 shall submit such report on a common reporting form to be issued in blank by the Attorney General.

"(b) Such reporting form shall contain information as to—

"(1) The quantity and form of the piperidine sold, imported, transferred, or otherwise furnished.

"(2) The date the piperidine was sold, imported, transferred, or otherwise furnished.

"(3) The name, address, and age of any individual who purchases, imports, or otherwise receives such piperidine.

"(4) The type of identification presented by the individual purchaser, importer, or other transferee.

"(5) The name and address of any business entity that purchases, imports, or otherwise receives piperidine, including the name, address, and title of the employee placing the order for purchase, import, or other receipt of piperidine for such business entity.

"(6) The purpose of such purchase, importation, or transfer, including a description of the intended usage of such piperidine. This requirement shall not apply to quarterly reports authorized by the Attorney General under section 802(b).

"(7) The date and manner that such piperidine was shipped or otherwise transferred and the address of the destination of any such shipment or transfer.

"(8) Such other information, including that necessary for establishing positive, buyer or transferee identification, as the Attorney General may deem necessary for the enforcement of this part.

"(c) The Attorney General is authorized to promulgate such regulations as are necessary for the enforcement of this part.

"(d) Not later than one year after the effective date of this part, the Attorney General shall submit to the President and the Congress an analysis and evaluation of the effectiveness of piperidine reporting in reducing the illicit manufacture of phencyclidine. Such analysis and evaluation shall also contain an assessment of any burden such reporting places on legitimate transaction in and uses of piperidine and such recommendations as the Attorney General deems appropriate.

"§ 802. Filing deadline for reports

"(a) Except as provided in subsections (b) and (c) of this section any person required to submit a report to the Attorney General pursuant to section 800 shall submit such report within 7 days of the purchase, transfer, importation, or other exchange of piperidine.

"(b) The Attorney General may authorize any person required to submit a report to the Attorney General pursuant to section 800 to submit such report on a quarterly basis with respect to repeated, regular transactions between the furnisher and the recipient if the Attorney General determines that (1) a pattern of regular supply of piperidine exists as between the person who sells, imports, transfers, or otherwise furnishes such piperidine and the recipient of the piperidine and (2) the recipient has established a record of utilization of such piperidine for lawful purposes.

"(c) Any person required to submit a report to the Attorney General pursuant to section 800 within the first 90 days after the enactment of this part may submit such report at any time up to 100 days after the enactment of this part. Such report shall contain the information specified in paragraphs (b)(1) through (b)(7) of section 801.

"§ 803. Retention and inspection of records

"(a) Any person who sells, imports, transfers, or otherwise furnishes piperidine shall maintain such records as are deemed necessary by the Attorney General to enforce this part. Such records shall be kept and be available, for 2 years, for inspection or copying by officers or employees of the United States authorized by the Attorney General.

"(b) Upon the request of any State or any political subdivision thereof, the Attorney General may make available to such State or any political subdivision thereof, any information which he may obtain by reason of the provisions of this part with respect to identification of persons within such State or political subdivision thereof who have purchased, imported, or otherwise received piperidine together with a description of such piperidine.

"§ 804. Lost or stolen piperidine

"Any person who manufactures, sells, purchases, imports, transports, transfers, or otherwise furnishes or receives piperidine shall report any theft or loss of such piperidine to the Attorney General within 7 days of the actual discovery of such theft or loss. Such reports shall contain such information as the Attorney General may require under regulations promulgated under this part.

"§ 805. False or misleading statements

"It shall be unlawful for any seller, purchaser, importer, transferor, transferee, or other provider or recipient of piperidine to knowlingly make any false, oral, or written statement or misrepresentation with respect to information required to be reported pursuant to regulations promulgated under this part or to knowingly omit any material information required to be reported pursuant to regulations promulgated under this part.

"§ 806. Penalties, enforcement

"(a) Whenever it shall appear that any person has violated any provision of section 800, 801, 802, 803, 804, or 805, the Attorney General may bring a civil action for such relief (including injunctions) as may be appropriate.

"(b)(1) Except as provided in paragraph (2), any person who violates section 800, 801, 802, 803, 804, or 805 shall, with respect to any such violation, be subject to a civil penalty of not more than $25,000. The district courts of the United States (or, where there is no such court in the case of any territory or possession of the United States, then the court in such territory or possession having the jurisdiction of a district court of the United States in cases arising under the Constitution and laws of the United States) shall have jurisdiction in accordance with section 1355 of title 28 of the United States Code to enforce this paragraph.

"(2)(A) If a violation of section 800, 801, 802, 803, 804, or 805 is prosecuted by an information or indictment which alleges that the violation was committed knowingly and the trier of fact specifically finds that the violation was so committed, such person shall, except as otherwise provided in subparagraph (b)(2)(B) of this section be sentenced to imprisonment of not more than one year or a fine of not more than $25,000, or both.

"(B) If a violation referred to in subparagraph (A) was committed after one or more prior convictions of the offender for an offense punishable under paragraph (2), or for a crime under any other provision of this title or title III or other law of the United States relating to narcotic drugs, marihuana, or depressant or stimulant substances, have become final, such person shall be sentenced to a term of imprisonment of not more than two years, a fine of $5,000, or both.

"(3) Except under the conditions specified in paragraph (2) of this subsection, a violation of section 800, 801, 802, 803, 804, or 805 does not constitute a crime, and a judgment for the United States and imposition of a civil penalty pursuant to paragraph (1) of this subsection shall not give rise to any disability or legal disadvantage based on conviction for a criminal offense.

"§ 807. Prohibited transfers of piperidine

"It shall be unlawful for any person to import, purchase, transport, transfer, receive, conceal, store, barter, sell, manufacture, or otherwise furnish or dispose of any piperidine if—

"(a) such person—

"(1) is under indictment for, has been convicted in any court of, a crime punishable by, imprisonment for a term exceeding one year;

"(2) is a fugitive from justice; or

"(3) is an unlawful user of any depressant or stimulant substance (as defined in 21 U.S.C. 802(9)) or narcotic drug (as defined in 21 U.S.C. 802(16)), or

"(b) such person knows or has reasonable cause to believe—

"(1) that such piperidine will be used to manufacture phencyclidine, except as authorized by this title or title III

"(2) that such piperidine has been stolen, or

"(3) that the purchaser, transferee, or other recipient of such piperidine—

"(A) is under the age of 18;

"(B) is under indictment for, or has been convicted in any court of, a crime punishable by imprisonment for a term exceeding one year;

"(C) is a fugitive from justice; or

"(D) is an unlawful user of any depressant or stimulant substance (as defined in 21 U.S.C. 802(9)) or narcotic drug (as defined in 21 U.S.C. 802(16)).

"§ 808. Criminal penalties

"Any person who violates any provision of section 807 shall be fined not more than $20,000, or imprisoned not more than five years, or both.

"§ 809. Confidentiality

"Reports and records obtained by the Department of Justice under this part shall be considered confidential, commercial and financial information, and as such shall not be publicly disclosed, unless needed in a civil or criminal action.

"§ 810 Sunset provision

"(a) At the end of a period of time consisting of three calendar years beginning on the date of enactment of this part, this part shall be repealed unless legislation to continue the existence of this part is enacted during such period of time.

"(b) Any repeal of this part pursuant to subsection (a) of this section shall not affect or abate any civil or criminal proceedings for any violation of this part if such violation occurred prior to the date of such repeal.

"§ 811. Definitions

"For purposes of this part—

"(1) 'Person' includes any individual or business entity;

"(2) 'Piperidine' means piperidine, its salts and its acyl derivatives;

"(3) 'Phencyclidine' means 1-(1-phenylcyclohexyl) piperidine, its salts and any alalog, derivative, or variant of 1-(phenylcyclohexyl) piperidine that is in a schedule pursuant to section 202 of this title; and

"(4) 'Attorney General' means the Attorney General of the United States.".

Mr. BENTSEN. Mr. President, this PCP control amendment is identical to S. 2778, a measure that received the enthusiastic, unanimous approval of the Judiciary Committee's Juvenile Delinquency Subcommittee on July 13.

In June, S. 2778 was the subject of 2 days of public hearings. These sessions were cochaired by my distinguished colleagues, Senator HATHAWAY, chairman of the Human Resources Subcommittee on Alcoholism and Drug Abuse, and Senator CULVER, chairman of the Juvenile Delinquency Subcommittee. I commend Senators HATHAWAY and CULVER for their interest and for their expeditious consideration of this measure.

I first introduced S. 2778, the PCP Control Act of 1978, on March 22, in an effort to help deter the illicit manufacture and distribution of a particularly dangerous street drug currently in vogue with many young people in this country. Mr. President, I am pleased to report that this proposal has been cosponsored by 34 of our colleagues—Senators ALLEN, ANDERSON, BELLMON, BIDEN, BUMPERS, CULVER, DECONCINI, DOLE, EAGLETON, GARN, GOLDWATER, GRIFFIN, HATCH, HATHAWAY, HAYAKAWA, HODGES, HUDDLESTON, HUMPHREY, JOHNSTON, LEAHY, LONG, LUGAR, MATSUNAGA, MCINTYRE, PELL, PERCY, RANDOLPH, RIEGLE, SARBANES, SASSER, SCHMITT, STONE, TALMADGE, and TOWER. I would also note, Mr. President, that this legislation has been endorsed by the International Association of Police Chiefs, the International Narcotics Enforcement Officers Association, and by the State narcotic agencies of Alabama, Arizona, Arkansas, Flordia, Georgia, Louisiana, Michigan, Mississippi, New Mexico, Oklahoma, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas, and Virginia. The Federal Drug Enforcement Administration and the Department of Justice also embraced the proposal.

I think this broad measure of support, in the Senate and among the Federal and State jurisdictions, suggests that the time has indeed come to move against PCP. Clearly, Mr. President, we have an urgent requirement to devote our best efforts to control the abuse of this new drug. Not only because PCP is dangerous per se, but also because it could well be the harbinger of a whole new generation of entirely synthetic, manmade drugs that contain elements not normally found in nature. Unlike cocaine, morphine, or opium, PCP does not have to be grown abroad, refined, and smuggled into this country. Unlike LSD and related semisynthetic drugs having complex molecular architecture, PCP can be produced cheaply and in abundance by anyone with perverse instincts out to make a fast dollar.

Mr. President, this amendment would increase the criminal sanctions for the unauthorized manufacture, distribution, or possession of PCP from a maximum first offense penalty of 5 years in prison and/or a $15,000 fine to 10 years in prison and/or a $25,000 fine. Furthermore, the measure would render the clandestine manufacture of PCP much more perilous by controlling the sale and transfer of the chemical piperidine, a necessary ingredient in the illicit production of PCP. This is accomplished by requiring anyone who purchases piperidine to present positive identification at the time of purchase, with the transaction registered with DEA.

PCP, angel dust, killer-weed, DOA—by any name, the animal tranquilizer phencyclidine is without question a dangerously different drug of abuse. As employees of any hospital emergency room or psychiatric ward can attest, PCP misuse literally drives people insane. Individuals under the influence of this dangerously different drug suffer disorientation and dissociation; their pain receptors become short-circuited. Some individuals high on angel dust commit grotesque acts of self-mutilation while others engage in violent, unprovoked attacks on innocent bystanders. Consider the following:

Medical specialists attribute a recent schizophrenia epidemic occurring in the Washington, D.C. area to PCP abuse.

In 1977, 4,000 emergency room admissions and over 100 deaths were attributed to the abuse of angel dust.

We read of PCP demented youths crashing through closed doors and plate glass windows, and impaling themselves on fences during frightened flight from imaginary monsters. Youngsters under the influence of this terrible drug have pulled out their own teeth with pliers, gouged their eyes from their sockets to avoid seeing grotesque visions, and drank rat poison to kill the rodents they believed were infesting their bodies.

Police files contain reports of angel dust crazed citizens murdering an unwanted child, assassinating immediate family members, and strangling loved ones.

Hundreds of similar acts are chronicled and recorded. We react in horror. But we have no way of knowing how many thousands of minds have been permanently twisted; we have no way of knowing how many of the 1½ million children between the ages of 12 and 17 who have experimented with PCP or angel dust have become mental cripples for life.

One of the basic problems in attacking PCP is the fact that any person with a few hundred dollars and perverse instincts can manufacture angel dust at home or even in the back of a van. He can freely order the ingredients from a mail order house, and turn a $600 investment into drugs worth $100,000 on the street. He runs a certain risk of blowing himself up in the process, but this does not deter these entrepreneurs of derangement. Most of the angel dust used by the young people of America today is manufactured by nonprofessional criminals out to make a quick buck.

Mr. President, I would like to sketch out a little scenario for you. Let us assume, just for the sake of argument, that someone wanted to make some money and decided to go into the PCP business. He or she would need about $600, Mr. President, not an insuperable obstacle. He or she would need some primitive equipment and a place to manufacture—a cellar, a garage, or even a van would do nicely. Then the entrepreneur would go to a chemical supply house, cash in hand, and order the ingredients. A little cyclohexanone, a little phenylmagnesiumhalide, and a little piperidine. Assuming that the purchaser pays cash, there need be no questions asked and the sale cannot be traced. Now the person has most everything required to turn that $600 into PCP having a street value of $100,000. PCP that can be sold on the street for as little as $1 for 5 milligrams. We now have a situation in which, for the price of a school lunch, a child can buy enough PCP to blow his mind for hours, or possibly forever.

But piperidine, the third essential chemical in the manufacture of PCP, is produced in small quantities—it represents only one one-hundred thousandth of 1 percent of U.S. chemical production—and has only one major commercial use—the curing of rubber.

There is little reason why anyone who is not in the business of curing rubber should be purchasing PCP from a chemical supply house. On the contrary: There is every reason to believe that a person making a cash purchase of piperidine is bent on the illegal manufacture of PCP.

This amendment is drafted to attack the PCP manufacturing process at its Achilles heel—unquestioned access to piperidine. It would require anyone who purchases piperidine to present positive identification at the time of purchase, with the transaction registered with DEA.

I am not suggesting a licensing procedure. I do not envision interfering with the normal flow of chemicals throughout industry. I have no intention of creating cumbersome bureaucratic procedures, and indeed we are not.

We are simply proposing that those who go to a chemical supply company, in person or by mail, to purchase piperidine, should be required to present positive identification.

Since many of those currently making such purchases are engaged in the illegal manufacture of PCP, it is reasonable to assume that they would be reluctant to identify themselves and have the transaction registered with DEA.

Mr. President, PCP is dynamite. It can do to the brain what TNT can do to a building. We do not permit people to walk in off the street and purchase dynamite in this country. It makes no sense for us to permit individuals to purchase, without even the requirement for identification, all the necessary ingredients for PCP.

This legislation would have three primary benefits. It would give law enforcement authorities urgently needed information on purchasers of piperidine—people who are either curing rubber legally or destroying young minds illegally.

The requirement for registration upon purchase of piperidine would deter weekend profiteers from obtaining an essential raw material used in the PCP manufacturing process.

And finally, by providing legal procedures for the purchase of piperidine, we would give drug enforcement officials an added weapon to use in prosecuting illegal PCP producers.

I urge my colleagues to support this measure. In my opinion, this country cannot afford to wait any longer before acting to control "the most dangerous drug to ever hit the streets."

Mr. President, this was the subject of 2 days of public hearings. It is a concerted attack on the problem of PCP and its distribution in this country. It increases the penalties. It requires a positive identification on the purchase of piperidine, which is an essential ingredient that has to go into the making of "angel dust."

I believe that taking this action will recognize what is happening in the manufacturing of chemical drugs that could be the harbinger of a new class of drugs in this country, drugs that could be purchased for the price of a school lunch, whereby kids have a chance to blow their minds not just for 5 hours but for life.

I am very appreciative of the leadership shown by Senator CULVER and his subcommittee and that of Senator HATHAWAY.

It is my understanding that both sides of the aisle are agreeable to this amendment.

Mr. CULVER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. President, I thank the distinguished Senator from Texas for his amendment. As the author of S. 2778, the bill upon which this amendment is based, he deserves great credit for recognizing the need to deal with the growing problem of PCP. I also wish to thank Senator HATHAWAY, who along with the Subcommittee on Alcoholism and Drug Abuse, has played a major role in formulating this amendment. Legislation upon which this amendment is based was the subject of 2 days of joint hearings by the Subcommittees on Juvenile Delinquency and Alcoholism and Drug Abuse. It was approved unanimously, with amendment on July 13, and has my fullest support.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a section-by-section analysis of this amendment as approved by the Juvenile Delinquency Subcommittee.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SECTION-BY-SECTION ANALYSIS OF BENTSEN-HATHAWAY-CULVER AMENDMENT

Section 101 would increase the penalties for the illegal manufacture or distribution of phencyclidine (PCP) from the current maximum of five years imprisonment and/or $15,000 fine to a maximum of ten years imprisonment and/or a fine of $25,000. It would also increase the penalty for a second or subsequent offense from the current maximum of ten years imprisonment and/or a $30,000 fine to a maximum of twenty years imprisonment and/or a $50,000 fine.

Section 102 would add a new part entitled "Piperidine Reporting" to the Controlled Substances Act (Chapter 13 of title 21 of the United States Code). This new part would require anyone who furnishes or receives piperidine to report certain information to the Attorney General and prohibits certain transfers of piperidine. Specifically:

Section 800 of the proposed part requires anyone who sells, transfers, imports or otherwise furnishes piperidine to require the recipient of such piperidine to present positive personal identification and to report such transaction to the Attorney General.

Proposed Section 801 identifies the type of information that must be reported to the Attorney General following the transaction in piperidine. This information includes the quantity and form of the piperidine transferred; the date of the transaction; the name, address and age of the recipient if such recipient is an individual; the name, address and authorizing employee of the recipient if the recipient is a business entity; the purpose of such transfer including a description of the intended usage of the piperidine; the date and manner of any shipment of piperidine; the type of identification produced by the recipient of the piperidine; and such other information as the Attorney General may require. This section would also authorize the Attorney General to promulgate such regulations as are necessary for the enforcement of the subchapter. Finally it would require the Attorney General to submit a report to Congress evaluating the effectiveness of piperidine reporting in reducing the illicit manufacture of phencyclidine and any burden such reporting places on legitimate transactions in and uses of piperidine.

Proposed Section 802 would require such reports to be submitted to the Attorney General within seven days of the transaction except that the Attorney General may authorize the parties of repeated, regular, legitimate transfers of piperidine to submit such reports on a quarterly basis. In order to allow time for the institution of the reporting system, the section also provides that any reports that are due during the first 90 days after enactment may be submitted at any time up to 100 days after enactment.

Proposed Section 803(a) requires anyone who furnishes piperidine to maintain such records of piperidine transactions as the Attorney General may require for a period of two years. It is the intent of this provision that the scope of such record keeping be restricted solely to such documents as are necessary for the enforcement of the subchapter such as copies of reports filed with the Attorney General and such original sales documents as purchase orders and invoices.

Proposed section 803(a) requires that such records be made available for inspection and copying by officers and employees of the United States who are authorized by the Attorney General to do so, and a refusal to do so would be a violation of this subsection. Federal agents are not authorized by this section or any other section of this amendment to make warrantless searches for the purposes of inspecting or copying such records. To this extent, section 803(a) should be interpreted in light of the recent United States Supreme Court decision in Barlow v. Marshall (May 23, 1978).

Proposed Section 804 requires anyone who furnishes, receives or transports piperidine to report any lost or stolen piperidine within seven days of the discovery of such loss or theft.

Proposed Section 805 would make it unlawful for any party to a transaction in piperidine to knowingly omit or misrepresent any information required to be reported to the Attorney General.

Proposed Section 806 would provide civil and criminal penalties for violations of proposed sections 801, 802, 803, 804, or 805. Civil penalties would include injunctions and/or a fine if not more than $25,000. Anyone who knowingly violated these sections would also be subject to a criminal penalty of up to one year imprisonment and/or a fine of $25,000 for a first offense and up to two years imprisonment and/or a fine of $50,000 for a record or subsequent offense.

Proposed Section 807 would prohibit transactions in piperidine if one of the partners to the transaction is under indictment for or has been convicted of a felony; is a fugitive from justice, or is an unlawful user of any controlled substance. This section would also prohibit any transaction in piperidine if one of the parties to the transaction knew or had reasonable cause to know that the piperidine is intended for use in the illegal manufacture of PCP or is stolen; or that the recipient of such piperidine is under the age of 18 or under indictment for or convicted of a felony, is a fugitive from justice, or is an unlawful user of any controlled substance.

Proposed Section 808 would provide for criminal penalties for any violation of section 807. Such penalties would consist of imprisonment for up to five years and/or a fine of up to $20,000.

Proposed section 809 would provide that reports and records obtained by the Department of Justice under this subchapter shall be considered confidential, commercial and financial information and shall not be publicly disclosed unless needed in a civil or criminal action.

Proposed section 810 provides that this subchapter will be repealed at the end of three years unless the Congress enacts legislation to continue its existence during that period of time.

Proposed section 811 would define several terms. Under this section the definition of piperidine would include any salts or acyl derivatives of piperidine as well as any analogue derivative or variant of phencyclidine that is placed on a schedule of controlled substances.

Mr. CULVER. Mr. President, this amendment seeks to stem the rapid and very dangerous increase in the use of phencyclidine, or PCP, among our young people. It would accomplish this by increasing the penalties for illegal manufacture and distribution of PCP from a maximum of 5 years and/or a $15,000 fine to 10 years and/or a $25,000 fine. It will also make it much more difficult to actually manufacture this dangerous drug by requiring anyone who purchases piperidine, a relatively rare chemical used in manufacturing PCP, to present proper identification at the time of such purchase, and would require reporting of these transactions to the drug enforcement administration.

The record of our hearings established that the abuse of PCP is a serious and growing problem in this country. The testimony also identified a number of improvements which the committee subsequently made in the original legislation sponsored by Senator BENTSEN.

Specifically we focused the reporting requirement on the type of information that will be most useful to law enforcement authorities. We also allowed regular legitimate purchasers of piperidine to furnish the Attorney General with abbreviated reports on a quarterly basis once the Attorney General has determined that such sales are for legitimate purposes. We also provided civil penalties for non-criminal violations of the act, but strengthened the prohibition against those who knowingly divert piperidine to the illicit manufacture of PCP. We added a provision to insure the confidentiality of all reports on piperidine sales. And finally, Mr. President, we required the Attorney General to submit a report to the Congress concerning any burdens this amendment may place on legitimate sales of or uses for piperidine.

In short we took every precaution to assure that this amendment does not place any significant burden on the legitimate use of piperidine but is still effective in preventing the illicit manufacture of PCP. I believe this amendment will prove to be very effective in reducing the availability of this dangerous drug and I fully support its passage.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a letter I have received from the administrator of the Drug Enforcement Administration about the sentencing of the defendants in a recent major PCP manufacturing case.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
DRUG ENFORCEMENT ADMINISTRATION,
Washington, D.C., July 21, 1978.

Hon. JOHN C. CULVER,
Chairman, Subcommittee on Juvenile Delinquency, U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR CHAIRMAN CULVER: A major focus during the PCP hearings you co-chaired with Senator Hathaway on June 7 and 21, 1978, was the need for more appropriate sentencing for PCP offenses. You will recall that during my testimony I wholly supported the increased sentencing provisions contained in S. 2778. Too many light sentences are being given which are totally inconsistent with the cases we are bringing before the courts. The following is a most recent example.

As a result of information voluntarily provided by chemical companies located on the East Coast who are participating in our precursor liaison program, DEA initiated surveillance of chemicals air freighted to Los Angeles. The surveillance was conducted by approximately 80 agents of our Los Angeles office as well as agents who were temporarily brought in from our San Diego and San Francisco offices. In addition, approximately 50 Deputy Sheriffs of the Los Angeles County Sheriff's Office participated.

Based on two weeks surveillance, 17 search warrants were executed on December 17, 1977. The following seizures were affected: 104.5 pounds of PCP, 869 pounds of PCC (the immediate precursor to PCP), eleven tons of chemicals used in the manufacture of methaqualone, a multi-station tableting press and various laboratory equipment. Five defendants were charged with felony counts of conspiracy to manufacture, manufacture, possession with intent to distribute, and aiding and abetting. The seizure was the largest PCP seizure effected to date.

Two of the senior Assistant United States Attorneys in Los Angeles prosecuted the case with distinction. The selection of these Attorneys is indicative of the seriousness in which the U.S. Attorney in Los Angeles viewed the case. Three of the defendants pled guilty and two cooperated with the Federal prosecutors. These defendants received probationary sentences. After a two week trial the remaining defendants were found guilty.

On July 12, 1978, sentencing of three defendants took place in U.S. District Court in Los Angeles. Only one defendant received a sentence of incarceration and that was for only three years. The other two defendants received five-year probationary sentences.

In my mind these sentences are unacceptable in terms of both punishment for the offenses committed and in terms of deterrence to others. It also illustrates a lack of perception by the Courts of the magnitude of the PCP problem. The Special Agents, local officers and prosecutors who worked this case are greatly dismayed.

You are assured that DEA will continue to stress the enforcement of the statutes relating to PCP. It is my hope that your legislative efforts will result in more appropriate sentences in the Courts.

Sincerely,

PETER B. BENSINGER,
Administrator.

Mr. HATHAWAY. Mr. President, I am pleased to support the amendment offered by my distinguished colleague, Mr. BENTSEN, to increase penalties for trafficking in PCP, and to require reporting of exchanges of piperidine, an essential PCP ingredient.

Last month the Subcommittee on Alcoholism and Drug Abuse held two joint hearings with the Subcommittee on Juvenile Delinquency to explore a relatively new phenomenon in drug abuse; namely, the illicit use of legitimate chemicals. Our specific focus was on phencyclidine, commonly known as PCP, angel dust, killer weed, crystal, cadillac, cyclone, hog, and many other descriptive terms. It is even called DOA by some—this is police shorthand for "dead on arrival."

Regardless of what it is called, PCP is said to be a deadly and devastating drug, worse than anything else on the street. A glance at a magazine stand reveals numerous articles on PCP in a variety of magazines from Women's Day to Newsweek to Human Behavior. Newspapers and television programs have been drawing attention to PCP as well. Just 2 weeks ago, the Washington Post ran a front page story on the destructive effects of PCP on the family, friends, and neighbors of the PCP user. Clearly, the problem extends far beyond the user alone.

That PCP has become a national problem, as reflected by the media, is also supported by what little statistical information we have available. Use of PCP is growing in alarming proportions, especially among our Nation's youth. Federal officials estimate that nearly 7 million people, most of them 12 to 25 years old, have tried this dangerous drug. Recent news reports indicate that last year alone, PCP sent at least 4,000 users to hospital emergency rooms, took 100 lives, and was responsible for an untold number of strange, suicidal, or homicidal acts. Reported incidents include drowning in a shower, self-inflicted gunshot wounds, and other bizarre behavior.

PCP is a nonnarcotic, nonbarbiturate chemical agent. It is apparently easy to make from readily available legal chemicals. This drug is extremely toxic and can cause severe reactions with a single dose.

Because of its widespread abuse and potential for devastating effects, PCP warrants national attention and Federal controls. This became increasingly clear at the hearings. Three former PCP users testified about the dangers of PCP and how easily one can obtain the drug. A convicted PCP manufacturer who is currently serving time in Federal prison, described the ease with which PCP is made and the enormous profit that can be realized with a small investment.

Researchers, treatment professionals and law enforcement personnel testified about the widespread and growing use of PCP, especially among our Nation's youth, and cited examples of the bizarre and violent behavior which can be attributed to its use. We also heard from the administration about current efforts with respect to prevention and education, treatment and rehabilitation, and Federal law enforcement activity related to PCP. Finally, we were pleased to have the benefit of testimony from Mr. BENTSEN, the author of S. 2778, the PCP Criminal Law and Procedures Act of 1978.

This bill would increase the penalties for PCP trafficking and require reporting of the sale or transfer of piperidine, an essential ingredient of PCP. I am pleased to be a cosponsor of this bill, and commend Senator BENTSEN for his fine efforts.

Based in large part on the testimony received during the hearings, Senator CULVER and I offered an amendment to S. 2778 to strengthen that bill. Entitled the "Drug Abuse Control Act of 1978", it revised the penalty structure for the unauthorized manufacture or distribution of PCP contained in S. 2778, so that it is in conformity with the Controlled Substances Act. It also revised the provision in S. 2778 requiring reporting of transfers or sales of piperidine to require reporting within 7 days instead of 30 days This would make it easier for law enforcement personnel to track down the substance should there be suspicion of improper use.

Controlling PCP is more difficult than controlling most abused drugs because it is composed of readily available licit chemicals which are used for legitimate industrial purposes. However, if we can get a handle on piperidine, an essential ingredient of PCP, then we should be able to get PCP under control. The Drug Abuse Control Act of 1978 attempts to do just that.

I was pleased to learn that the Subcommittee on Juvenile Delinquency of the Judiciary Committee incorporated this amendment as a substitute to S. 2778 during its deliberations last week.

Because of the urgent need to put a stop to the PCP problem, it is essential that we move this legislation forward as quickly as possible. Mr. BENTSEN is attempting to do so by offering S. 2778, as reported by the Subcommittee on Juvenile Delinquency, as an amendment to S. 2399. I strongly urge my colleagues to support this measure.

Mr. CULVER. Mr. President, the Bentsen amendment is acceptable. It has been cleared by the minority, and I ask unanimous consent that it be adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The amendment is agreed to.

Mr. CULVER. Mr. President, I yield to the distinguished Senator from Georgia (Mr. NUNN) for the presentation of another amendment.

I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. McINTYRE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. CULVER. Mr. President, I yield to Senator NUNN for the presentation of another amendment.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1527

Mr. NUNN. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Georgia (Mr. NUNN) proposes unprinted amendment numbered 1527.

Mr. NUNN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

At the end of the bill add the following new title:

TITLE III—FORFEITURE OF PROCEEDS OF ILLEGAL DRUG TRANSACTIONS

SEC. 201. Section 511 of the Comprehensive Drug Abuse Prevention and Control Act of 1970 (21 U.S.C. 881) is amended—

(a) by adding at the end of subsection (a) the following new paragraph:

"(6) Any moneys, negotiable instruments, securities, and other things of value furnished or intended to be furnished by any person in exchange for a controlled substance in violation of this title or title III." and

(b) by adding after the words "Whenever property" in subsection (e) the words "described in subsections (a)(1) through (a)(5)"; and

(c) by adding a new subsection (h) at the end thereof as follows:

"(h) Whenever property described in subsection (a) (6) is forfeited for violation of this title or title III, the Attorney General, making due provision for the rights of any innocent person—

"(1) may dispose of property other than moneys, negotiable instruments, and securities in the manner set forth in subsection (e);

"(2) may dispose of negotiable instruments and securities in the manner prescribed in subsection (e)(2); and

"(3) shall forward currency obtained from sales pursuant to paragraph (2) and moneys forfeited under subsection (a)(6) to the Treasure of the United States for deposit in the general fund of the United States Treasury.".

Mr. NUNN. Mr. President, almost 8 years ago the Nixon administration declared an "all out war" on illegal drugs. In October 1972, during the heat of the Presidential campaign, he even went so far as to declare victory—saying we have "turned the corner" in the fight against drug abuse. He was mistaken. After declaring victory, Mr. Nixon created a new Federal agency, the Drug Enforcement Administration, as the vehicle to capitalize upon and preserve that "success." Until recently, we were losing the battles as well as the war. Even today, drug abuse is still one of the most serious and tragic problems facing our country—costing the Federal Government alone over three-quarters of a billion dollars in 1976 to combat the problem—up from $82 million in 1969. The number of addicts has a little over doubled—but the Federal budget has increased almost tenfold.

We can no longer look solely to the Drug Enforcement Administration. Under the leadership of Mr. Peter Bensinger, it is doing its part—make no mistake, it can do more—but narcotics agents and prosecuting attorneys alike are frustrated by low bail, light sentences, early parole, and the inability to seize the proceeds of narcotic trafficking.

The Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations, which I am vice chairman, has held literally weeks of hearings over the past 3 years probing the effectiveness of our Federal narcotics enforcement efforts and identifying means whereby these efforts could be made more effective.

The criminal justice system can only be effective if there is a meaningful deterrent. It is important that the offender be aware of the risk he is running. In today's narcotic traffic the profits to be made are astronomical. The penalties are not so substantial; the deterrent is likewise minimal, mainly because of the present sentencing and bail provisions. I have urged repeatedly that these needs be addressed. Additionally, deterrence is minimized because it is difficult to attack an individual's sources of finance for narcotics trafficking. We cannot forget that profit, astronomical profit, is the base motivation of drug traffickers. The amendment I propose here today is intended to enhance the efforts to reduce the flow of illicit drugs in the United States by striking out against the profits from illicit drug trafficking.

Specifically, the amendment would provide for the seizure and forfeiture of moneys, negotiable instruments, and securities furnished or intended to be furnished in exchange for controlled substances.

Due to recent restrictions of the Internal Revenue Service which ended the practice of immediately terminating a drug trafficker's taxable year to allow effective "jeopardy assessments," Drug Enforcement Administration agents have been compelled to return seized money to defendants even though it has been apparent the money is the profit from illicit drug trafficking or has been used or intended to be used in drug trafficking. Moreover, returned money has been used by defendants to replenish their stock of drugs that were seized at the time of arrest. The proposed amendment would enable the Drug Enforcement Administration and the U.S. attorneys to immediately begin forfeiture proceedings against money furnished or intended to be furnished in illicit drug transactions in the same fashion that such proceedings are now used against all types of conveyances, equipment, products, and drugs used in violation of the Controlled Substances Act. Thus, the punitive and deterrent purposes of the Controlled Substances Act would have greater impact on drug trafficking.

I have discussed this amendment with Senator CULVER from Iowa, and I want to commend him for his tireless efforts in this overall area to improve the state of law enforcement. I believe the enactment of this amendment would be a significant step forward in our journey toward eliminating illicit drug trafficking, and I ask my colleagues to support the amendment.

Mr. President, I have a modification to the amendment. We are in the process of discussing that modification at the moment. I am also hopeful it is going to be acceptable to the managers of the bill on the majority and minority side.

Without offering that modification, I will simply recite it right now. At the end of the amendment what I would propose is to add the words "all proceeds directly traceable to such an exchange, except that no proceeds shall be subject to forfeiture under this section by reason of any act or omission established by the owner thereof to have been committed or omitted without his knowledge or consent."

That would be the modification that I would not propose until we determine whether it is acceptable by the majority and the minority, but I would hope the amendment, with or without the modification, would be acceptable.

I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceded to call the roll.

Mr. NUNN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. NUNN. Mr. President, I have checked with the senior Senator from Maryland (Mr. MATHIAS) and also with Senator CULVER, both the minority and majority, about the modification. Of course, I understand I have the right to modify the amendment, but I wanted to make certain.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has that right.

Mr. NUNN. The modification was acceptable to both sides, so I would offer the following modification: After the word "and" in the amendment which is pending, I would add the following language:

all proceeds directly traceable to such an exchange, except that no proceeds shall be subject to forfeiture under this section by reason of any act or omission established by the owner thereof to have been committed or omitted without his knowledge or consent.

And then further modify it by deleting in line 2 of the amendment, after the word "value", the remainder of that line and the first word in the next line.

Mr. President, to assist our able clerk, I send the modification to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk would appreciate that and the amendment will be so modified.

The amendment, as modified, is as follows:

SECTION 1. The bill is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new title:

"TITLE III—FORFEITURE OF PROCEEDS OF ILLEGAL DRUG TRANSACTIONS

SEC. 301. Section 511 of the Comprehensive Drug Abuse Prevention and Control Act of 1970 (21 U.S.C. 881) is amended—

"(a) by adding at the end of subsection (a) the following new paragraph:

"(6) Any moneys, negotiable instruments, securities, and other things of value intended to be furnished by any person in exchange for a controlled substance in violation of this title or title III, and all proceeds directly traceable to such an exchange except that no proceeds shall be subject to forfeiture under this section by reason of any act or omission established by the owner thereof to have been committed or omitted without his knowledge or consent and

(b) by adding after the words "Whenever property" in subsection (e) the words "described in subsections (a)(1) through (a)(5)"; and

(c) by adding a new subsection (h) at the end thereof as follows:

"(h) Whenever property described in subsection (a)(6) is forfeited for violation of this title or title III, the Attorney General making due provision for the rights of any innocent person—

"(1) may dispose of property other than moneys, negotiable instruments, and securities in the manner set forth in subsection (e);

"(2) may dispose of negotiable instruments and securities in the manner prescribed in subsection (e)(2); and

"(3) shall forward currency obtained from sales pursuant to paragraph (2) and moneys forfeited under subsection (a)(6) to the Treasurer of the United States for deposit in the general fund of the United States Treasury.".

Mr. NUNN. Mr. President, I hope the amendment, as modified, will be acceptable to the management.

Mr. CULVER. Mr. President, this amendment would increase the ability of Federal authorities to seize the proceeds of illegal drug transactions, including any moneys or properties furnished in exchange for and in many cases moneys or properties generated by trade in narcotics or other dangerous drugs. It is acceptable to me, and it has been cleared by the minority. At this point I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a section-by-section analysis of the amendment as modified.

There being no objection, the analysis was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ANALYSIS

Section 201(a) of the amendment would amend Section 511 of the Comprehensive Drug Abuse Prevention and Control Act of 1970 (21 U.S.C. 881) to permit the forfeiture of any moneys, negotiable instruments, securities, and any other things of value intended to be furnished by any person in exchange for a controlled substance in violation of this title or title III and all proceeds directly traceable to such an exchange except that no proceeds directly traceable to such exchange shall be subject to forfeiture by reason of any act or omission established by an owner thereof to have been committed or omitted without his knowledge or consent.

While this section broadens existing forfeiture law to enable federal authorities to reach the consideration used or intended to be used in illegal drug transactions or any proceeds directly traceable to such transactions, it specifically safeguards the rights of innocent persons. The descriptive terms of consideration are defined as follows:

(1) "Monies" means officially issued coin and currency of the United States or any foreign country; (2) "Negotiable instruments" means that which can be legally transferred to another party by endorsement or delivery; and (3) "Securities" refers to any stocks, bonds, notes or other evidences of debt or property:

Section 201(b) is simply a clarifying amendment.

Section 201(b) provides that property forfeited pursuant to Section 201(a) would be disposed of by the Attorney General in accordance with existing law and with due regard for the rights of any innocent persons involved. Subsection(b)(3) of Section 201 also provides that the Attorney General shall cause to be deposited in the general fund of the United States Treasury all monies forfeited pursuant to Section 201(a) and all currency derived from the sale of forfeited negotiable instruments and securities.

Mr. CULVER. The purpose of the proposed amendment is to help combat the flow of illicit drugs in the United States by striking at profits from illicit drug trafficking. The Drug Enforcement Administration estimates that the value of the illicit drugs sold in the United States each year ranges between $18–20 billion. Often illegal transactions in such drugs involve transfers of several hundred thousand dollars. Under current law, however, Federal officers are frequently required to return such moneys to individuals arrested on drug charges even though such moneys were used in illegal drug transactions. In fact in many cases these returned funds are used by defendants to replenish their stock of drugs.

In certain cases it is possible to seize moneys or other proceeds of illegal drug transactions under the tax laws or the RICO statute. Both of these procedures, however, require a great deal of investigation and preparation before an effective seizure and forfeiture can be made. As a result they are very seldom used to seize moneys or other proceeds that have been used or are intended for use in illegal drug transactions.

The proposed amendment, on the other hand, would allow Federal officers to seize any moneys, negotiable instruments, securities and other things of value if such property is furnished or intended to be furnished in exchange for illegal drugs. It would also authorize the seizure of any proceeds that are directly traceable to such an exchange of illegal drugs.

The proposed amendment differs from title III of S. 1722 which was recently considered by the Juvenile Delinquency Subcommittee. In the subcommittee, concerns were expressed over the breadth of the provisions of title III of S. 1722. Specifically, it was noted that the original language could have been construed to reach properties traceable to the illegal proceeds but obtained by an innocent party without knowledge of the manner in which the proceeds were obtained. The original language is modified in the proposed amendment in order to protect the individual who obtains ownership of proceeds with no knowledge of the illegal transaction.

It is believed that seizures and forfeitures under the proposed amendment would help to disrupt drug trafficking by greatly raising the risk of such trafficking, reducing the profits involved, and immobilizing certain drug rings by seizing large amounts of their assets.

Under the current provisions of 21 U.S.C. 881 as adopted in 1970, the Attorney General may seize and cause to be forfeited certain types of property if such property is used, or intended for use, in illegal drug transactions. The types of property covered under the current law include drugs, raw materials and equipment used in manufacturing drugs, property used to contain or conceal drugs, vehicles used to transport drugs, and any records, books of formulas related to the drugs, or drug transactions.

Under the proposed amendment, the Attorney General would also be able to seize and cause to be forfeited any monies, negotiable instruments, securities or other things of value that are furnished or intended to be furnished in exchange for illegal drugs or any proceeds of such an exchange. In the majority of cases such moneys (or the proceeds of forfeiture sales of negotiable instruments, securities or other property) would be deposited in the general fund of the U.S. Treasury. In the case of property other than moneys, negotiable instruments or securities, however, the Attorney General would have the option of retaining the property for official use, transferring it to an appropriate agency, destroying such property if it is deemed to be harmful to the public, or selling such property and depositing the proceeds of such sale into the general fund of the U.S. Treasury.

Under section 881(d) of the existing law, all such seizures and forfeitures would have to conducted in accordance with certain laws and procedures that govern seizures and forfeitures for violations of the customs laws. (19 U.S.C. 1604–1620). Under these provisions, the Attorney General would be able to dispose of property with a value of $2,500 or less through an administrative forfeiture procedure, but would have to seek a judicial forfeiture for property valued in excess of $2.500. The existing customs laws also provide for certain time limits for parties to file claims to any seized property, the remission or mitigation of forfeitures, the compromise of claims, and the award of compensation to informers.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Nunn amendment as modified be adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as modified. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. CULVER. Mr. President, I do not believe there are any further amendments. Does the Senator from Georgia wish to speak further?

Mr. NUNN. No; the only thing I would say is that, at the request of Senator MATHIAS and Senator WALLOP's staff, we did add a provision in the modification to make it clear that a bona fide party who has no knowledge or consent to the property he owns having been derived from an illegal transaction, that party would be able to establish that fact under this amendment and forfeiture would not occur.

That is the purpose of the wording added to the modification, in addition to some other wording in the modification making the amendment broader than it otherwise would have been.

I thank my colleague from Iowa for the time and effort he has put forth on this bill, and for his extraordinary patience in waiting so that we could work this matter out, particularly at the end of a long, hard day. Having been with the Senator from Iowa on the Armed Services Committee conference for hours and hours today, his patience is not only commendable but it is appreciated.

Mr. CULVER. Mr. President, I wish to express my appreciation and admiration to the distinguished Senator from Georgia for his leadership in this whole area of drug enforcement. He has been interested in and worked hard on this issue for a very considerable time, and his contributions, have been invaluable in bringing about the most effective possible effort to combat this extremely dangerous problem to our national life. I commend him and I also wish to express my appreciation for his recent additional clarification, for purposes of legislative history of the intent of his amendment-as-modified which has just been approved by the Senate.

Mr. President, I do not believe there are any further amendments. If not, I ask that the bill be read the third time, and I would move for passage.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for third reading, and was read the third time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill having been read the third time, the question is, shall it pass?

The bill (S. 2399) was passed, as follows:

S. 2399

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Psychotropic Substances Act of 1978".

TITLE I—ENABLING PROVISIONS FOR THE CONVENTION ON PSYCHOTROPIC SUBSTANCES

SEC. 101. The Congress makes the following findings and declarations:

(1) The Congress has long recognized the danger involved in the manufacture, distribution, and use of certain psychotropic substances for nonscientific and nonmedical purposes, and has provided strong and effective legislation to control illicit trafficking and to regulate legitimate uses of psychotropic substances in this country. Abuse of psychotropic substances has become a phenomenon common to many countries, however, and is not confined to national borders. It is, therefore, essential that the United States cooperate with other nations in establishing effective controls over international traffic in such substances.

(2) The United States has joined with other countries in executing an international treaty, entitled the Convention on Psychotropic Substances and signed at Vienna, Austria, on February 21, 1971, which is designed to establish suitable controls over the manufacture, distribution, transfer, and use of certain psychotropic substances. The Convention is not self-executing, and the obligations of the United States thereunder may only be performed pursuant to appropriate legislation. It is the intent of the Congress that the amendments made by this Act, together wih existing law, will enable the United States to meet all of its obligations under the Convention and that no further legislation will be necessary for that purpose.

(3) In implementing the Convention on Psychotropic Substances, the Congress intends that, consistent with the obligations of the United States under the Convention, control of psychotropic substances in the United States should be accomplished within the framework of the procedures and criteria for classification of substances provided in the Comprehensive Drug Abuse Prevention and Control Act of 1970. This will insure that (A) the availability of psychotropic substances to manufacturers, distributors, dispensers, and researchers for useful and legitimate medical and scientific purposes will not be unduly restricted; (B) nothing in the Convention will interfere with bona fide research activities; and (C) nothing in the Convention will interfere with ethical medical practice in this country as determined by the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare on the basis of a consensus of the views of the American medical and scientific community.

SEC. 102. (a) Subsection (d) of section 201 of the Controlled Substances Act (21 U.S.C. 811(d)) is amended by inserting "(1)" after "(d)" and by adding the following new paragraphs at the end thereof:

"(2)(A) Whenever the Secretary of State receives notification from the Secretary General of the United Nations that information has been transmitted by or to the World Health Organization, pursuant to article 2 of the Convention on Psychotropic Substances, which may justify adding a drug or other substance to one of the schedules of the Convention, transferring a drug or substance from one schedule to another, or deleting it from the schedules, the Secretary of State shall immediately transmit the notice to the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare who shall publish it in the Federal Register and provide opportunity to interested persons to submit to him comments respecting the scientific and medical evaluations which he is to prepare respecting such drug or substance. The Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare shall prepare for transmission through the Secretary of State to the World Health Organization such medical and scientific evaluations as may be appropriate regarding the possible action that could be proposed by the World Health Organization respecting the drug or substance with respect to which a notice was transmitted under this subparagraph.

"(B) Whenever the Secretary of State receives information that the Commission on Narcotic Drugs of the United Nations proposes to decide whether to add a drug or other substance to one of the schedules of the Convention, transfer a drug or substance from one schedule to another, or delete it from the schedules, the Secretary of State shall transmit timely notice to the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare of such information who shall publish a summary of such information in the Federal Register and provide opportunity to interested persons to submit to him comments respecting the recommendation which he is to furnish, pursuant to this subparagraph, respecting such proposal. The Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare shall evaluate the proposal and furnish a recommendation to the Secretary of State which shall be binding on the representative of the United States in discussions and negotiations relating to the proposal.

"(3) When the United States receives notification of a scheduling decision pursuant to article 2 of the Convention on Psychotropic Substances that a drug or other substance has been added or transferred to a schedule specified in the notification or receives notification (referred to in this subsection as a 'schedule notice') that existing legal controls applicable under this title to a drug or substance and the controls required by the Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act do not meet the requirements of the schedule of the Convention in which such drug or substance has been placed, the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare, after consultation with the Attorney General, shall first, determine whether existing legal controls under this title applicable to the drug or substance and the controls required by the Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act, meet the requirements of the schedule specified in the notification or schedule notice and shall take the following action:

"(A) If such requirements are met by such existing controls but the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare nonetheless believes that more stringent controls should be applied to the drug or substance, the Secretary shall recommend to the Attorney General that he initiate proceedings for scheduling the drug or substance, pursuant to subsections (a) and (b) of this section, to apply such controls.

"(B) If such requirements are not met by such existing controls and the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare concurs in the scheduling decision or scheduling notice transmitted by the notification, the Secretary shall recommend to the Attorney General that he initiate proceedings for scheduling the drug or substance under the appropriate schedule pursuant to subsections (a) and (b) of this section.

"(C) If such requirements are not met by such existing controls and the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare does not concur in the scheduling decision or schedule notice transmitted by the notification, the Secretary shall—

"(i) if he deems that additional controls are necessary to protect the public health and safety, recommend to the Attorney General that he initiate proceedings for scheduling the drug or substance, pursuant to subsections (a) and (b) of this section, to apply such additional controls;

"(ii) request the Secretary of State to transmit a notice of qualified acceptance, within the period specified in the Convention, pursuant to paragraph 7 of article 2 of the Convention, to the Secretary-General of the United Nations;

"(iii) request the Secretary of State to transmit a notice of qualified acceptance as prescribed in clause (ii) and request the Secretary of State to ask for a review by the Economic and Social Council of the United Nations, in accordance with paragraph 8 of article 2 of the Convention, of the scheduling decision; or

(iv) in the case of a schedule notice, request the Secretary of State to take appropriate action under the Convention to initiate proceedings to remove the drug or substance from the schedules under the Convention or to transfer the drug or substance to a schedule under the Convention different from the one specified in the schedule notice.

"(4)(A) If the Attorney General determines, after consultation with the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare, that proceedings initiated under recommendations made under subparagraph (B) or (C)(i) of paragraph (3) will not be completed within the time period required by paragraph 7 of article 2 of the Convention, the Attorney General, after consultation with the Secretary and after providing interested persons opportunity to submit comments respecting the requirements of the temporary order to be issued under this sentence, shall issue a temporary order controlling the drug or substance under schedule IV or V, whichever is most appropriate to carry out the minimum United States obligations under paragraph 7 of article 2 of the Convention. As a part of such order, the Attorney General shall, after consultation with the Secretary, except such drug or substance from the application of any provision of part C of this title which he finds is not required to carry out the United States obligations under paragraph 7 of article 2 of the Convention. In the case of proceedings initiated under subparagraph (B) of paragraph (3), the Attorney General, concurrently with the issuance of such order, shall request the Secretary of State to transmit a notice of qualified acceptance to the Secretary-General of the United Nations pursuant to paragraph 7 of article 2 of the Convention. A temporary order issued under this subparagraph controlling a drug or other substance subject to proceedings initiated under subsections (a) and (b) of this section shall expire upon the effective date of the application to the drug or substance of the controls resulting from such proceedings.

"(B) After a notice of qualified acceptance of a scheduling decision with respect to a drug or other substance is transmitted to the Secretary-General of the United Nations in accordance with clause (ii) or (iii) of paragraph (3)(C) or after a request has been made under clause (iv) of such paragraph with respect to a drug or substance described in a schedule notice, the Attorney General, after consultation with the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare and after providing interested persons opportunity to submit comments respecting the requirements of the order to be issued under this sentence, shall issue an order controlling the drug or substance under schedule IV or V, whichever is most appropriate to carry out the minimum United States obligations under paragraph 7 of article 2 of the Convention in the case of a drug or substance for which a notice of qualified acceptance was transmitted or whichever the Attorney General determines is appropriate in the case of a drug or substance described in a schedule notice. As a part of such order, the Attorney General shall, after consultation with the Secretary, except such drug or substance from the application of any provision of part C of this title which he finds is not required to carry out the United States obligations under paragraph 7 of article 2 of the Convention. If, as a result of a review under paragraph 8 of article 2 of the Convention of the scheduling decisions with respect to which a notice of qualified acceptance was transmitted in accordance with clause (ii) or (iii) of paragraph (3)(C)—

"(i) the decision is reversed, and

"(ii) the drug or substance subject to such decision is not required to be controlled under schedule IV or V to carry out the minimum United States obligations under paragraph 7 of article 2 of the Convention, the order issued under this subparagraph with respect to such drug or substance shall expire upon receipt by the United States of the review decision. If, as a result of action taken pursuant to action initiated under a request transmitted under clause (iv) of paragraph (3)(C), the drug or substance with respect to which such action was taken is not required to be controlled under schedule IV or V, the order issued under this paragraph with respect to such drug or substance shall expire upon receipt by the United States of a notice of the action taken with respect to such drug or substance under the Convention.

"(C) An order issued under subparagraph (A) or (B) may be issued without regard to the findings required by subsection (a) of this section or by section 202(b) and without regard to the procedures prescribed by subsection (a) or (b) of this section.

"(5) Nothing in the amendments made by the Psychotropic Substances Act of 1978 or the regulations or orders promulgated thereunder shall be construed to preclude requests by the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare or the Attorney General through the Secretary of State, pursuant to article 2 or other applicable provisions of the Convention, for review of scheduling decisions under such Convention, based on new or additional information.".

(b) Section 102 of the Controlled Substances Act (21 U.S.C. 802) is amended by adding at the end the following:

"(29) The term 'Convention on Psychotropic Substances' means the Convention on Psychotropic Substances signed at Vienna, Austria, on February 21, 1971; and the term 'Single Convention on Narcotic Drugs' means the Single Convention on Narcotic Drugs signed at New York, New York, on March 30, 1961.".

(c) For the purpose of carrying out the minimum United States obligations under paragraph 7 of article 2 of the Convention on Psychotropic Substances, signed at Vienna, Austria, on February 21, 1971, with respect to pipradrol and SPA (also known as (-)-1-dimethylamino-1, 2-diphenylethane), the Attorney General shall by order, made without regard to sections 201 and 202 of the Controlled Substances Act, place such drugs in schedule IV of such Act.

SEC. 103. Subsection (d) of section 202 of the Controlled Substances Act (21 U.S.C. 812(d)) is amended by striking out "and" before "(2)" and by adding the following before the period at the end thereof: ", and (3) such exception does not conflict with United States obligations under the Convention on Psychotropic Substances".

SEC. 104. Section 307 of the Controlled Substances Act (21 U.S.C. 827) is amended by redesignating subsection (e) as subsection (f) and by inserting after subsection (d) the following new subsection:

"(e) In addition to the reporting and recordkeeping requirements under any other provision of this title, each manufacturer registered under section 303 shall, with respect to narcotic and nonnarcotic controlled substances manufactured by it, make such reports to the Attorney General, and maintain such records, as the Attorney General may require to enable the United States to meet its obligations under articles 19 and 20 of the Single Convention on Narcotic Drugs and article 16 of the Convention on Psychotropic Substances. The Attorney General shall administer the requirements of this subsection in such a manner as to avoid the unnecessary imposition of duplicative requirements under this title on manufacturers subject to the requirements of this subsection.".

SEC. 105. Section 1002(b) of the Controlled Substances Import and Export Act (21 U.S.C. 952(b)) is amended by inserting immediately before the period at the end of paragraph (2) the following: ", except that if a nonnarcotic controlled substance in schedule III, IV, or V is also listed in schedule I or II of the Convention on Psychotropic Substances it shall be imported pursuant to such import permit requirements, prescribed by regulation of the Attorney General, as are required by the Convention".

SEC. 106. Subsection (e) of section 1003 of the Controlled Substances Import and Export Act (21 U.S.C. 953(e)) is amended—

(1) by striking out ", and" at the end of paragraph (2) and inserting in lieu thereof a semicolon;

(2) by striking out the period at the end of paragraph (3) and inserting in lieu thereof "; and"; and

(3) by adding the following new paragraph:

"(4) in any case when a nonnarcotic controlled substance in schedule III, IV, or V is also listed in schedule I or II of the Convention on Psychotropic Substances, it is exported pursuant to such export permit requirements, prescribed by regulation of the Attorney General, as are required by the Convention, instead of the invoice required by paragraphs (2) and (3) of this subsection.".

SEC. 107. (a) Part D of the Controlled Substances Act (21 U.S.C. 841 et seq.) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"APPLICATION OF TREATIES AND OTHER INTERNATIONAL AGREEMENTS

"SEC. 412. Nothing in the Single Convention on Narcotic Drugs, the Convention on Psychotropic Substances, or other treaties or international agreements shall be construed to limit the provision of treatment, education, or rehabilitation as alternatives to conviction or criminal penalty for offenses involving any drug or other substance subject to control under any such treaty or agreement.".

(b) The table of contents of the Comprehensive Drug Abuse Prevention and Control Act of 1970 is amended by inserting—

"Sec. 412. Application of treaties and other international agreements."

immediately after

"Sec. 411. Proceedings to establish previous convictions.".

SEC. 108. (a) Section 502 of the Controlled Substances Act (21 U.S.C. 872) is amended by redesignating subsection (d) as subsection (e), and by adding after subsection (c) the following new subsection:

"(d) Nothing in the Single Convention on Narcotic Drugs, the Convention on Psychotropic Substances, or other treaties or international agreements shall be construed to limit, modify, or prevent the protection of the confidentiality of patient records or of the names and other identifying characteristics of research subjects as provided by any Federal, State, or local law or regulation.".

(b) Section 303 of the Public Health Service Act (42 U.S.C. 242a) is amended by redesignating subsection (b) as subsection (c), and by adding after subsection (a) the following new subsection:

"(b) Nothing in the Single Convention on Narcotic Drugs, the Convention on Psychotropic Substances, or other treaties or international agreements shall be construed to limit, modify, or prevent the protection of the confidentiality of patient records or of the names and other identifying characteristics of research subjects as provided by any Federal, State, or local law or regulation.".

SEC. 109. Subsection (f) of section 303 of the Controlled Substances Act (21 U.S.C. 823(f)) is amended by adding at the end the following sentence: "Article 7 of the Convention on Psychotropic Substances shall not be construed to prohibit, or impose additional restrictions upon, research involving drugs or other substances scheduled under the Convention which is conducted in conformity with this subsection and other applicable provisions of this title.".

SEC. 110. Subsection (c) of section 307 of the Controlled Substances Act (21 U.S.C. 827(c)) is amended by adding the following after and below paragraph (3): "Nothing in the Convention on Psychotropic Substances shall be construed as superseding or otherwise affecting the provisions of paragraph (1)(B), (2), or (3) of this subsection.".

SEC. 111. Subsection (n) of section 502 of the Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act (21 U.S.C. 352(n)) is amended by adding the following new sentence at the end thereof: "Nothing in the Convention on Psychotropic Substances, signed at Vienna, Austria, on February 21, 1971, shall be construed to prevent drug price communications to consumers.".

SEC. 112. This title and the amendments made by this title shall take effect on the date the Convention on Psychotropic Substances, signed at Vienna, Austria, on February 21, 1971, enters into force in respect to the United States.

TITLE II—PCP CRIMINAL PENALTIES AND PIPERIDINE REPORTING

SEC. 201. Subsection (b) of section 401 of the Controlled Substances Act (21 U.S.C. 841(b)) is amended—

(a) by inserting after the phrase "such person shall" in the first sentence of paragraph (1)(B) the following: ", except as provided in paragraphs (4) and (5) of this subsection,", and

(b) by adding after paragraph (4) the following new paragraph:

"(5) Notwithstanding paragraph (1)(B) of this subsection, any person who violates subsection (a) of this section by manufacturing, distributing, or possessing with intent to manufacture or distribute, except as authorized by this title or title III, phencyclidine, shall be sentenced to a term of imprisonment of not more than 10 years, a fine of not more than $25,000, or both. If any person commits such a violation after one or more prior convictions of him for an offense punishable under paragraph (1)(B) of this section or for a felony under any other provision of this title or title III or other law of the United States relating to narcotic drugs, marihuana, or depressant or stimulant substances, have become final, such person shall be sentenced to a term of imprisonment of not more than 20 years, a fine of not more than $50,000, or both. Any sentence imposing a term of imprisonment under this paragraph shall, in the absence of such a prior conviction, impose a special parole term of at least 2 years in addition to such term of imprisonment and shall, if there was such a prior conviction, impose a special parole term of at least 4 years in addition to such term of imprisonment. For the purposes of this paragraph, 'phencyclidine' means 1-(1-phenylcyclohexyl) piperidine, its salts and any analog, derivative, or variant of 1-(1-phenylcyclohexyl) piperidine that is in a schedule pursuant to section 202 of this title.".

SEC. 202. The Controlled Substances Act (Subchapter I of chapter 13 of title 21 of the United States Code) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new part:

"PART H—PIPERIDINE REPORTING

"§ 800. Reporting requirement

"(a) It shall be unlawful—

"(1) For any person to sell, transfer, or otherwise furnish any piperidine unless such person reports such sale, transfer, or exchange to the Attorney General pursuant to regulations promulgated under section 801.

"(2) For any person to sell, transfer, or otherwise furnish any piperidine unless the purchaser, transferee, or other recipient of such piperidine presents positive personal identification pursuant to regulations promulgated by the Attorney General under section 801.

"(3) For any importer of piperidine to receive piperidine without reporting such receipt to the Attorney General pursuant to regulations promulated under section 801.

"(b) The provisions of paragraph (a) of this section shall not apply to—

"(1) Intracompany sales or transfers of piperidine.

"(2) A common or contract carrier or warehouseman, or an employee thereof, whose possession of piperidine is solely for the purpose of transporting such substance in the usual course of his business or employment; Provided, That the Attorney General may require any such carrier or warehouseman to retain and report any shipping documents for such substance.

"§ 801. Nature of reports

"(a) Any person required to submit a report pursuant to section 800 shall submit such report on a common reporting form to be issued in blank by the Attorney General.

"(b) Such reporting form shall contain information as to—

"(1) The quantity and form of the piperidine sold, imported, transferred, or otherwise furnished.

"(2) The date the piperidine was sold, imported, transferred, or otherwise furnished.

"(3) The name, address, and age of any individual who purchases, imports, or otherwise receives such piperidine.

"(4) The type of identification presented by the individual purchaser, importer, or other transferee.

"(5) The name and address of any business entity that purchases, imports, or otherwise receives piperidine, including the name, address, and title of the employee placing the order for purchase, import, or other receipt of piperidine for such business entity.

"(6) The purpose of such purchase, importation, or transfer, including a description of the intended usage of such piperidine. This requirement shall not apply to quarterly reports authorized by the Attorney General under section 802(b).

"(7) The date and manner that such piperidine was shipped or otherwise transferred and the address of the destination of any such shipment or transfer.

"(8) Such other information, including that necessary for establishing positive, buyer or transferee identification, as the Attorney General may deem necessary for the enforcement of this part.

"(c) The Attorney General is authorized to promulgate such regulations as are necessary for the enforcement of this part.

"(d) Not later than one year after the effective date of this part, the Attorney General shall submit to the President and the Congress an analysis and evaluation of the effectiveness of piperidine reporting in reducing the illicit manufacture of phencyclidine. Such analysis and evaluation shall also contain an assessment of any burden such reporting places on legitimate transactions in and uses of piperidine and such recommendations as the Attorney General deems appropriate.

"§ 802. Filing deadline for reports

"(a) Except as provided in subsections (b) and (c) of this section, any person required to submit a report to the Attorney General pursuant to section 800 shall submit such report within 7 days of the purchase, transfer, importation, or other exchange of piperidine.

"(b) The Attorney General may authorize any person required to submit a report to the Attorney General pursuant to section 800 to submit such report on a quarterly basis with respect to repeated, regular transactions between the furnisher and the recipient if the Attorney General determines that (1) a pattern of regular supply of piperidine exists as between the person who sells, imports, transfers, or otherwise furnishes such piperidine and the recipient of the piperidine and (2) the recipient has established a record of utilization of such piperidine for lawful purposes.

"(c) Any person required to submit a report to the Attorney General pursuant to section 800 within the first 90 days after the enactment of this part may submit such report at any time up to 100 days after the enactment of this part. Such report shall contain the information specified in paragraphs (b)(1) through (b)(7) of section 801.

"§ 803. Retention and inspection of records.

"(a) Any person who sells, imports, transfers, or otherwise furnishes piperidine shall maintain such records as are deemed necessary by the Attorney General to enforce this part. Such records shall be kept and be available, for 2 years, for inspection or copying by officers or employees of the United States authorized by the Attorney General.

"(b) Upon the request of any State or any political subdivision thereof, the Attorney General may make available to such State or any political subdivision thereof, any information which he may obtain by reason of the provisions of this part with respect to identification of persons within such State or political subdivision thereof who have purchased, imported, or otherwise received piperidine together with a description of such piperidine.

"§ 804. Lost or stolen piperidine

"Any person who manufactures, sells, purchases, imports, transports, transfers, or otherwise furnishes or receives piperidine shall report any theft or loss of such piperidine to the Attorney General within 7 days of the actual discovery of such theft or loss. Such reports shall contain such information as the Attorney General may require under regulations promulgated under this part.

"§ 805. False or misleading statements

"It shall be unlawful for any seller, purchaser, importer, transferor, transferee, or other provider or recipient of piperidine to knowingly make any false, oral, or written statement or misrepresentation with respect to information required to be reported pursuant to regulations promulgated under this part or to knowingly omit any material information required to be reported pursuant to regulations promulgated under this part.

"§ 806. Penalties, enforcement

"(a) Whenever it shall appear that any person has violated any provision of section 800, 801, 802, 803, 804, or 805, the Attorney General may bring a civil action for such relief (including injunctions) as may be appropriate.

"(b)(1) Except as provided in paragraph (2), any person who violates section 800, 801, 802, 803, 804, or 805 shall, with respect to any such violation be subject to a civil penalty of not more than $25,000. The district courts of the United States (or, where there is no such court in the case of any territory or possession of the United States, then the court in such territory or possession having the jurisdiction of a district court of the United States in cases arising under the Constitution and laws of the United States) shall have jurisdiction in accordance with section 1355 of title 28 of the United States Code to enforce this paragraph.

"(2)(A) If a violation of section 800, 801, 802, 803, 804, or 805 is prosecuted by an information or indictment which alleges that the violation was committed knowingly and the trier of fact specifically finds that the violation was so committed, such person shall, except as otherwise provided in subparagraph (b)(2)(B) of this section be sentenced to imprisonment of not more than one year or a fine of not more than $25,000, or both.

"(B) If a violation referred to in subparagraph (A) was committed after one or more prior convictions of the offender for an offense punishable under paragraph (2), or for a crime under any other provision of this title or title III or other law of the United States relating to narcotic drugs, marihuana, or depressant or stimulant substances, have become final, such person shall be sentenced to a term of imprisonment of not more than 2 years, a fine of $5,000, or both.

"(3) Except under the conditions specified in paragraph (2) of this subsection, a violation of section 800, 801, 802, 803, 804, or 805 does not constitute a crime, and a judgment for the United States and imposition of a civil penalty pursuant to paragraph (1) of this subsection shall not give rise to any disability or legal disadvantage based on conviction for a criminal offense.

SEC. 807. PROHIBITED TRANSFERS OF PIPERIDINE

"It shall be unlawful for any person to import, purchase, transport, transfer, receive, conceal, store, barter, sell, manufacture, or otherwise furnish or dispose of any piperidine if—

"(a) such person—

"(1) may dispose of property other than moneys negotiable instruments, and securities in the manner set forth in subsection (e);

"(2) may dispose of negotiable instruments and securities in the manner prescribed in subsection (e)(2); and

"(3) shall forward currency obtained from sales pursuant to paragraph (2) and moneys forfeited under subsection (a)(6) to the Treasurer of the United States for deposit in the general fund of the United States Treasury.".

Mr. NUNN. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

Mr. CULVER. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. CULVER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Secretary of the Senate be authorized to make technical and clerical corrections in the engrossment of S. 2399.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

NATIONAL CONSUMER COOPERATIVE BANK ACT—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. McINTYRE. Mr. President, I submit a report of the committee of conference on H.R. 2777 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 2777) to provide for consumers a further means of minimizing the impact of inflation and economic depression by narrowing the price spread between costs to the producer and the consumer of needed goods, services, facilities, and commodities through the development and funding of specialized credit sources for, and technical assistance to, self-help, not-for-profit cooperatives, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses this report, signed by a majority of the conferees.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the conference report.

(The conference report will be printed in the proceedings of the House of Representatives.)

Mr. McINTYRE. Mr. President, I urge the adoption of the conference report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

RECLAMATION SAFETY OF DAMS ACT OF 1978

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, will the Chair state the next order of business?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order of the Senate, the Senate will now proceed to the consideration of S. 2820, which the clerk will state.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

Calendar Order No. 741, a bill (S. 2820) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to construct, restore, operate, and maintain new or modified features at existing Federal reclamation dams for safety of dams purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time for debate on this bill is limited to 1 hour, to be equally divided between and controlled by the Senator from Washington (Mr. JACKSON) and the Senator from Wyoming (Mr. HANSEN), with 30 minutes on any amendment and 15 minutes on any debatable motion, appeal, or point of order.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that no time be charged against this bill today.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I ask unanimous consent that there now be a period for the transaction of routine morning business, with Senators permitted to speak up to 5 minutes each therein.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Chirdon, one of his secretaries.

REPORT OF THE DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORTATION — MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT—PM 202

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, together with an accompanying report, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation:

To the Congress of the United States:

I transmit herewith the Tenth Annual Report of the Department of Transportation. This report has been prepared in accordance with Section II of Public Law 89–670 and covers Fiscal Year 1976.

The Report covers activities of the Department during a period prior to the commencement of my term of office

JIMMY CARTER.

THE WHITE HOUSE, July 27, 1978.

MESSAGES FROM THE HOUSE

At 12:25 p.m., a message from the House of Representatives delivered by Mr. Hackney, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House disagrees to the amendments of the Senate to H.R. 11003, an act to clarify the authority for employment of personnel in the White House Office and the Executive residence at the White House, to clarify the authority for employment of personnel by the President to meet unanticipated needs, and for other purposes; requests a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon; and that Mr. NIX, Mr. UDALL, Mrs. SCHROEDER, and Mr. DERWINSKI were appointed managers of the conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House has agreed to the following concurrent resolution, without amendment:

S. Con. Res. 98. A concurrent resolution relating to adjournment to a date certain during the remainder of the Ninety-fifth Congress.

The message further announced that the House has passed the following bill, in which it requests the concurrence of the Senate:

H.R. 12973. An act to amend title XX of the Social Security Act to increase the entitlement ceiling and otherwise provide for an expanded social services program, to promote consultation and cooperative efforts among States, localities, and other local public and private agencies to coordinate services, to extend certain provisions of Public Law 94–401, and for other services.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED

The following bill was read twice by its title and referred as indicated:

STATEMENTS ON INTRODUCED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

By Mr. BIDEN:

S. 3348. A bill to provide emergency financial assistance to certain States and localities for the construction and modernization of correctional facilities and systems; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

EMERGENCY AID FOR PRISONS

● Mr. BIDEN. Mr. President, I would like to introduce the Emergency State and Local Prison Compliance Assistance Act. This legislation is designed to provide financial assistance to State and local governments for construction of new and renovation of existing correctional institutions in compliance with Federal court decisions declaring existing facilities unfit in their present condition. The funds to be made available are also tied to the establishment of minimum standards to be promulgated in accordance with the provisions of the act. I believe the legislation fills an urgent national need that becomes more critical as each day passes.

This legislation will assist States, like my own, faced with Federal court orders mandating release of hardened prisoners in the face of unconstitutional prison conditions. Delaware is not the only State facing this crisis. There are Federal court orders mandating prisoner release or some form of extensive upgrade of prison conditions in Alabama, Rhode Island, and a host of other States.

As traumatic as these court decisions are, they only recognize what the average citizen knows but most legislators would prefer to ignore. Our Nation's prisons are massively overcrowded, and this overcrowding has a profound effect on the matter in which our system of justice functions. One of the primary roles of the prison system is to protect society by removing the criminal from its midst. Yet, unless we remedy prison overcrowding, we cannot hope to achieve sane and effective crime control.

Judges and prosecutors will openly admit that overcrowding has a devastating effect upon our system of plea bargaining, probation, sentencing, and parole. Plea bargains resulting in probation are indiscriminate. Probation is granted in many cases where incarceration is warranted simply because there is no space available in the jails. Many criminals are not sentenced at all or receive minimal sentences inappropriate to the severity of their offense. Parole release becomes a method of prison population control to the total disregard of the public welfare.

In short, the protection of society, if considered at all is a secondary factor in deciding when and how to reintegrate the convicted criminal into the society he victimized.

Furthermore, overcrowding combined with a lack of funds results in a denial of the minimal physical conditions necessary for human existence. The litany of problems which characterize local jails includes overcrowding, idleness, unsanitary living quarters and dining facilities, substandard diets, decrepit hygiene facilities and inadequate visitation hours and privileges.

Inhumane conditions breed hostility, contempt and unrest. Deplorable conditions are fully capable of turning even a first offender into an embittered, hardened criminal.

As a result, the Federal courts have again jumped into the breach caused by legislative neglect and taken radical, at times disruptive, action. For example, U.S. District Court Judge Frank N. Johnson has ordered the prison system of the State of Alabama to meet specific minimum standards within a specified time or close. His logic is simple: the severe overcrowding and unsanitary conditions in Alabama prisons was evidence of "cruel and unusual punishment" and, consequently, unconstitutional.

U.S. District Court Judge Raymond J. Pettine recently held that Rhode Island's maximum security prison "presents an imminent public health, fire and safety hazard" and ordered the prison closed within a year.

In my own State, U.S. District Court Judge Murray M. Schwartz recently ordered a massive reduction in prison population of the Delaware Correctional Center while pointing out a multitude of problems existing in a 7-year-old facility once touted as a model prison but now termed by the judge a "ticking time bomb".

Case law in other jurisdictions evidences an increasing willingness on the part of the bench to insure that prison operations meet minimally humane requirements. I fear failure to deal with the problem may shortly result in a judicially imposed prohibition on the use of prisons. Judges may in effect outlaw prisons, bringing down the whole criminal justice system.

At the same time that the Federal judges are closing down our prisons because of inhumane conditions, corrections experts have begun to express doubts about what goes on in the name of progressive treatment of offenders. The goal of rehabilitation is increasingly viewed as an improbable, if not impossible, dream.

The statistics are clear. Inmates subjected to programs designed to rehabilitate are as likely to recidivate as others. Study after study, throughout this country and around the world, has concluded that we have not yet learned how to rehabilitate. Worse, yet, there is no apparent yardstick, no foolproof method, to determine when, or even if, rehabilitation has occurred.

Faced with this awareness, is it any wonder that people are demanding that an individual who has committed a crime and is convicted receive his just deserts—that he face cetrain justice?

In an attempt to deal with this growing public awareness and changing public mood, those of us here in the Senate who have been talking about the need to restore the concept of accountability to those convicted of a crime incorporated sentencing guidelines in the revision of the Federal Criminal Code as it passed the Senate. That act, in limiting judicial discretion in sentencing, goes a long way toward answering the public's demand for action at the Federal level. Revising the Federal sentencing judicial discretion in sentencing, the deterrent value of the criminal sanction but will have little immediate impact on the problem to which this bill is addressed. First, sentencing reform on the Federal level can at best only serve as a model for State sentencing procedures. Second, "flat-time" sentencing has little positive impact on prison overcrowding except perhaps to exacerbate the problem.

The most positive role we can play on the Federal level is to assist the States with Federal funds in complying with Federal judicial mandates. We cannot, however, simply throw money at this problem. Our authorization of expenditures for correctional improvement of some $700 million over the years 1971–1977 years through the Law Enforcement Assistance Administration has done little to remedy the situation.

Like most LEAA programs the corrections programs lack focus and fails to tie the availability of these funds to mandated standards as well as court decisions to insure results. Furthermore, the LEAA authorizing legislation limits the percentage of a prison construction or modernization project that can be covered by LEAA funds.

The need for mandated minimum standards was pointedly dramatized by a report of the General Accounting Office in April of 1976. It concluded that some jails that had received LEAA funds were nonetheless in such poor condition that they appeared similar to others that had been closed by the courts.

Basically, the legislation I propose today would give States the funds needed for construction of new facilities in compliance with Federal court mandates. Funds would also be available for the cost of modernization projects.

Both construction and modernization would have to conform to a State plan conceived and approved by the agencies and people who represent State and local authorities. Aside from the need to preserve fiscal integrity and to evaluate what has been done, States and local governments are given freedom to fashion remedies for their own needs consistent with the applicable Federal court decision and mandated standards.

This legislation is not a panacea. It is a necessary step toward sound management. Without adequate space—without decent, humane facilities—we can provide no guarantee of accountability.

We cannot continue to allow overcrowding and decay occasioned by inadequate funding to prostitute our system of justice. We must provide humane prisons and we must provide adequate prison space if we are to respond properly to societal demands.●

By Mr. HASKELL (for himself and Mr. HART):

S. 3349. A bill to create the Indian Peaks Wilderness Area and the Arapaho National Recreation Area and to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to study the feasibility of revising the boundaries of the Rocky Mountain National Park, and to add certain lands to the Oregon Islands Wilderness; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

INDIAN PEAKS WILDERNESS AREA AND ARAPAHO NATIONAL RECREATION AREA ACT

● Mr. HASKELL. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation, along with my friend and colleague from Colorado, Senator HART, to grant wilderness protection to the Indian Peaks region along the front range of Colorado. In addition, this bill creates a national recreation area on part of the western slope adjacent to the Indian Peaks and mandates a study to determine the suitability of revising the boundaries of Rocky Mountain National Park to include Indian Peaks.

This area of jagged peaks and alpine lands may be the most spectacular mountain scenery on the front range.

In 1972, Congress passed Public Law 92–528 directing the Secretary of Agriculture to study 71,000 acres in Colorado's Arapaho-Roosevelt National Forest for its possible inclusion in the National Wilderness Preservation System. This area, commonly known as the "Indian Peaks" area, abuts the southern boundary of Rocky Mountain National Park, and is within a 1½–2 hours drive of Denver and the majority of the population of Colorado's front range metropolitan areas. Despite the explosive growth which has occurred in the greater Denver area during the last several decades, the Indian Peaks still retain their primeval wilderness qualities and undeveloped lands of outstanding scenic value, glaciers, numerous pristine streams and lakes, and alpine terrain and vegetation.

As such, the area has become increasingly popular for those seeking a nearby wilderness experience, and represents an outstanding opportunity for Congress to further its goal of protecting wilderness values and establishing wilderness areas in close proximity to major population centers. As with the Sandia Mountain, Lone Peak, and Pusch Ridge Wildernesses, which form the scenic backdrops for Albuquerque, N. Mex., Salt Lake City, Utah, and Tucson, Ariz., respectively, and which were designated wilderness by the 95th Congress, the Indian Peaks area promises to afford a nearby high quality wilderness experience for many urban residents.

At the same time as wilderness use increases, so does the demand for developed and mechanized recreation such as permanent and developed campsites, motorboat use, alpine skiing, and off road vehicle recreation. While most national forest lands are generally available for such uses, sufficient personnel and funding for developed recreation facilities is sometimes lacking, or lags behind demand, especially in a region which is growing as rapidly as Colorado's front range metropolitan areas. To this end, this bill establishes an approximate 32,735-acre Arapaho National Recreation Area immediately west of, and contiguous to, the proposed Indian Peaks Wilderness, and authorizes $5 million for land acquisition and $5 million for water quality and recreation development.

The Forest Service study of the Indian Peaks area has been completed, and the administration has recommended enactment of this legislation with certain boundary adjustments. Specifically, the administration recommended: first, the exclusion from wilderness of some 2,500 acres in the vicinity of Niwot Ridge to facilitate the creation of an international Biosphere Reserve; second, the exclusion from wilderness of some 2,500 acres in the Devil's Thumb area to allow for a potential future winter sports (alpine skiing) site; and third, the addition of 968 acres to the proposed Arapaho National Recreation Area around Willow Creek Reservoir. These boundary adjustments have been incorporated into the bill.

Mining and timber interests have not opposed this legislation because they found the area did not have significant deposits of precious metals or harvestable stands of trees. Hearings in Boulder and Granby demonstrated the wide support for wilderness designation and the establishment of a national recreation area. Colorado's Governor Lamm has strongly endorsed the bill. Hunting, tourist, and most four-wheel-drive interests are all backers.

Boulder and Grand commissioners, as well as representatives from every town affected by the legislation, all support this bill. The U.S. Geological Survey's study of the area shows no evidence of substantial mineral potential in the area. Virtually no chance exists for oil or gas reserves. The area with the most potential for mineral resources is the area surrounding the Boulder watershed—which has been excluded from the bill's boundaries.

I would like to congratulate Representatives TIM WIRTH and JIM JOHNSON for their fine efforts in putting together this balanced piece of legislation. Also, this bill, reported by the House Interior Committee yesterday, was made possible by the extraordinary input from the Wirth Advisory Committee on Indian Peaks. With only their passion to preserve the pristine character of this area, and without monetary compensation, this group of dedicated individuals devoted hundreds of hours to insure the proper balancing of interests and boundaries. The Grand County commissioners, for their initiation of and hard work on the national recreation area proposal, are also major contributors to this bill.

In addition, the bill designates 58 islands and groups of islands within, and administered by, the Oregon Islands Wildlife Refuge, as additions to the National Wilderness Preservation System. This completes action on an administration wilderness proposal which has been before the committee since 1972, and which is endorsed by both Congressmen involved, as well as Oregon's Senators.

The proposed Oregon Islands Wilderness is a haven for hundreds of thousands of petrel, cormorants, murres, puffins, and other sea birds, as well as sea lions, sea otters, and harbor seals. Wilderness will insure that important nesting and breeding sites remain undisturbed and unaltered by man's activities. The islands have no known commercially valuable mineral resources.

Mr. President, this bill is supported by many diverse groups and individuals. The patient and effective working relationships of many Coloradans have made this a desirable and balanced piece of legislation. Wilderness designation of this unique and rugged terrain should no longer be put off to the future. I urge my colleagues to support and consider speedy passage of this worthy legislation.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill and a section-by-section analysis be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill and analysis were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 3349

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Indian Peaks Wilderness Area and Arapaho National Recreation Area Act."

FINDINGS AND PURPOSE

SEC. 2. (a) The Congress finds that it is in the national interest—

(1) to include the land within the Arapaho and the Roosevelt National Forests known as the Indian Peaks Area in the National Wilderness Preservation System so as to protect the area's enduring scenic and historic wilderness character and its unique wildlife and to preserve the area's scientific, educational, recreational, and inspirational resources and challenges; and

(2) to create the Arapaho National Recreation Area within the Arapaho and the Roosevelt National Forests and the Colorado Big Thompson project so as to preserve and protect the natural, scenic, historic, pastoral, and wildlife resources of the area and to enhance the recreational opportunities provided.

INDIAN PEAKS WILDERNESS AREA

SEC. 3. (a) An area of land comprising approximately seventy thousand acres located in Boulder and Grand Counties, within the Arapaho and the Roosevelt National Forests (as generally depicted as the "Indian Peaks Wilderness Area" on a map entitled "Indian Peaks Wilderness Area and Arapaho National Recreation Area", dated July 1978) is designated for purposes of the Wilderness Act (16 U.S.C. 1131–1136) as a wilderness area and shall be known as the Indian Peaks Wilderness Area.

(b) The Indian Peaks Wilderness Area shall be administered by the Secretary of Agriculture (hereafter in this Act referred to as the "Secretary") pursuant to those provisions of the Wilderness Act which govern areas designated by that Act as wilderness areas, except that any reference in such provisions to the effective date of the Wilderness Act shall be deemed to be a reference to the effective date of this Act.

ARAPAHO NATIONAL RECREATION AREA

SEC. 4. (a) An area of land comprising approximately thirty-two thousand seven hundred and thirty five acres located in Grand County, Colorado, within the Arapaho and the Roosevelt National Forests and the Colorado Big Thompson project (as generally depicted as the "Arapaho National Recreation Area" on a map entitled "Indian Peaks Wilderness Area and Arapaho National Recreation Area," dated July 1978) is established as the Arapaho National Recreation Area.

(b) The Secretary shall administer the Arapaho National Recreation Area, in accordance with the laws and regulations applicable to the national forests, in such a manner as will best provide for—

(1) public recreation and enjoyment;

(2) the conservation and development of the scenic, natural, historic, and pastoral values of the area;

(3) the management, utilization, and disposal of natural resources such as timber, grazing, and mineral resources so that their utilization will not substantially impair the purposes for which the recreation area is established; and

(4) the management of water quality in the recreation area consistent with the development of needed water supply and wastewater systems, including the control of aquatic vegetation in the streams, lakes and reservoirs within the recreation area.

(c) The Secretary shall develop an overall management plan for the Arapaho National Recreation Area. This plan shall be developed in consultation with State and local political subdivisions and other interested persons.

ACQUISITION OF LANDS FOR THE ARAPAHO NATIONAL RECREATION AREA

SEC. 5. (a) (1) The Secretary is authorized to acquire by donation, purchase with donated or appropriated funds, exchange, or bequest, any lands or lesser interests therein, including mineral interests and scenic easements, which the Secretary determines are needed to establish and manage the Arapaho National Recreation Area. In determining what private property is needed to establish and manage the Arapaho National Recreation Area, the Secretary shall utilize the approved county zoning plan to identify those properties whose use or intended use is not in conformance with the overall intent of this Act.

(2) As used in this section, the term "scenic easement" means the right to control the use of land in order to carry out this Act, but shall not preclude the continuation of any use that is compatible with the overall management plan for the Arapaho National Recreation Area developed pursuant to subsection (c) of section 4.

(b) In exercising the authority conferred by this section to acquire lands, the Secretary shall give prompt and careful consideration to any offer made by an individual owning any land, or interest in land, within the Arapaho National Recreation Area. In considering any such offer, the Secretary shall take into consideration any hardship to the owner which might result from any undue delay in acquiring the property. Purchases made under this authority shall be made on a willing buyer, willing seller basis.

(c) In exercising the authority conferred by this section to acquire property by exchange, the Secretary may accept title to any non-Federal land or interests therein, located within the Arapaho National Recreation Area, and the Secretary may convey in exchange therefor any federally owned lands or interests in lands within the State of Colorado which is classified by the Secretary as suitable for exchange and which is under the Secretary's administrative jurisdiction. The values of any lands or interests in lands so exchanged shall be approximately equal, or if they are not approximately equal, they shall be equalized by the payment of cash to the grantor or to the Secretary, so long as payment does not exceed 25 per centum of the total value of the land or interest in land. In utilizing cash equalization in changes the Secretary shall try to reduce small an amount as possible. In the exercise the amount of the payment of money to as of his exchange authority, the Secretary may utilize authorities and procedures availab'e to him in making exchanges of national forest lands.

(d) Any land or interest in land owned by the State of Colorado or any of its political subdivisions may be acquired only by donation of exchange.

(e) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, any Federal lands or interests in lands within the Arapaho National Recreation Area shall be transferred without consideration to the administrative jurisdiction of the Secretary for use by the Secretary in carrying out this Act. Lands within the Arapaho National Recreation Area acquired by the Secretary or transferred to the Secretary's administrative jurisdiction shall become part of that recreation area and of the national forest within or adjacent to which they are located, Provided, That the operation and facilities of the Colorado Big Thompson project shall remain under the jurisdiction of the United States Bureau of Reclamation.

HUNTING AND FISHING IN THE ARAPAHO NATIONAL RECREATION AREA

SEC. 6. The Secretary shall permit hunting and fishing on lands and waters under the Secretary's jurisdiction within the boundaries of the Arapaho National Recreation Area in accordance with the laws of the United States and the State of Colorado, except that the Secretary may designate zones where, and establish periods when, no hunting or fishing shall be permitted for reasons of public safety area general administration, or public use and enjoyment. Except in emergencies, any regulations made by the Secretary pursuant to this section shall be put into effect only after consultation with the appropriate State fish and game department.

PERMITS FOR FACILITIES AND SERVICES IN THE ARAPAHO NATIONAL RECREATIONAL AREA

SEC. 7. The Secretary shall cooperate with other Federal agencies, with State and local public agencies, and with private individuals and organizations in the issuance of permits for facilities and services in the Arapaho National Recreation Area and the development and operation of those facilities and services.

APPLICATION OF STATE WATER LAWS TO THE ARAPAHO NATIONAL RECREATIONAL AREA

SEC. 8. The jurisdiction of the State of Colorado and the United States over waters of any stream included in the Arapaho National Recreation Area shall be determined by established principles of law. Any taking by the United States under section 5 of this Act of a water right, which is vested under either State or Federal law immediately prior to the enactment of this Act shall, entitle the owner thereof to just compensation. Nothing in this Act shall constitute an express or implied claim or denial on the part of the Federal Government as to exemption from State water laws.

FILING OF MAPS

SEC. 9. As soon as practicable after the date of enactment of this Act, the Secretary shall file a map and legal description of the Indian Peaks Wilderness Area and the Arapaho National Recreation Area with the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources of the Senate and the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs of the House of Representatives and such description shall have the same force and effect as if included in this Act, except that correction of any clerical or typographical errors in such map and description may be made. Such map and the map entitled "Indian Peaks Wilderness Area and Arapaho National Recreation Area", dated July 1978, shall be on file and made available for public inspection in the office of the Chief of the Forest Service, Department of Agriculture.

STATE CIVIL AND CRIMINAL JURISDICTION

SEC. 10. Nothing in this Act shall diminish, enlarge, or modify any right of the State of Colorado, or any political subdivision thereof, to exercise civil and criminal jurisdiction within the Indian Peaks Wilderness Area or the Arapaho National Recreation Area or of rights to tax persons, franchises, or property, including mineral or other interests, in or on lands or waters within those areas.

AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS

SEC. 11. Effective October 1, 1979, there are authorized to be appropriated to carry out sections 1 thru 10 of this Act $5,000,000 for the acquisition of lands and interests in lands and $5,000,000 for water quality and recreation development.

OREGON ISLANDS WILDERNESS

SEC. 12. (a) In accordance with subsection 3 (c) of the Wilderness Act (78 Stat. 892), certain lands in the Oregon Islands National Wildlife Refuge, Oregon, which comprise approximately four hundred and fifty-nine acres, which are depicted on a map entitled "Oregon Islands Wilderness—Proposed", date June 1972 (revised July 1972), is hereby designated as wilderness and shall become a part of the existing "Oregon Islands Wilderness".

(b) As soon as practicable after this Act takes effect, the Secretary of the Interior shall file a map and legal description of the Oregon Islands Wilderness with the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources of the Senate and the Interior and Insular Affairs Committee of the House of Representatives and such map and description shall have the same force and effect as if included in this Act: Provided, however, That correction of clerical and typographical errors in such legal description and map may be made. A map and legal description of the Oregon Islands Wilderness shall be on file and available for public inspection in the Office of the Director, Fish and Wildlife Service, Department of the Interior.

(c) The lands designated by this Act as the Oregon Islands Wilderness shall be administered in accordance with the applicable provisions of the Wilderness Act governing areas designated by that Act as wilderness areas, except that any reference in such provisions to the effective date of the Wilderness Act shall be deemed to be a reference to the effective date of this Act and, where appropriate, any reference to the Secretary of Agriculture shall be deemed to be a reference to the Secretary of the Interior.

ROCKY MOUNTAIN NATIONAL PARK STUDY

SEC. 13. Within one year of the date of enactment of this Act, the Secretary of Agriculture and the Secretary of the Interior shall jointly develop and submit to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs of the House of Representatives and the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources of the Senate, a comprehensive report studying and evaluating the suitability of revising the boundaries of Rocky Mountain National Park to include all or part of the Indian Peaks Wilderness Area is established by this Act and examining the possible addition or deletion of other lands designated as "Park Study Area" on a map entitled "Indian Peaks Wilderness Area and Arapaho National Recreation Area" dated July 1978; provided, that regardless of the ultimate administration of the areas to be studied under this section, the 70,000 acre Indian Peaks Wilderness Area established by this Act shall remain as a component of the National Wilderness Preservation System.

By Mr. CRANSTON (for himself and Mr. WALLOP):

S. 3352. A bill to require foreign persons who acquire, transfer, or hold interests in agricultural land to report such transactions and holdings to the Secretary of Agriculture and to direct the Secretary to analyze information contained in such reports and determine the effects such transactions and holdings have, particularly on family farms and rural communities, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry.

AGRICULTURAL FOREIGN INVESTMENT DISCLOSURE ACT OF 1978

● Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, I am introducing today on behalf of Senator WALLOP and myself the Agricultural Foreign Investment Disclosure Act of 1978, a bill to establish a national reporting system for nonresident alien owners of U.S. farmland. The measure is identical to H.R. 13132 sponsored by Congressman JOHN KREBS and others in the House.

It is estimated that foreign investors acquired $800 million of U.S. farmland last year—about 30 percent of the total foreign investment in this country. Foreign buyers purchased tens of thousands of acres, primarily in the western, midwestern and southern States. In the rich San Joaquin Delta region of California alone, over 17,000 acres of agricultural land have been purchased by foreign buyers since June 1976.

Since hard data on the extent of foreign investment in farmland is undependable or unobtainable in many areas of the Nation, it is difficult to judge the impact of these land purchases on American agriculture. Reports from real estate dealers in my State indicate that foreign buyers are often willing to pay land prices far above current market values. Induced by attractive rates of return on what they feel to be a secure investment, foreign investors inflate land values by aggressive bidding on this limited natural resource. Escalating land values may squeeze small U.S. farmers out of the land market and prevent young farmers from setting up their first farm or ranch. Moreover, the chances of a financially successful farm operation are reduced by the heavy burden of loans that must be carried to purchase agricultural land inflated by overseas currency.

The Agriculture Foreign Investment Disclosure Act of 1978 will clear up the existing confusion on the extent of foreign ownership of U.S. farmland and the consequences of these land holdings on agriculture. The legislation requires all foreign interests to report present holdings, sales, purchases or transfers of U.S. farmland to the Secretary of Agriculture. Domestic corporations controlled substantially by nonresident aliens would also be required to report to the Secretary, thereby preventing evasion of the law by use of an American corporation. A penalty of up to 25 percent of the fair market value of the unreported land could be levied against those avoiding the declaration requirements.

Additionally, the Secretary of Agriculture would be required to file regular reports with Congress on the level of foreign investment in agricultural land, including an analysis of the effect of these transactions and holdings on family farms and farm communities.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 3352

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SHORT TITLE

SECTION 1. This Act may be cited as the "Agricultural Foreign Investment Disclosure Act of 1978".

REPORTING REQUIREMENTS

SEC. 2. (a) Any foreign person who acquires or transfers any interest, other than a security interest, in agricultural land shall submit a report to the Secretary of Agriculture not later than 90 days after the date of such acquisition or transfer. Such report shall be submitted in such form and in accordance with such procedures as the Secretary may require and shall contain—

(1) the legal name and the address of such foreign person;

(2) in any case in which such foreign person is an individual, the citizenship of such foreign person;

(3) in any case in which such foreign person is not an individual or a government, the country in which such foreign person is created or organized and the principal place of business of such foreign person;

(4) the type of interest in agricultural land which such foreign person acquired or transferred;

(5) a legal description of such agricultural land;

(6) the purchase price paid for, or any other consideration given for, such interest;

(7) in any case in which such foreign person transfers such interest, the legal name and the address of the person to whom such interest is transferred and—

(A) in any case in which such transferee is an individual, the citizenship of such transferee; and

(B) in any case in which such transferee is not an individual or a government, the country in which such transferee is created or organized and the principal place of business of such transferee; and

(8) such other information as the Secretary may require by regulation.

(b) Any foreign person who holds any interest, other than a security interest, in agricultural land on the day before the date of the enactment of this Act shall submit a report to the Secretary not later than 180 days after the date of the enactment of this Act. Such report shall be submitted in such form and in accordance with such procedures as the Secretary may require and shall contain—

(1) the legal name and the address of such foreign person;

(2) in any case in which such foreign person is an individual, the citizenship of such foreign person;

(3) in any case in which such foreign person is an individual, the citizenship of such foreign person;
is created or organized and the principal place of business of such foreign person;

(4) the type of interest in agricultural land which is held by such foreign person;

(5) a legal description of such agricultural land;

(6) the purchase price paid for, or any other consideration given for, such interest; and

(7) such other information as the Secretary may require by regulation.

(c)(1) With respect to any foreign person, other than an individual or a government, who is required to submit a report by subsection (a) or (b), the Secretary may, in addition, require such foreign person to submit a report to the Secretary containing—

(A) the legal name and the address of each person who holds any interest in such foreign person;

(B) in any case in which the holder of such interest is an individual, the citizenship of such holder; and

(C) in any case in which the holder of such interest is not an individual or a government, the country in which such holder is created or organized and the principal place of business of such holder.

(2) With respect to any person whose legal name is contained in any report submitted under paragraph (1), the Secretary may take such actions as the Secretary considers necessary to determine—

(A) the legal name and the address of any person who holds any interest in any person whose legal name is contained in such report;

(B) in any case in which the holder of such interest is an individual, the citizenship of such holder; and

(C) in any case in which the holder of such interest is not an individual or a government, the country in which such holder is created or organized and the principal place of business of such holder.

(3)(A) The Secretary shall not require any foreign person to submit any information in any report under paragraph (1) if the submission of such information is prohibited by the laws of the country involved.

(B) The Secretary shall not take any action under paragraph (2) if such action is prohibited by the laws of the country involved.

CIVIL PENALTY

SEC. 3. (a) Whoever violates any provision of section 2(a), 2(b), or 2(c) (1) of this Act shall be subject to a civil penalty imposed by the Secretary. The amount of any such civil penalty shall be determined in accordance with the provisions of subsection (b) of this section. Any such civil penalty shall be recoverable in a civil action brought by the Attorney General of the United States in an appropriate district court of the United States.

(b) With respect to any person who violates any provision of section 2(a), 2(b), or 2(c) (1), any civil penalty imposed by the Secretary shall not exceed 25 percent of the fair market value, on the date of the assessment of such penalty, of the interest in agricultural land with respect to which such violation occurred.

REPORTS

SEC. 4. (a) In accordance with the schedule set forth in subsection (b), the Secretary shall—

(1) with respect to each period set forth in such subsection, analyze information obtained by the Secretary under section 2 and determine the effects of foreign persons' acquiring, transferring, and holding agricultural land, particularly the effects of such acquisitions, transfers, and holdings on family farms and rural communities; and

(2) transmit to the President and each House of the Congress a report on the Secretary's findings and conclusions regarding each analysis and determination made under paragraph (1).

(b) An analysis and determination shall be made, and a report on the Secretary's findings and conclusions regarding such analysis and determination transmitted, pursuant to subsection (a)—

(1) with respect to information obtained by the Secretary under section 2 during the 6-month period following the date of the enactment of this Act, within 9 months after such date of enactment;

(2) with respect to information obtained by the Secretary under section 2 during the 12-month period following the date of the enactment of this Act, within 15 months after such date of enactment; and

(3) with respect to each calendar year following the 12-month period referred to in paragraph (2), within 90 days after the end of such calendar year.

DEFINITIONS

SEC. 5. For purposes of this Act—

(1) the term "agricultural land" means any land used for agricultural purposes as determined by the Secretary under regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary;

(2) the term "foreign country" means any country other than the United States;

(3) the term "foreign person" means—

(A) any individual who is not a citizen of the United States and who has not been lawfully admitted for permanent residence under the Immigration and Nationality Act;

By Mr. DURKIN:

S. 3353. A bill to amend the Federal Trade Commission Act to provide that under certain circumstances exclusive territorial arrangements relating to the manufacture, sale, or distribution of soft drink products are not unlawful; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. DURKIN. Mr. President, I rise to introduce a bill that will protect hundreds of small bottling businesses from the harmful effects of a recent Federal Trade Commission ruling. In April, two FTC Commissioners ruled that the soft drink bottling industry's system of territorial franchises was anticompetitive and in violation of antitrust laws. The structure of the industry for the past 75 years has been that local bottling firms are franchised by the syrup manufacturer to sell a line of soft drinks in a specific geographic area. In other words, a Coca-Cola or Pepsi-Cola bottler authorized to sell in one area is not permitted to encroach upon the territory of its neighbors. Yet within its territory, a company bottling coke competes with Pepsi, 7-Up, Dr. Pepper, Faygo, and so forth, in the marketplace.

The FTC ruling overturns this system of franchises. The Commission's logic was that because two or more bottlers of the same product were not able to sell against each other, competition was being suppressed. In reaching these conclusions, the FTC discounted the aggressive interbrand competition among the soft drink companies and based its decision almost solely on the question of intrabrand competition between bottlers of the same brand.

If allowed to stand, this ruling would result in unfair competition which could put many small bottlers out of business. Because the bottling industry is one of the few in the country that has not been taken over by a few giant corporations, independent firms still dot small towns and rural areas; providing local employment and much needed tax dollars for many communities. In my own State of New Hampshire, for example, 7 of the 11 bottling firms employ fewer than 50 people. These firms are located throughout the State, from Manchester to Greenland to North Conway.

If the appeals to the FTC ruling fail, these small bottlers will be at the mercy of their larger neighbors. Many small firms will be unable to compete with the industry giants for many important accounts. After a few years, hundreds of these locally-owned firms would be driven out of business, laying off thousands of workers. Accompanying this will be far less competition than we now have, coupled with an increase in prices and less market coverage.

An examination of the soft drink industry shows quite clearly that it is one of the most competitive in the country. There are over 70 soft drink companies in America that franchise over 2,000 independent bottling firms. Most of these are local industries employing fewer than 50 people. They have been granted specific geographic territories by the soft drink companies to bottle and sell their products. In these territories, each bottler faces stiff competition from other brands' bottlers. This has benefited consumers by keeping prices low and by making soft drinks available at every mom and pop store and crossroads filling station in the country.

Now, however, the FTC has determined that even though the consumer has dozens of choices of soft drinks, there is not enough competition in the industry. However, the truth is that the various soft drink brands are fiercely competitive, and the ultimate beneficiary of this is the consumer.

To make this even clearer, it is interesting to note that for some bottle sizes, the per ounce price of soft drinks, even with inflation, is at the price level of 1940. Certainly free enterprise is working well here.

What my bill will do is recognize the benefit to consumers under the present system by providing a per se rule of legality for territorial franchises, as long as there is substantial interbrand competition in an area, and as long as the grantor of the franchise retains substantial control over product quality, packaging, and advertising. This is a reasonable means of protecting small businesses and many jobs from unfair competition, while insuring continued service to the consumer by keeping free competition in the marketplace.

Mr. President, all too often small businesses are battered and damaged by powers outside their control. They are the backbone of American business life, and their prosperity is essential to the preservation of our free enterprise system. The bottling franchises are small businesses that provide the employment and tax dollars for so many communities all across the country. They must be able to continue.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 3353

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 5(a) of the Federal Trade Commission Act (15 U.S.C. 45) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"(3) Nothing contained in this Act, or in any of the antitrust Acts, prohibits the inclusion and enforcement in any trademark licensing contract or agreement, pursuant to which the licensee engaged in the manufacture (including manufacture by a sublicensee, agent, or subcontractor), distribution, or sale of a trademarked soft drink product, of any provision granting the licensee the sale and exclusive right to manufacture, distribute, or sell such product in a defined geographic area or limiting the licensee the sole and exclusive right to manufacture, distribution, or sale of such product only for ultimate resale to consumers within a defined geographic area if in such defined geographic area—

"(A) such product is in substantial and effective competition with products of the same general class manufactured, distributed, or sold by others;

"(B) the licensee is in substantial and effective competition with vendors of other products of the same general class; and

"(C) the licensor retains control over the nature and quality of such product in accordance with the provisions of the Trademark Act of 1946 (15 U.S.C. 1051).".

ADDITIONAL COSPONSORS

S. 3229

At the request of Mr. GLENN, the Senator from Wisconsin (Mr. NELSON) was added as a cosponsor of S. 3229, the Postal Service Amendments Act of 1978.

S. 3265

At the request of Mr. ROTH, the Senator from New Hampshire (Mr. MCINTYRE) was added as a cosponsor of S. 3265, a bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to allow an individual to exclude from gross income the gain from the sale or exchange of the individual's principal residence.

SENATE RESOLUTION 431

At the request of Mr. RIBICOFF, the Senator from Illinois (Mr. PERCY), the Senators from Ohio (Mr. GLENN and Mr. METZENBAUM), the Senator from Iowa (Mr. CLARK), the Senators from South Dakota (Mr. MCGOVERN and Mr ABOUREZK), the Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. BROOKE), the Senator from Indiana (Mr. BAYH), the Senator from Minnesota (Mrs. HUMPHREY), the Senator from Montana (Mr. PAUL G. HATFIELD), the Senators from Florida (Mr. CHILES and Mr. STONE), the Senator from Rhode Island (Mr. CHAFEE), the Senator from New York (Mr. JAVITS), the Senator from Maryland (Mr. MATHIAS), the Senator from New Jersey (Mr. CASE), the Senator from Oregon (Mr. PACKWOOD), the Senator from Michigan (Mr. RIEGLE), the Senator from Wisconsin (Mr. PROXMIRE) and the Senator from Hawaii (Mr. INOUYE) were added as cosponsors of Senate Resolution 431, the Lee Metcalf Fair Employment Relations Resolution.

AMENDMENTS SUBMITTED FOR PRINTING

STRATEGIC AND CRITICAL MATERIALS TRANSACTION ACT OF 1978—S. 2635

AMENDMENT NO. 3313

(Ordered to be printed and to lie on the table.)

Mr. PROXMIRE submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to S. 2635, a bill to authorize the disposal of 11 materials from the national and supplemental stockpiles.

NATIONAL DEFENSE STOCKPILE ACT—H.R. 4895

AMENDMENTS NOS. 3314 THROUGH 3316

(Ordered to be printed and to lie on the table.)

Mr. PROXMIRE submitted three amendments intended to be proposed by him to H.R. 4895, an act to amend the Strategic and Critical Materials Stockpiling Act, and for other purposes.

BRETTON WOODS AGREEMENTS ACT AMENDMENTS—S. 2152

AMENDMENT NO. 3317

(Ordered to be printed and to lie on the table.)

Mr. WEICKER (for himself and Mr. MARK O. HATFIELD) submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by them, jointly, to S. 2152, a bill to amend the Bretton Woods Agreements Act to authorize the United States to participate in the Supplementary Financing Facility of the International Monetary Fund.

AMENDMENTS NOS. 3318 THROUGH 3320

(Ordered to be printed and to lie on the table.)

Mr. HELMS submitted three amendments intended to be proposed by him to S. 2152, supra.

CIVIL SERVICE LAW REFORM—S. 2640

AMENDMENTS NOS. 3321 THROUGH 3331

(Ordered to be printed and to lie on the table.)

Mr. STEVENS submitted 11 amendments intended to be proposed by him to S. 2640, a bill to reform the civil service laws.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, it has become obvious in recent months that a strong effort will be made to pass civil service reform legislation during this session of Congress. The Federal bureaucracy has always presented an easy target for politicians and this year more than ever, shortcomings in leadership are being diagnosed as inefficiencies in the Federal personnel system.

While I do not argue with many of the goals of the proposed reorganization of the civil service system, there is serious doubt in my mind that the bill which has been reported by the Governmental Affairs Committee will, indeed, achieve those desired ends.

To insure that the Senate carefully considers the effects of this legislation when it comes to the floor, I am today submitting a series of amendments which will improve the committee bill. Each of them will be discussed in detail when S. 2640 comes to the floor.

LOCAL PUBLIC WORKS ADMINISTRATION AUTHORIZATIONS—S. 3243

AMENDMENT NO. 3332

(Ordered to be printed and to lie on the table.)

Mr. WEICKER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to S. 3243, a bill to authorize the appropriation of funds to provide for additional administrative expenses associated with the implementation of the Local Public Works Capital Development and Investment Act of 1976, as amended.

SMALL BUSINESS AMENDMENTS—H.R. 11445

AMENDMENTS NOS. 3333 THROUGH 3335

(Ordered to be printed and to lie on the table.)

Mr. WEICKER submitted three amendments intended to be proposed by him to H.R. 11445, an act to amend the Small Business Act and the Small Business Investment Act of 1958.

NOTICES OF HEARINGS

OCCUPATIONAL ALCOHOLISM PROGRAMS

Mr. HATHAWAY. Mr. President, on August 17, 1978, the Subcommittee on Alcoholism and Drug Abuse will convene a joint hearing with the Subcommittee on Federal Spending Practices to consider S. 2515, dealing with occupational alcoholism programs.

The hearing will begin at 10 a.m. in room 3302, Dirksen Senate Office Building.

Testimony is anticipated from administration and public witnesses. Any individuals wishing to submit testimony or desiring further information should contact the office of either subcommittee.

SUBCOMMITTEE ON TAXATION AND DEBT MANAGEMENT

● Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Mr. President, on July 24, I announced that the Subcommittee on Taxation and Debt Management of the Senate Committee on Finance would hold hearings on July 28, 1978, on sections 346, 505, 507, 523, 728, 1146, and 1331 of S. 2266 and H.R. 8200, the Bankruptcy Reform Act of 1978.

To provide additional time to prepare testimony, I am today announcing that the hearing will be delayed until Friday, August 4, 1978.

The hearings will begin at 9:30 a.m. in room 2221 of the Dirksen Senate Office Building.

The hearings will be limited to those sections of the act which relate to taxation and collection of taxes. In connection with the Judiciary Committee's consideration of the act, the staff of the Joint Committee on Taxation has developed certain proposed amendments to the act. I am at this time requesting that those proposed amendments be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD so that comments on the amendments can be received at the hearings.

Witnesses who desire to testify at the hearings should submit a written request to Michael Stern, staff director, Committee on Finance, room 2227, Dirksen Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C. 20510, by no later than the close of business on August 2, 1978.●

PARKS AND RECREATION SUBCOMMITTEE

● Mr. JACKSON. Mr. President, I would like to note some corrections for the July 31 and August 4 hearings on H.R. 12536, National Parks and Recreation Act of 1978, by the Parks and Recreation Subcommittee of the Energy and Natural Resources Committee.

Section 503 of H.R. 12536, Pine Barrens Area, N.J., will be rescheduled from July 31 to August 4.

Section 501, Guam National Seashore; section 506, Saint Paul's Church, Eastchester; section 509, Palo Alto Battlefield National Historic Site; and section 551, Continental Divide National Scenic Trail, North Country National Scenic Trail, and Overmountain Victory Trail study, will be rescheduled from August 4 to July 31.

As previously scheduled, both meetings will be in room 3110 of the Dirksen Senate Office Building and will begin at 9 a.m. each day.●

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS

CONRAIL: TIME TO TIGHTEN OVERSIGHT

● Mr. McGOVERN. Mr. President, the Congress is about to be asked to authorize another huge investment in the Consolidate Rail Corp. in the hope that this new infusion of taxpayer funds will enable the system to get off the corporate welfare dole and become self-supporting.

Specifically, the Senate will be asked to approve $1.3 billion more for ConRail to enable it to reach profitability by 1982. Enactment of this legislation will bring to $2.4 billion the Federal investment in this enormous rail complex comprised of six bankrupt lines that stretch from New England to Chicago and constitutes a cornerstone in the national rail industry.

Mr. President, I am far from being convinced that another billion-dollar-plus handout to ConRail will enable it to become self-supporting. My doubts are reinforced by the U.S. Railroad Association, the agency created to play the role of Federal banker for ConRail and oversee its operations to protect the public investment in the system. USRA, in its recent report on ConRail, was pessimistic in its evaluation of the system. It estimated that ConRail may need a total of nearly $4 billion to continue operations during the 5-year period ending in 1982, and even then the goal of financial independence may not be reached.

ConRail's uncertain future has prompted USRA to draft alternative proposals to achieve and sustain an adequate rail system for the northeast. It is preparing to present these proposals to Congress and the administration next April in the event that circumstances between now and then make it clear that ConRail cannot check its downhill run.

The fact of the matter is, ConRail is further from the goal of success than it was when it became operational on April 1, 1976.

The vast rail system, made up largely of the bankrupt Penn Central, the largest single railroad in the world, lost more than $367 million last year.

It lost $216 million more in the first quarter of this year alone.

The percentage of cars delivered within 1 day of scheduled arrival fell from 75 percent when ConRail began operations to 55 percent in early May.

ConRail was fined $2.3 million by the Interstate Commerce Commission early this month for failing to comply with ICC orders to speed the flow of freight cars to other railroads. This problem reached critical proportions, during the winter when one-third of all the rail industry's box cars, twice as many as ConRail itself owns, "disappeared" into the ConRail system.

An average of 197 ConRail road locomotives a day were out of service for repairs last year.

The line is beset with a grand jury investigation of payroll irregularities and possible payroll fraud.

Railroad union officials and ConRail employees have presented Congress with charges of serious mismanagement of ConRail resources by some middle level ConRail officials.

To say the least, this is a dismal picture for a project which was supposed to have become self-supporting next year on the strength of the $2.1 billion originally appropriated for it. Instead of success the Congress now finds itself being asked to deliver freight cars full of public funds to ConRail with no cutoff point in sight.

The railroad is beginning to look like a financial merry-go-round taking the taxpayers for a ride.

Mr. President, I do not in any way mean to imply that Congress should abandon ConRail by halting its financial support of a system which is a major component of the Nation's rail industry. By the same token, the continued deterioration of the line demands much closer congressional oversight of its activities from this point forward so that we will know as soon as possible whether ConRail, in fact, will inevitably run out of track and we can step in to change its direction with a more efficient alternative at the first opportunity.

Donald Cole, president and chief operating officer of ConRail, has endorsed this stance. When he testified Wednesday at Joint Economic Committee hearings which I am chairing on national railroad policy and problems, he indicated that USRA plans to tighten its scrutiny of ConRail by requiring indepth quarterly reports in its operating activities and financial status. I wholeheartedly concur with this position. Moreover, I think that Congress must have access to the reports ConRail makes to USRA so that it will be better prepared to respond to alternative proposals when and if this course is determined to be unavoidable. Given the dire condition of ConRail, Congress can do no less than this.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have the testimony of Mr. Cole on this point printed in the RECORD along with an article appearing in the Washington Star reporting that Jervis Langdon, Jr., former chief executive of the Penn Central, has concluded that ConRail cannot survive and presenting the alternatives he thinks are open for consideration.

The testimony follows:

Senator McGOVERN. Mr. Cole, we may be looking at the proposed $1.3 billion supplemental appropriation for ConRail as early as this week, as I think you know.

Mr. COLE. Yes.

Senator McGOVERN. You mentioned in your statement that USRA is attempting to do a little tighter monitoring job over Conrail. In that spirit, do you think it might be useful for Congress to require, when we grant these additional funds, that there be a quarterly, if not monthly, reporting to us and to USRA?

Mr. COLE. Senator, we intend to do some reporting with or without any requirement. Monthly is probably—well, that adds nothing, and is somewhat burdensome in the main because you do not really see where you are going on a monthly basis. It takes a quarterly picture to understand the trends.

Senator MCGOVERN. I don't think anybody here wants to just cook up needless paperwork. The question is how do you stay on top of the situation closely so that there are not surprises down the road, or shock, by things we were not aware of.

Mr. COLE. I think by two ways; one, the quarterly reports, which we intend to provide without any additional legislative direction—but of course if Congress feels that it ought to increase the annual reporting to a quarterly basis, we are completely sympathetic with that. Again it is not just a question of the flow of information, it is our analysis as we look at the situation and inform Congress even before a report may be due on certain issues. I think we have tried to perform briefings for different committee staffs as issues arise, and I think in the future we have to do even more of that that is outside the formal reporting requirements.

Senator MCGOVERN. I know you have studies underway on possible alternatives to Conrail. Can you give us any brief sketch today of what some of those alternatives might be?

Mr. COLE. Well, Senator, some of them deal with spinoffs of some of the testimony we have heard this morning, and that is that some regulatory changes might be the answer. That one is more in the hands of the Department of Transportation because it does impact entire rail industry rather than just conrail.

We, of course, are following it quite closely in working with the Department of Transportation in that approach on regulatory changes. But it is clear that Conrail's problems are much more fundamental than just change in some regulation, in effect, because the level of traffic with Conrail—what they are dealing with now and even if they are increased—are probably considerably less than that necessary to recover the revenue for the plant costs that Conrail has. So any alternatives have to deal with the size and configuration of Conrail plant and also, I think, with the number of employees and the people there, because it is a very high labor cost system. Conrail pointed out itself that its plant—even with the $1.3 oillion supplemental approach—would require some $500 million in savings in labor costs over the next five years. And we still have not seen the results of that.

There also is the basic problem of Conrail's carrying some commodities that there is no way they can be fully compensated for, and even rate changes may not be enough because they just have to possibly get out of certain markets to deal with it.

Finally, I think that Conrail and its equipment needs are so great that not only does it have to increase utilization but we have to look at some alternatives to the equipment needs of Conrail that deal with the entire rail industry and its equipment needs because the equipment that Conrail uses is very often equipment owned by other railroads and that means that any issue you deal with concerning Conrail equipment affects the entire rail industry.

These are a variety of things that we are beginning to look at and that for us it involves getting down and doing a network segmentation analysis of Conrail's plant system and the profitability and the losses we find on different segments. And then decide what to do with those segments. If you have a segment of Conrail losing money, you must decide whether it is in the terminal areas or in a route structure; do you work Conrail out of that market or that segment; or out of certain markets; or do you provide subsidies for that type of operation if it is felt by the Congress that it is socially necessary?

Well, there are a lot of approaches to this problem and there are also a lot of public policy decisions that have to be made to deal with it.

CONRAIL'S FAILING, SPLIT IT UP, EX-PENNSY CHIEF SAYS

(By Stephen M. Aug)

A former long-time chief executive of three major railroads—including the bankrupt Penn Central Transportation Co.——says Conrail is failing and nothing short of nationalization, breaking it up or shrinking it drastically will save it.

Jervis Langdon Jr., who ran the Penn Central from 1973 until its property was acquired by Conrail two years ago—and who is a former chief executive of the Baltimore & Ohio and of the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific Railroad—says Conrail so far has been unable to match the service level achieved by Penn Central when it was in bankruptcy.

In an interview and in a memorandum, Langdon pointed out that in just one area—on-time performance—Conrail's record has been almost straight down. Langdon, who said he obtained his figures from publicly available information, measured on-time performance in percentage of freight cars arriving at their destination within one day of their scheduled arrival time.

Between 1974 and April 1, 1976—when Conrail took over—Penn Central's freight cars improved their on-time performance from 70.5 percent to 76.5 percent. Conrail's performance—which included some lines owned by bankrupt railroads other than Penn Central—shows a continuous decline from 75 percent on the takeover date to 56 percent this past March.

Penn Central's freight car utilization—a key measure of efficiency—averaged 53 miles per day in 1975, just about the industry average. Conrail achieved 50.6 miles in 1976 when the industry average rose to 56.9 miles, and last year dropped to 50.3.

Further, Conrail continues to lose business. In 1970—the year it plunged into bankruptcy—Penn Central's share of freight revenues among Eastern railroads was 35.2 percent. By 1975 this was up to 36.8. But Conrail reversed this trend, Langdon said. In 1976, Conrail's share—which includes not only Penn Central's but shares of other bankrupt lines—was 45.3 percent. Last year this dropped to 44.7.

Langdon said all the traditional indicators railroads use to measure performance indicate that Conrail's performance has been dropping. Langdon was reluctant to blame the firm's management, but he suggested, "There could be other reasons and it may be that the local division superintendents aren't given enough authority, or the general managers."

He called for a thorough examination of Conrail's five-year outlook, and contended that such studies by the U.S. Railway Association—which designed Conrail's system—and Conrail's own five-year plan, were unrealistic.

Langdon suggested that an indepth study likely will show that Conrail's "earning power for the operation as it's presently being conducted is not likely to be obtained."

He suggested there are three options for Conrail, and none of them envisions the firm continuing as it is. The three are:

1. A drastic restructuring, reducing Conrail from the present 19,000 miles to 7,000-9,000 miles. Langdon conceded that this would be politically unacceptable.

2. Outright nationalization. At present, Conrail, though subsidized by the Federal government, is supposed to be a for-profit corporation. Langdon suggests Conrail could be restructured like the Canadian National Railways, which is owned by the Canadian government, but which is gradually becoming profitable.

3. Langdon's favored option—similar to that advocated by the Penn Central trustees during the reorganization process—is simply to break up the system and parcel out the lines to connecting railroads. This could result in creation of a transcontinental railroad if Western lines cooperate.

Rail lines left over after the most desirable lines are distributed to profitable railroads would be either abandoned or, if their operation is necessary, subsidized.

Langdon said there is virtually no hope for Conrail as it is structured. Its principal problem, he said, is the continuing decline in traffic This was also Penn Central's principal problem.

"People never realized that Penn Central—or the constituent companies of Penn Central—had been slipping in their freight traffic since World War II. I think in 1973, '74 and '75 that our freight traffic volume was some 15 or 17 percent . . . less than in the early 1950s and right after World War II," he said.

By contrast, he added, in areas served by the Southern Railway, Santa Fe and Western lines "the traffic had in certain cases more than doubled. With Penn Central, its declining traffic flow was the principal problem because . . . it occurred during a time when costs were going up as a result of inflation . . . You had an inflationary economy and a declining volume and you were in an impossible situation . . .

"This same trend—namely declining traffic volume—continues. And part of it is, of course, due to the decline . . . in the economy of the Northeast . . . And another part is due to the fact that trucking competition is undoubtedly more severe in the East than it is in other parts of the country."

Since it began operations, Conrail has lost about $1 billion. Further, it has just about exhausted a federal fund of $2.03 billion worth of financial aid to rehabilitate its rundown system, and has asked the government for another $1.3 billion.

The legislation has been approved by committees in both houses of Congress and is scheduled for a Senate vote next week. The House has also approved an initial $300 million appropriation.●

CAMBODIAN GENOCIDE

● Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I want to submit for the RECORD a copy of an article appearing in Time magazine this week, dealing with the ongoing genocidal conditions in Cambodia.

Certainly, the mass executions and subhuman living standards have shocked all of us. This reign of terror is a throwback to mankinds' most primitive and uncivilized condition. At a time when both Congress and the President are focusing attention on human rights violations around the world, there can be no excuse or alibi for ignoring the deaths—by disease, starvation, and execution—of literally millions of Cambodians.

For Congress, our immediate duty is clear: We have to make the public aware of what is happening in Cambodia. Little by little, progress is being made. The House of Representatives has already approved a resolution condemning the Cambodian atrocities, and I have introduced a similar resolution in the Senate, which has thus far been cosponsored by 15 of my colleagues in the Senate. That resolution—Senate Resolution 323—would place the Senate squarely on record as condemning this total disregard for basic human rights, and it calls upon the President to take all possible effective measures to help bring about an end to the atrocities in that country.

REFUGEES

Beyond simply educating the public, we also have to take action wherever possible to relieve the suffering of the Cambodian people, and to deny the Communist regime the support it needs to retain its authority.

There are several things we can do, and which we must do. We can, for example, insist that the leaders of the People's Republic of China bring pressure to bear on the Cambodian regime, to apply more human standards toward the Cambodian people. China is one of the few nations which deals directly with the Cambodian regime, and Peking's leaders must know that we expect positive efforts on their part if "normalization" steps are to continue.

Finally, and most immediately, we can provide for improved immigration conditions, to allow many more Cambodian refugees to enter this country. More than 15,000 Cambodian refugees are now living in camps next to the Cambodian border, and we are concerned about the constant danger and severe conditions under which they live. I have already contacted the Secretary of State, and the Immigration Department to urge that special accommodations be made to permit many more of these refugees to come to our shores to begin a new life. Furthermore, when the Justice Department Appropriations bill reaches the Senate floor, I intend to propose an amendment to provide special parole authority for 7,500 Cambodian refugees to enter the United States during fiscal year 1979. I believe this action would facilitate relocation of Cambodian refugees, and would encourage the Government of Thailand to admit those who continue to seek asylum.

Mr. President, I ask that the article entitled "Cambodia: An Experiment in Genocide" from Time magazine of July 31, 1978, be printed in the RECORD.

The article follows:

CAMBODIA: AN EXPERIMENT IN GENOCIDE

The enormity of the tragedy has been carefully reconstructed from the reports of many eyewitnesses. Some political theorists have defended it, as George Bernard Shaw and other Western intellectuals defended the brutal social engineering in the Soviet Union during the 1930s. Yet it remains perhaps the most dreadful infliction of suffering on a nation by its government in the past three decades. The nation is Cambodia.

On the morning of April 17, 1975, advance units of Cambodia's Communist insurgents, who had been actively fighting the defeated Western-backed government of Marshal Lon Nol for nearly five years, began entering the capital of Phnom Penh. The Khmer Rouge looted things, such as watches and cameras, but they did not go on a rampage. They seemed disciplined. And at first, there was general jubilation among the city's terrified, exhausted and bewildered inhabitants. After all, the civil war seemed finally over, the Americans had gone, and order, everyone seemed to assume, would soon be graciously restored.

Then came the shock. After a few hours, the black-uniformed troops began firing into the air. It was a signal for Phnom Penh's entire population swollen by refugees to some 3 million, to abandon the city. Young and old, the well and the sick, businessmen and beggars, were all ordered at gunpoint onto the streets and highways leading into the countryside.

Among the first pitiful sights on the road, witnessed by several Westerners, were patients from Phnom Penh's grossly overcrowded hospitals, perhaps 20,000 people all told. Even the dying, the maimed and the pregnant were herded out stumbling onto the streets. Several pathetic cases were pushed along the road in their beds by relatives, the intravenous bottles still attached to the bedframes. In some hospitals foreign doctors were ordered to abandon their patients in mid-operation. It took two days before the Brugel-like multitude was fully under way, shuffling, limping and crawling to a designated appointment with revolution.

With almost no preparations for so enormous an exodus—how could there have been with a war on?—thousands died along the route, the wounded from loss of blood, the weak from exhaustion, and others by execution, usually because they had not been quick enough to obey a Khmer Rouge order. Phnom Penh was not alone: the entire urban population of Cambodia, some 4 million people, set out on a similar grotesque pilgrimage. It was one of the greatest transfers of human beings in modern history.

The survivors were settled in villages and agricultural communes all around Cambodia and were put to work for frantic 16- or 17-hour days, planting rice and building an enormous new irrigation system. Many died from dysentery of malaria, others from malnutrition having been forced to survive on a condensed-milk can of rice every two days. Still others were taken away at night by Khmer Rouge guards to be shot or bludgeoned to death. The lowest estimate of the bloodbath to date—by execution, starvation and disease—is in the hundreds of thousands. The highest exceeds 1 million, and that in a country that once numbered no more than 7 million. Moreover, the killing continues, according to the latest refugees.

The Roman Catholic cathedral in Phnom Penh has been razed, and even the native Buddhism is reviled as a "reactionary" religion. There are no private telephones, no forms of public transportation, no postal service, no universities. A Scandinavian diplomat who last year visited Phnom Penh—today a ghost city of shuttered shops, abandoned offices and painted-over street signs—said on his return: "It was like an absurd film; it was a nightmare. It is difficult to believe it is true."

Yet, why is it so difficult to believe? Have not the worst atrocities of the 20th century all been committed in the name of some perverse pseudo science, usually during efforts to create a new heaven on earth, or even a "new man"? The Nazi notion of racial purity led inexorably to Auschwitz and the Final Solution. Stalin and Mao Tse-tung sent millions to their deaths in the name of a supposedly moral cause—in their case, the desired triumph of socialism. Now the Cambodians have taken bloodbath sociology to its logical conclusion. Karl Marx declared that money was at the heart of man's original sin, the acquisition of capital. The men behind Cambodia's Angka Loeu (Organization on High), who absorbed such verities while students in the West, have decided to abolish money.

How to do that? Well, one simplistic way was to abolish cities, because cities cannot survive without money. The new Cambodian rulers did just that. What matter that hundreds of thousands died as the cities were depopulated? It apparently meant little, if anything, to Premier Pol Pot and his shadowy colleagues on the politburo of Democratic Kampuchea, as they now call Cambodia. When asked about the figure of 1 million deaths, President Khieu Samphan replied: "It's incredible how concerned you Westerners are about war criminals." Radio Phnom Penh even dared to boast of this atrocity in the name of collectivism: "More than 2,000 years of Cambodian history have virtually ended."

Somehow, the enormity of the Cambodian tragedy—even leaving aside the grim question of how many or how few actually died in Angka Loeu's experiment in genocide—has failed to evoke an appropriate response of outrage in the West. To be sure, President Carter has declared Cambodia to be the worst violator of human rights in the world today. And, true, members of the U.S. Congress have ringingly denounced the Cambodian holocaust. The U.N., ever quick to adopt a resolution condemning Israel or South Africa, acted with its customary tortoise-like caution when dealing with a Third World horror: it wrote a letter to Phnom Penh asking for an explanation of charges against the regime.

Perhaps the greatest shock has been in France, a country where many of Cambodia's new rulers learned their Marx and where worship of revolution has for years been something of a national obsession among the intelligentsia. Said New Philosopher Bernard-Henri Lévy, a former leftist who has turned against Marxism: "We thought of revolution in its purest form as an angel. The Cambodian revolution was as pure as an angel, but it was barbarous. The question we ask ourselves now is, can revolution be anything but barbarous?"

Lévy has clearly pointed out the abyss to which worship of revolution leads. Nonetheless, many Western European intellectuals are still reluctant to face the issue squarely. If the word "pure," when used by adherents of revolution, in effect means "barbarous," perhaps the best the world can hope for in its future political upheavals is a revolution that is as "corrupt" as possible. Such skewed values are, indeed, already rife in some quarters. During the 1960s, Mao's Cultural Revolution in China was admired by many leftist intellectuals in the West, because it was supposedly "pure"—particularly by contrast with the bureaucratic stodginess of the Soviet Union. Yet that revolution, as the Chinese are now beginning to admit, grimly impoverished the country's science, art, education and literature for a decade. Even the Chinese advocates of "purity" during that time, Chiang Ch'ing and her cronies in the Gang of Four, turned out to have been as corrupt as the people in power they sought to replace. With less justification, there are intellectuals in the West so committed to the twin Molochs of our day—"liberation" and "revolution"—that they can actually defend what has happened in Cambodia.

Where the insane reversal of values lies is in the belief that notions like "purity" or "corruption" can have any meaning outside an absolute system of values: one that is resistant to the tinkering at will by governments or revolutionary groups. The Cambodian revolution, in its own degraded "purity," has demonstrated what happens when the Marxian denial of moral absolutes is taken with total seriousness by its adherents. Pol Pot and his friends decide what good is, what bad is, and how many corpses must pile up before this rapacious demon of "purity" is appeased.

In the West today, there is a pervasive consent to the notion of moral relativism, a reluctance to admit that absolute evil can and does exist. This makes it especially difficult for some to accept the fact that the Cambodian experience is something far worse than a revolutionary aberration. Rather, it is the deadly logical consequence of an atheistic, man-centered system of values, enforced by fallible human beings with total power, who believe, with Marx, that morality is whatever the powerful define it to be and, with Mao, that power grows from gun barrels. By no coincidence the most humane Marxist societies in Europe today are those that, like Poland or Hungary, permit the dilution of their doctrine by what Solzhenitsyn has called "the great reserves of mercy and sacrifice" from a Christian tradition. Yet if there is any doubt about what the focus of the purest revolutionary values is, consider the first three lines of the national anthem of Democratic Kampuchea:

The red, red blood splatters the cities and plains of the Cambodian fatherland,
The sublime blood of the workers and peasants,
The blood of revolutionary combatants of both sexes.

THE ALASKA LANDS BILL

● Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, Vermont is a long way from Alaska. The Green Mountain State is a small, northeastern territory, settled long, long ago by yeoman farmers who carved farms from the rocky hillsides and narrow valleys. Today, even with its relatively small population, Vermont is covered with well-manicured farms and small towns.

Yet we Vermonters have an overriding sense of wilderness and the value of raw, untouched forests. We fight our environmental battles on a different scale than Alaskans, yet we share the same concern for conservation.

I am watching with great interest the Alaskan lands bill introduced by my distinguished colleague from my neighboring State of New Hampshire, Mr. DURKIN. The following is my column published recently in a number of Vermont newspapers. I offer it today, and ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

The column follows:

JUNE 29, 1978.

ALASKA LANDS BILL

(By U.S. Senator PATRICK J. LEAHY)

Unfortunately, one of the most important pieces of legislation to come before the Senate this decade is being swept under the rug this session. While we spend our time in weeks upon weeks of debate and filibuster over the Panama Canal Treaties and the Labor Reform proposal, the Senate has ignored a bill beneficial to the history and future of our country and its people.

The bill does not have a direct bearing on Vermont, although its indirect impact means jobs and a sense of national identity.

The bill will responsibly preserve for posterity an important link in our heritage.

And the proposed law will insure orderly development that keeps pace with protection of wilderness resources.

It is the Alaska Lands Bill, which I wholeheartedly support. Because the Senate has prolonged debate on a few issues this year, and because the two senators from Alaska have threatened to filibuster the bill, I fear this landmark legislation will not see action this session.

For me, this is a tragedy to the cause of responsible conservation.

The controversial issue of setting aside large portions of land in Alaska ignited a classic confrontation between conservationists and business interests. Such a highly emotional debate—carried on too often by high pressure lobbyists—clouded the merits of a bill which will provide adequate protection for pristine wilderness, ample access for recreation and measured development of minerals and other resources.

Alaska is huge. The land bought from the Russians in 1867 for two cents an acre is truly the last wilderness in the 50 states, and it also holds the potential for supplying energy and resource needs far into the next century. The question before the state, the Congress, and the country is how best to meet the contrary needs of wilderness and exploitation, conservation and development.

I feel the legislation by Rep. Morris K. Udall, D-Ariz. which passed the House last month, and the similar proposal introduced in the Senate by Sen. John Durkin, D-NH, will successfully satisfy those conflicting needs. Under the bill:

40 percent (149 million acres) of all the land in Alaska is or will become the property of the state, Native corporations or private landowners.

23 percent (86 million acres) of all the land in Alaska will be federal land open to mineral exploration, logging and other multiple uses.

63 percent (235 million acres summing up the above classifications) of the state's land will be available for a wide variety of development and exploitation.

37 percent (140 million acres) of all the land in Alaska will be in one of the conservation system units either already existing or designated in the bill.

90 percent of all the land in Alaska would be open to sport hunting.

70 percent of the lands with metallic mineral potential will be outside conservation system units.

95 percent of all high potential oil and gas lands in Alaska will be open for possible development, and the entire land mass under federal control will be open to mineral assessment, core drilling and data collection by the Department of the Interior.

While the legislation affords necessary room for recreational and industrial access, it also places 110 million acres of federally owned land into three National conservation systems: the National Park System, the National Widlife Refuge System and the National Wild and Scenic Rivers System. This proposal will protect and preserve 30 percent of Alaskan wilderness.

Business lobbyists who claim their various industries will suffer from loss of timber and resources are wrong. The tradeoff involved in this legislation does not sacrifice resources for wilderness, because in many cases the two are found in different regions.

Six years of study by the Interior Department show that a considerable majority of commodity resources—oil, gas, rock minerals and timber—are found in lands that do not have the highest wilderness, wildlife, scenic and ecological values. Those valuable resources will not be locked up in national parks by this legislation, they will not disappear if not exploited.

In considering this vital issue, I concluded that we can always make available the resources of Alaska, but once the wilderness is lost, it is gone forever. In this case, if we err, we should go too far in setting aside land, instead of not enough.●

BANKRUPTCY LAW REVISION LEGISLATION

● Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Mr. President, on July 14, 1978, the Committee on the Judiciary reported S. 2266, a bill which revises the bankruptcy laws of our country. This bill, along with H.R. 8200, the House-passed bill on the same subject, represents the culmination of almost 8 years' study of a broad revision of the Bankruptcy Act.

By prior agreement, the chairman of the Judiciary Committee and the chairman of the Finance Committee arranged for the sequential referral of S. 2266 to the Finance Committee for a period not to exceed 30 days. During this period, the Finance Committee may consider and offer recommendations covering certain tax-related provisions of the bill.

These provisions are contained in sections 346, 505, 507, 523, 728, 1146, and 1331 of the bill. These provisions deal generally with determinations of tax liability and with the priority and discharge of taxes in bankruptcy cases.

There is strong sentiment in both Houses for the enactment of bankruptcy reform legislation in this Congress. In the interest of helping the Judiciary Committee achieve this goal, members of the staffs of the Finance Committee, and of the Joint Committee on Taxation, have been studying the provisions of the bill related to the collection of taxes in bankruptcy at the same time that these provisions were being considered by the Judiciary Committee.

To enable the Finance Committee to consider the tax-related provisions of S. 2266 expeditiously, I am placing in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a series of staff-prepared proposed amendments to S. 2266, dealing with the tax-related sections of the bill which have been referred to the Finance Committee.

Making these proposed amendments available to the public at this time will permit interested persons to comment on them and the Finance Committee on complete its consideration of the bill as quickly as possible.

Mr. President, I ask that the proposed amendments be printed in the RECORD.

The amendments follow:

TAX-RELATED AMENDMENTS TO S. 2266

(A bill to establish a uniform law on the subject of bankruptcies, as reported by the Committee on the Judiciary, Report No. 95-989)

AMENDMENT OF SECTION 346 (RELATING TO SPECIAL TAX PROVISIONS)

On page 337, beginning on line 1, strike out all through line 13 on page 344, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

§ 346. Special tax provisions.

(a) For purposes of this title—

(1) a tax on or measured by income or gross receipts for a taxable period shall be considered incurred on the last day of the taxable period; and

(2) a tax on or measured by payment of wages or compensation, production or use of property, transfers by death, gift, sale, or otherwise (other than a tax on income from any such transfer), or other transactions or events, shall be considered incurred on the date of such transaction or event.

(b) Notwithstanding the provisions of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 and of any State or local law imposing a tax—

(1) no penalty otherwise permitted under any such law for failure to make timely payment of a tax shall be imposed on—

(A) the estate, if such a failure by the trustee occurred pursuant to an order of the court finding probable insufficiency of funds of the estate to pay administrative expenses; or

(B) the debtor, with respect to a tax incurred on or before the earlier of the order for relief, or in an involuntary case, the appointment of a trustee, if the petition was filed before the last due date, including extensions, of a return required for any such tax.

This paragraph shall not apply to a penalty imposed with respect to failure to pay or deposit a tax withheld or collected from others and required to be paid to a governmental unit.

(2) Any penalty otherwise permitted under any such law for failure to make timely payment of a tax incurred on or before the earlier of the order for relief or, in an involuntary case, the appointment of a trustee, and to which paragraph (1) of this subsection does not apply, may not, if computed by reference to the passage of time until payment, be imposed on the debtor during or after a case under this title in an amount greater than the amount of the penalty computed to the date of the filing of a petition.

(c) For purposes of this title, the trustee or debtor in possession shall withhold and collect from any payment of wages, salaries, commissions, dividends, interests, or other payments, any amount required to be withheld or collected under applicable tax law, and shall pay such withheld or collected amount to the appropriate governmental unit at the time and in the manner required by such tax law.

AMENDMENT OF SECTION 505 (RELATING TO DETERMINATION OF TAX LIABILITY)

On page 380, beginning on line 3, strike out all through line 18 on page 382, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

§ 505. Determination of tax liability.

(a)(1) For purposes of the allowance from property of the estate of any expense or claim for a tax liability—

(A) the court in a case under this title may determine the liability of the debtor or the estate for—

(i) any tax, whether or not previously assessed or paid; and

(ii) the amount of any offset or counterclaim to, or net overpayment of, the same tax for the same taxable period; and

(B) the court may not make any determination referred to in subparagraph (A) concerning a tax incurred before the earlier of the order for relief or, in an involuntary case, the appointment of a trustee, if—

(i) before such determination, a judicial or administrative tribunal of competent jurisdiction has determined any such liability; or

(ii) any administrative prerequisite to a refund of tax has not been satisfied, unless the refund results from an offset or counterclaim to a claim or request for payment made by a governmental unit.

In any case in which a determination by a judicial or administrative tribunal of competent jurisdiction under the circumstances referred to in this paragraph becomes final, such determination shall be binding in the case under this title, whether or not the trustee intervened on behalf of the estate in the proceeding.

(2) For purposes of this subsection, the term "tax" includes a fine or penalty, however denominated, permitted under any law imposing a tax, whether the fine or penalty is punitive in nature or is in compensation for actual pecuniary loss suffered by the governmental unit.

(b)(1) The debtor in a case under chapter 7 or 13 of this title may apply to the court for a determination of his personal liability for any tax or customs duty excepted from discharge under paragraphs (1) and (7) of section 523(a) of this title, except that this sentence shall apply to a tax or duty excepted from discharge under subparagraph (B) or (C) of paragraph (1) of such section only if the governmental unit filed a proof of claim therefor. If a trustee is appointed in a case under chapter 11 of this title involving a debtor who is an individual, the debtor may make similar application with respect to any tax incurred as an administrative expense and which may be collected from the debtor under section 1141(d)(3) of this title. If the debtor makes proper application under this subsection, the court, after notice and a hearing, shall determine whether the tax or duty is dischargeable and, if nondischargeable, the extent of the debtor's personal liability therefor, including, where appropriate, a decision on the merits of the tax liability at issue. Whenever a judgment under this subsection becomes final, it shall be binding and conclusive on the governmental unit and on the debtor.

(2) If an expense or claim relating to a tax or duty referred to in paragraph (1) of this subsection is filed, and if the trustee or other party in interest objects to allowance thereof, an application under this subsection relating to the merits of the expense or claim may only be made before the hearing on allowance of the expense or claim. If a claim is deemed allowed under section 502 (a) of this title in the absence of objection to the claim, an application under this subsection may be made before or after the case is closed.

(3) Notwithstanding any other provision of this subsection, no determination of the merits of the tax liability may be made under this subsection if—

(A) a judicial or administrative tribunal of competent jurisdiction has previously determined the debtor's personal liability for the same tax; or

(B) the debtor has previously, with respect to the same tax—

(i) filed a petition in the United States Tax Court or initiated a proceeding in a similar judicial or administrative tribunal under State or local law, unless a stay of any such proceeding under section 362 or 1301 of this title remains in effect for the duration of the case under this title;

(ii) allowed the period of time for filing such a petition or initiating such a proceeding to expire, unless such period expired before the commencement of the case under this title; or

(iii) paid the tax in full to the governmental unit having authority to collect or receive payment of such tax.

(4) Nothing in this subsection shall preclude a determination under this subsection of the dischargeability of a tax or duty on grounds other than the merits of the liability for a tax or duty.

(c) For purposes of this section—

(1) subsection (a) shall apply whether a proof of claim for the liability was filed by a governmental unit or was filed, under section 501 of this title, by another person or entity on behalf of such unit, but if a claim is filed by such other person or entity, the determination by the court in the case under this title shall apply solely for purposes of distribution of property of the estate;

(2) in a case under chapter 7 of this title, the jurisdiction of the court in such case to determine a tax liability of the estate shall be original and exclusive;

(3) an application and determination may be made under subsection (b), whether or not a proof of claim has been filed for any liability covered by the application;

(4) the filing of a proof of claim by a debtor on behalf of a governmental unit under section 501 of this title shall not constitute an application for purposes of subsection (b), but the permitted filing by a debtor of an objection to a proof of claim under section 502 (a) of this title shall constitute such an application;

(5) if the court in the case under this title disallows, in whole or in part, a claim for a tax or duty, and if no application is made under subsection (b), the governmental unit shall not be precluded by any rule of collateral estoppel or res judicata from collecting from the debtor after the case the same amount as the amount of the proof claim filed by the governmental unit, or for a greater or lesser amount, except that—

(A) the amount of the debtor's personal liability for the tax or duty, as finally determined, shall be adjusted to reflect the amount of any such liability that would have been paid from property of the estate if the court in the case under this title had allowed in full a timely filed claim for such liability; and

(B) if the amount of the debtor's personal liability for the tax or duty, as finally determined, is less than the amount from the estate in satisfaction of the tax or duty, no adjustment shall be required to be made in the distribution of property of the estate, but no adjustment referred to in subparagraph (A) shall be made in the case of the debtor's personal liability for a tax excepted from discharge under section 523 (a)(1)(B) or (C) of this title; and

(6) except to the extent otherwise provided in subsection (b), an allowance of a claim for a tax by the court shall not deprive any other court of jurisdiction, under otherwise applicable law, to determine the personal liability of the debtor for the balance of any tax not paid from property of the estate.

(d) Before a case under chapter 7 or 11 of this title is closed, the trustee may apply for a prompt audit of any tax incurred as an administrative expense under section 503 (b)(1)(B) or (C) of this title with respect to which any required return has been filed. If the applicable terms and conditions of subsection (e) are satisfied, the trustee and any predecessor of the trustee shall be discharged from personal liability for the taxes for which an application was made under this section, except that any such discharge shall be void in case of fraud or material misrepresentation by the trustee. In a case under chapter 7 or 11 of this title involving a debtor other than a corporation, in which property of the estate remains, or in the judgment of the trustee, is reasonably likely to remain for return to the debtor, the trustee shall make the application described in this subsection and a discharge of the trustee shall also discharge a predecessor of the trustee and the debtor from liability, including a transferee, for the tax for which the application was made.

(e) For the purposes of this section:

(1) The trustee shall apply in writing to the governmental unit responsible for determining and collecting the liability of the estate for taxes referred to in this section for a prompt audit of such liability. The trustee shall submit with such application an exact copy of the return of the tax to which such application relates, and shall state the name and location of the office where such return was filed. Within 60 days after receiving the application, the governmental unit shall notify the trustee and the court by mail whether the returns are accepted as filed or have been selected for examination. If one or more of the returns are selected for examination, the governmental unit, within 120 days after giving such notice to the trustee, shall notify the trustee by mail of the amount of any unpaid tax for which the estate is liable for the taxable year and shall file with the court a request for payment of the unpaid tax. If an examination of the return cannot be completed within the 120 day period, the court, upon application by the governmental unit before the period has expired and for good cause shown, shall grant a reasonable extension of time to permit completion of the examination.

(2) The conditions of this subsection shall be considered satisfied—

(A) if the governmental unit responsible for determining and collecting the tax for which an application was made under this section—

(i) gives notice to such trustee under paragraph (1) that the return made with respect to the tax is accepted as filed;

(ii) fails to give notice to the trustee as required by paragraph (1) that the return is accepted as filed or is selected for examination; or

(iii) in the event the return is selected for examination, fails to give notice to the trustee as required by paragraph (1) of the amount of any unpaid tax for which the estate is liable; or

(B) upon payment of such tax in accordance with the final order of the court determining the liability of the estate for such tax, unless a notice of appeal from such order is timely filed.

(3) The governmental unit charged with determining and collecting a Federal tax is the internal revenue district in which the case under this title is pending.

(4) Notice shall be deemed to be given by mail on the date of the United States postmark stamped on the cover, properly addressed, in which the notice is mailed.

(2) The confirmation of a plan does not discharge—

(A) a debtor which is a corporation, or a successor to such a debtor under the plan, from—

(i) any tax incurred as an administrative expense described in section 503 (b) (1) (B) or (C) of this title;

(ii) any debt from which an individual debtor would not be discharged under section 523 (a) (1) (A) of this title; or

(iii) any debt from which an individual debtor would not be discharged under section 523 (a) (1) (B) or (C) of this title, unless equity security holders of the debtor, as of the commencement of the case, do not retain or receive, by reason of their equity ownership, any debt or equity interest in the debtor or successor to the debtor under the plan; or

(B) a debtor other than a corporation from any debt excepted from discharge under section 523 of this title.

After confirmation of the plan, any tax referred to in this paragraph may be assessed against and collected from the debtor, or from a successor to the debtor under the plan, within the limits of otherwise applicable law. Notwithstanding other provisions of this paragraph, the debtor, a successor to the debtor under the plan, or the governmental unit to which any tax or debt referred to in this paragraph is owing may accept the provisions of the plan dealing with the assumption, settlement, or payment of any such tax or debt.

(3) After confirmation of the plan, any tax liability of the estate incurred as an administrative expense described in section 503 (b) (1) (B) or (C) may, within the limits of otherwise applicable law, be assessed against and collected from a debtor who was an individual, unless—

(A) the debtor is discharged from liability for any such tax pursuant to the provisions of section 505(d) of this title;

(B) the governmental unit to which any such taxes owing accepts the provisions of the plan dealing with the debtor's liability for or payment of any such tax; or

(C) the effect of the plan is substantially equivalent to a liquidation rather than a reorganization.

On page 525, line 9, strike out "(3)" and insert in lieu thereof "(4)".

On page 525, line 19, strike out "(4)" and insert in lieu thereof "(5)".

On page 553, line 7, before "claims" insert "expenses and".

On page 555, line 25, before "property" insert "payments to be made, or".

On page 555, line 25, after "distributed" insert a comma.

On page 556, line 1, after "amount" insert "or value".

On page 556, between lines 18 and 19, insert the following:

(c) Notwithstanding any other provision of this chapter, the court shall not confirm a plan which provides for payment of a tax claim of the United States in property other than cash, unless the Secretary of the Treasury or his delegate agrees to the terms of payment.

On page 557, line 24, strike out "or".

On page 558, line 2, strike out the period and insert in lieu thereof a semicolon and "or".

On page 558, between lines 2 and 3, insert the following:

(3) referred to in section 1331 of this title.●

ANOTHER HELSINKI MONITOR TRIED AND CONVICTED

● Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I take this opportunity to call attention to the latest example of Soviet persecution of the members of the Helsinki monitoring groups—the conviction and sentencing last week of Ukrainian group member Levko Lukyanenko. While the spotlight of world opinion was focused on the trials in Moscow of Anatoly Shcharansky and Aleksandr Ginzburg and in Vilnius of Viktoras Petkus, in the Ukrainian town of Gorodyna, their colleague Lukyanenko was being tried on identical charges—"anti-Soviet agitation and propaganda." Lukyanenko received the maximum penalty of 15 years: 10 in labor camp and 5 in exile. Lukyanenko, who is 51 years old, has already served a 15-year term for his nationalist activities. By the time he finishes serving this sentence he will have spent nearly half his life in the Soviet Gulag.

The conviction of the Ukrainian human rights advocate brings the total number of convicted Helsinki watchers to 17. Two others—Armenian Robert Nazaryan and Georgian Victor Rtskhiladze—are imprisoned awaiting trial as is Aleksadr Podrabniek, the head of a subgroup on psychiatric abuse. In addition, the Soviet authorities have banished two other Helsinki monitors by stripping them of their citizenship while they were out of the country. All this in order to wipe out the five Helsinki monitoring groups in Moscow, Kiev, Tblisi, Vilnius, and Yerevan. Fortunately, despite an incredibly well-orchestrated crackdown, new members are joining the ranks of the monitoring groups. During the trials of Shcharansky and Ginzburg, it was learned that Sergei Polikanov, a physicist, had become a member of the Moscow group. Perhaps the Soviet authorities will finally learn that their own citizens take seriously the commitments made at Helsinki to "respect human rights and fundamental freedoms" and will hold them to those pledges regardless of the consequences.●

TRIBUTE TO DR. JOHN CHASE, CHIEF MEDICAL DIRECTOR, VETERANS' ADMINISTRATION

● Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, Dr. John Chase, one of the finest and most respected men in our Federal Government, is stepping down after 4 years as Chief Medical Director of the Veterans' Administration. Tomorrow is his last day in that position.

Based on my own personal and professional knowledge, Jack Chase is a man of great integrity, a man of dynamic ability, a first-rate manager of our Nation's largest centrally controlled health care system, and a physician who deeply cares about the well-being and health of our Nation's veterans.

He has supervised a system of 172 hospitals, 89 nursing homes, 219 outpatient clinics, and 16 domiciliaries serving nearly 180,000 patients every day.

Jack Chase has been responsible for a network of health care services that employs 10,500 physicians, 1,000 dentists, and 30,000 nurses; its university-affiliated hospitals train almost 87,000 health care personnel annually.

He directed the VA's $100 million yearly research program with 6,000 individual projects—resulting in two Nobel Prizes in 1977.

This is an awesome job and one that Jack Chase has handled with compassion, keen insight into the needs of America's veteran population, and dedication.

He is a calm professional who was appointed Chief Medical Director at a most difficult time in the history of the VA's Department of Medicine and Surgery. In April of 1974, the Department was in a state of disarray and internal turmoil. The Chief Medical Director has resigned over irreconcilable differences with the then Administrator of Veterans' Affairs who was to be ousted over the dispute.

Moreover, Dr. Chase began his 4-year term at the end of American combat involvement in Vietnam which was marked by the return to this country of hundreds of thousands of veterans bearing the physical and psychological scars of America's longest and most divisive war.

Under his forceful leadership, the VA established medical programs to meet the unique treatment needs of a new generation of American veterans. Drug and alcohol treatment centers to combat addiction in young veterans were established, and the VA redoubled its commitment to treatment of veterans with catastrophic spinal-cord injuries.

Jack Chase's tenure as Chief Medical Director also coincided with the emergence of another major health care issue, the challenge of caring for an aging American veteran population. The majority of this country's veterans served during World War II, and their average age is now 60.

This problem is not as visible or dramatic as the one created by Vietnam, but the rapidly increasing age of the average veteran has tremendous implications for the future of the VA health care system. By taking advantage of this challenge to meet the needs of our World War II veterans, the VA can serve as a model for aiding and treating older Americans all across our country.

Jack Chase has already begun to meet that challenge by significantly expanding the number of beds in VA nursing homes and increasing the commitment of health care resources to nursing home care; by working vigorously for Federal grants to States for the construction and maintenance of nursing homes for veterans; and by making the VA a national leader in the developing field of gerontology and medical research relating to the aging process.

Thanks to Jack Chase, the VA has already created a geriatric fellowship program through which experienced physicians will receive training in the specific health problems of older veterans.

Jack Chase also presided over two major institutional developments during these last 4 years. He guided the Department of Medicine and Surgery through the difficult transition from a health care system in which traditional inpatient hospital care predominated to one emphasizing comprehensive outpatient services and increasingly community-oriented programs for elderly and psychiatric patients.

The explosive growth in the number of outpatient visits—there will be an estimated 15,435,000 outpatient visits in 1979—together with a concurrent increase in inpatient turnover rates placed an enormous financial and administrative strain on the Department of Medicine and Surgery. Jack responded by upgrading ambulatory care sections at VA hospitals and recruiting desperately needed radiologists, pathologists, and other medical personnel for understaffed central services, and he pushed for additional appropriations for construction and renovation work at overcrowded hospital outpatient clinics.

Jack also provided intelligent leadership in fostering the delicate but critical relationship between the VA health care system and the Nation's medical schools. During his 4 years at the helm of the Department of Medicine and Surgery, 25 previously unaffiliated VA hospitals established teaching and residency programs with medical schools, and scores of other VA hospitals strengthened their existing affiliation programs. These new and strengthened affiliations greatly enhance the quality of care being provided in VA hospitals.

Jack Chase is a man who has tried and succeeded. Because of him, the quality of care given to our veterans has been enriched. Because of him, a broad discussion of the role of the VA in relation to national health care strategies has been stimulated.

As VA Chief Max Cleland pointed out:

His many contributions and his intense concern for the welfare of his patients . . . have greatly enhanced the quality of life, not only for America's veterans, but for all Americans.

Dr. Chase, we will all miss you. I know my colleagues join in wishing you and Mrs. Chase the loveliest, happiest life as you return to your home State of Washington.●

FEDERAL PUBLIC TRANSPORTATION ACT OF 1978—S. 2441

AMENDMENT NO. 3310

● Mr. HASKELL. Mr. President, yesterday I introduced an amendment to the Federal Public Transportation Act of 1978, calling for the Department of Transportation, in cooperation with the Environmental Protection Agency, to conduct a study to determine the feasibility of including the nature and extent of an area's air pollution as a criterion in the distribution of mass transit funds. Due to error, the text of my amendment was not included in the RECORD. I ask that the text of my amendment be printed in the RECORD.

The text of the amendment follows:

On page 72, line 17–18, insert the following:

STUDY

SEC. 114. (a) The Secretary of Transportation, in consultation with the Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency, shall prepare and submit to the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs and the Committee on Environmental and Public Works of the Senate and the Committee on Public Works and Transportation and the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs of the House of Representatives, within one year of the date of enactment of this section, recommendations (including draft legislative proposals to accomplish such recommendations) as to ways and means by which Federal mass transit funds can be allocated on a basis which considers the nature and extent of air pollution as a criterion for the distribution of such funds. In formulating such recommendations, the Secretary (in consultation with the Administrator) shall consider and report back to such committees his findings with respect to, but not limited to, the following:

(1) the most appropriate and feasible standards of air quality to be utilized as a criterion of air pollution, including but not limited to, standards for ozone, carbon monoxide, nitrogen oxide, and hydrocarbons;

(2) the most appropriate and reliable methods for measuring and monitoring the above air quality standards, including but not limited to, measuring devices, placement of such devices, frequency of readings, and other procedures relating to measuring air quality;

(3) the most appropriate, feasible, and equitable manner in which air pollution measures can be adjusted to take into account seasonal, meterological, and other variations so that air measures accurately reflect average air quality over a reasonable period of time;

(4) which Federal mass transit program funds should be allocated on a basis utilizing air pollution as a criterion, including but not limited to, programs under sections 3 and 5 of the Urban Mass Transportation Act of 1964;

(5) the relative weight which such an air pollution criterion should be given for the purpose of allocating funds under the above Federal mass transit programs; and

(6) alternative approaches to modifying criteria for allocating Federal mass transit funds which would assure that areas with extensive air pollution receive a proportionately greater amount of funds than areas with a lesser extent of air pollution.

(b) There is authorized to be appropriated such amount as is necessary to carry out the provisions of this section.●

PRELIMINARY NOTIFICATION PROPOSED ARMS SALES

● Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, section 36(b) of the Arms Export Control Act requires that Congress receive advance notification of proposed arms sales under that act in excess of $25 million or, in the case of major defense equipment as defined in the act, those in excess of $7 million. Upon receipt of such notification, the Congress has 30 calendar days during which the sale may be prohibited by means of a concurrent resolution. The provision stipulates that, in the Senate, the notification of proposed sale shall be sent to the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee.

Pursuant to an informal understanding, the Department of Defense has agreed to provide the committee with a preliminary notification 20 days before transmittal of the official notification. The official notification will be printed in the RECORD in accordance with previous practice.

I wish to inform Members of the Senate that such a notification was received on July 26, 1978.

Interested Senators may inquire as to the details of this preliminary notification at the offices of the Committee on Foreign Relations, room S–116 in the Capitol.

The notification follows:

DEFENSE ASSISTANCE AGENCY,
Washington, D.C., July 26, 1978.

In reply refer to: I–6002/78ct.

Dr. HANS BINNENDIJK,
Professional Staff Member, Subcommittee on Foreign Assistance, Committee on Foreign Relations, U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR DR. BINNENDIJK: By letter dated 18 February 1976, the Director, Defense Security Assistance Agency, indicated that you would be advised of possible transmittals to Congress of information as required by Section 36(b) of the Arms Export Control Act. At the instruction of the Department of State, I wish to provide the following advance notification.

The Department of State is considering an offer to a Near Eastern country tentatively estimated to cost in excess of $25 million.

Sincerely,

ERICH F. MARBOD,
Acting Director,
Defense Security Agency.●

PROPOSED ARMS SALES

● Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, section 36(b) of the Arms Export Control Act requires that Congress receive advance notification of proposed arms sales under that act in excess of $25 million or, in the case of major defense equipment as defined in the act, those in excess of $7 million. Upon such notification, the Congress has 30 calendar days during which the sale may be prohibited by means of a concurrent resolution. The provision stipulates that, in the Senate, the notification of proposed sale shall be sent to the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee.

In keeping with my intention to see that such information is immediately available to the full Senate, I ask to have printed in the RECORD at this point the notification I have just received.

The notification follows:

DEFENSE SECURITY ASSISTANCE AGENCY,
Washington, D.C., July 26, 1978.

Hon. JOHN J. SPARKMAN,
Chairman, Committee on Foreign Relations, U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: Pursuant to the reporting requirements of Section 36(b) of the Arms Export Control Act, we are forwarding herewith, Transmittal No. 78–65, concerning the Department of the Navy's proposed Letter of Offer to the United Kingdom for major defense equipment, as defined in the International Traffic in Arms Regulations (ITAR), estimated to cost $22.7 million and support costs of $33.7 million for a total estimated cost of $56.4 million. Shortly after this letter is delivered to your office, we plan to notify the news media.

Sincerely,

ERICH F. VON MARBOD,
Acting Director,
Defense Security Assistance Agency.

LEE METCALF FAIR EMPLOYMENT RELATIONS RESOLUTION

● Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I am pleased to be added today as a cosponsor of Senate Resolution 431, the Lee Metcalf Fair Employment Relations Resolution, and I urge the leadership to bring this measure to the floor as soon as possible.

Presently, employees of the U.S. Senate have no job protection. They serve entirely at the whim of their employers. The Equal Pay Act of 1963, title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 and the Age Discrimination Employment Act of 1967 do not apply to our employees. Evidence of discrimination in congressional hiring practices came to light several years ago. Studies done recently, by such groups as the Capitol Hill Women's Political Caucus, indicate the Senate still has far to go to equalize treatment of women, minority groups and handicapped employees.

The public gets upset, and rightfully so, when Congress enacts a law for the good of the people, but does not consider the law good enough to apply to Congress. Our employees should enjoy freedom from discriminatory practices and have a recourse against discrimination similar to that available to every other employee in the country.

I think the mechanism established by Senate Resolution 431 will protect Senate employees without infringing on our ability as U.S. Senators to hire individuals suited to our needs as legislators with a particular political background and specific geographical interests. Our employees will have, for the first time, a means of challenging discriminatory actions with respect to hiring, firing, promotions, compensation, and other employment-related benefits. The mechanism will be a Senate Fair Employment Relations Board which will be composed of individuals who do not owe allegiance to any particular Member. The resolution sets out the complaint process and allows ample provision for informal resolution of disputes.

I hope that very few complaints will have to proceed through the formal complaint stage. Rather than an exception, the Senate should be the model in fair employment practices. This resolution will lay the ground work for that goal.●

MINORITY TRUCKING CONTRACTING OBSTACLES

● Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, over the past year I have been quite active in seeking expanded opportunities for minoritories in the trucking industry. I joined Congressman PARREN MITCHELL and the Minority Trucking Transportation Development Corp., in supporting petition ex parte No. 107 before the ICC to encourage agencies of Government to increase utilization of minority firms for the transport of Government cargo. I have also urged the ICC to aggressively implement reform of its operating authority regulatory policies so as to provide greater opportunity for small and minority truckers.

Mr. President, I would like to share with my colleagues a July 26, 1978 column by Jack Anderson on the issue of the increased costs that accrue to taxpayers as long as rigid and inflexible regulatory rules operate to deny greater opportunity to smaller carriers. While I have no first-hand familiarity with the facts reported by Mr. Anderson, I have become increasingly aware of a pattern of waste of the sort described by Mr. Anderson. I intend to explore this issue in greater depth as part of the Governmental Affairs Committee's deliberations on transportation regulatory reforms.

The column follows:

MOVING STORY

The brass at Offutt Air Force Base in Omaha has bumped the low bid of a struggling black trucking firm, given a free lift to a white competitor and taken the taxpayers for an $80,000 ride in the process.

The case illustrates the almost insurmountable odds faced by minority businessmen trying to get a slice of the federal contract pie, despite high-sounding orders from President Carter to give such firms favored treatment whenever possible.

Ward Smith, the black owner of an Omaha trucking company, submitted the low bid on a contract to move household effects of Offutt personnel. But the contract was awarded to a white mover who had bid $80,000 more—all because Smith, stymied by hide-bound state and federal regulations, was certified to move goods only within the city of Omaha.

To get necessary authority for the smaller percentage of moves outside Omaha, Smith would have had to undergo a costly, time-consuming application procedure with no guarantee of success. And the Offutt brass hats refused to split the award into two contracts and give Smith at least part of the business.●

LEO LESMEISTER: OUTSTANDING POSTMASTER AND CITIZEN

● Mr. BURDICK. Mr. President, the July 1978 issue of the Postmasters Gazette included an article about one of North Dakota's leading citizens, Leo Lesmeister. Having known Mr. Lesmeister for a number of years, I have had the good fortune of witnessing first-hand his unselfish commitment to his family, community, and the Postal Service. Leo Lesmeister is a shining example of what "interested citizen participation" truly means.

Mr. President, I ask that the article be printed in the RECORD.

The article follows:

LEO LESMEISTER: OUTSTANDING POSTMASTER AND CITIZEN

(By Edward J. Ziman)

The title "postmaster" is synonymous with community service, community activity, and community participation. They are the rare exception among the nation's 30,000 postmasters who restrict their activity to their work at the post office.

If a survey were to be taken, it would certainly disclose that many postmasters serve their communities as chairmen of fund raising projects, as city officials, as chairmen and members of various boards and committees, as religious instructors, as little league coaches, as scoutmasters, and in many other areas.

An attempt was launched to find an individual who was both outstanding as a postmaster and in community service. The search indicated that it would be very difficult, if not impossible, to surpass the efforts of the NAPUS vice president of the Minneapolis region, Leo Lesmeister of Halliday, ND, a city with a population of about 450.

Leo is "Mr. Halliday, ND." For years he has worked at improving conditions in the city and making it a more desirable place to live.

Ask Leo how many hats he wears and he will reply, "First of all, I am the postmaster," a title he has enjoyed since 1956. During his tenure he has moved to new quarters, added another rural route, and increased his box section considerably.

Another hat that Leo wears in Halliday is that of mayor. He was elected to his first term in 1970. Since that time he has experienced no opposition and has been elected to two more four-year terms.

Through his efforts the city has received a grant from the federal government in the amount of one million dollars. Determining how to spend so much money wisely was a tremendous job, involving countless meetings with the community, meetings with the city council, and meetings with engineers and contractors. Now he still has the responsibility to see that the original plans are carried out.

These two positions would keep an ordinary person well occupied, but not Leo. He is also chief of the Halliday Fire Department, a position he has held continuously since 1952. In 1966, when the Halliday rural fire district was organized, he was selected chief of that group and still holds that position today. The rural fire district comprises approximately 720 square miles plus 76,000 acres of land on the Fort Berthold Indian reservation.

Fortunately fires occur only occasionally, but Leo still meets with the firemen at least once each month for a meeting and a training session. Of course the completion of the many forms and reports rests upon his shoulders.

The rural fire district also provides an ambulance service for the area. Who is in charge? No need to ask! Leo is head of the ambulance squad which at times makes runs up to 250 miles each way for medical aid. Each month he and the other members of the squad train for one evening. This continual training is evident because the residents of the area are proud of their service and claim that it is one of the best in the western part of the state.

Leo relates several incidents in regard to his experiences with ambulance runs. He said "This type of work really provides a sense of satisfaction. On two separate occasions the coroner had pronounced a man and a woman dead, but we continued to work on them and we revived both. Of coure, this is the rare exception, not the normal occurrence."

On another occasion he successfully revived a young girl who was on the verge of death and had already lost consciousness. He dislodged the blockage in her throat and revived her.

Perhaps the reason why the ambulance service is so good is because Leo is a certified Red Cross instructor for the state of North Dakota. He is also associated with the Heart Association and is often called upon to give CPR demonstrations in various parts of North Dakota.

The walls of his office at home are covered with awards he has received over the years. The one in which he takes the greatest pride is the "Service to Humanity Award" presented to him in 1974 by the North Dakota JC's.

Another hat that Leo wears is that of chairman of the Dunn County Housing Authority. Through his efforts the city has received 20 housing units for the elderly. "Seeing the satisfaction on the faces of these people was sufficient reward for all my efforts," said Leo.

In the past Leo had served as chief of police for the city of Halliday and also as Dunn County deputy sheriff. Upon his appointment as postmaster, he resigned both of these offices. In the face of trouble he was fearless, often exposing himself to danger. He recalls on one occasion how he was called upon to disarm a man who had barricaded himself in his home on the Fort Berthold Indian reservation. "He had several rifles with him and he took a few shot at me. Fortunately, his aim was not accurate. Eventually we subdued him."

Despite the unpleasant tasks associated with this type of work, Leo appears to have no enemies. Evidently it is because he treats everyone fairly, honestly, and justly and commands the respect of his entire community and the surrounding area.

For 12 years Leo also served as a member of the Halliday Board of Education. During this time he was associated with the youth of the city as scoutmaster.

Is that all that he does? Hardly! He is active in church affairs, being a member of St. Paul's Catholic Church.

As a postmaster Leo was actively involved in NAPUS circles for many years. He served the North Dakota chapter as chairman of various committees. Moreover, he was an instructor at NAPUS seminars and training sessions. In North Dakota he will be remembered most for the five one-year terms he served as president of the chapter. This in itself was a feat unmatched in the history of North Dakota NAPUS. Surprisingly enough, he could have continued as president had he not voluntarily given up that office one year ago. During his administration the North Dakota chapter prospered and emerged as a power.

Last year at Phoenix, AZ, Leo was elected national vice president of the Minneapolis region. This was fitting recognition for a man who had devoted so much time and effort to help every North Dakota postmaster, many of whom were not even members of NAPUS.

Despite all of these activities, Leo is a family man. He and his wife Joyce have seven children, two of which are still living at home. Joyce is also a postal employee. She has been employed as a clerk at the Halliday post office since 1956 and now also serves as a clerk-carrier for the Dickinson SCF.

We are familiar with the saying, "Let George do it." In North Dakota, especially around Halliday, people say, "Let Leo do it because we know that it will be done and be done well."●

S. 3317—HEALTH WARNING LABELS ON ALCOHOLIC BEVERAGES AND CIGARETTES

Mr. BELLMON. Mr. President, on Tuesday, July 19, 1978, I introduced S. 3317, a bill to require the Secretary of HEW to provide for health warning labels on alcoholic beverages and cigarettes. I requested unanimous consent that the entire text of the bill be printed in the RECORD. Unfortunately, sections 3 and 4 of the bill were omitted from the RECORD. I ask unanimous consent that the bill be star printed and that the bill be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The text of the bill follows:

S. 3317

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. The Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act is amended by the addition of a new section, section 903 (21 U.S.C. 393) as follows:

SEC. 903. The Secretary shall prescribe, by regulations issued in accordance with the provisions of section 553 of title 5, United States Code, statements relating to health which shall be contained on the labeling of alcoholic beverages and the labeling of cigarettes.

SEC. 2. Section 5 of the Federal Alcohol Administration Act (27 U.S.C. 205) is amended by the addition of the quoted language in subsection (e):

(e) LABELING.—To sell or ship or deliver for sale or shipment, or otherwise introduce in interstate commerce, or to receive therein, or to remove from customs custody for consumption, any distilled spirits, beer, wine, or malt beverages in bottles, unless such products are bottled, packaged, and labeled in conformity with "any regulation prescribed by the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare, pursuant to section 393 of title 21, United States Code," and with such regulations, to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, with respect to packaging, marketing, branding, and labeling in size and fill of container.

SEC. 3. Section 4 of the Federal Cigarette Labeling and Advertising Act (15 U.S.C. 1333) is amended as follows:

It shall be unlawful for any person to manufacture, import, or package for sale or distribution within the United States any cigarettes the package of which fails to bear such statement or statements as the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare may prescribe by regulation issued pursuant to 21 U.S.C. 393. Unless and until the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare shall so prescribe a different statement or statements, it shall be unlawful for any person to manufacture, import, or package for sale or distribution within the United States any cigarettes the package of which fails to bear the following statement:

"Warning: The Surgeon General Has Determined That Cigarette Smoking Is Dangerous to Your Health."

Each statement required to be placed on a cigarette package by this section shall be located in a conspicuous place on every cigarette package and shall appear in conspicuous and legible type in contrast by typography, layout, or color with other printed matter on the package.

SEC. 4. Section 5 of the Federal Cigarette Labeling and Advertising Act (15 U.S.C. 1334) is amended by the addition of the following underlined language:

(a) No statement relating to smoking and health, other than the statement or statements required by section 1333 of this title, shall be required on any cigarette package.

TRIBUTE TO SENATORS CRANSTON, LEAHY, AND ABOUREZK

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, I spoke on the Senate floor Tuesday, July 25, 1978, concerning my amendment to the Security Assistance Act of 1978 to prohibit use of U.S. funds and assistance for the Mexican program to spray marihuana with the dangerous herbicide paraquat. At that time, I did not mention that my distinguished colleague Senator CRANSTON of California joined me, as well as Senators LEAHY and ABOUREZK, in cosponsoring the amendment. I very much appreciate the support of the assistant majority leader and his demonstrated concern for many Californian citizens, in particular young Californians, whose health may be jeopardized by the paraquat spraying.

UNANIMOUS-CONSENT AGREEMENTS

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that at such time as Calendar Order No. 887, S. 3243, the local public works bill, is called up and made the pending business before the Senate—with the understanding that it not be before 3 o'clock p.m. on Monday—there be a time limitation agreement on the bill as follows:

One hour for debate on the bill, to be equally divided between and controlled by Mr. BURDICK and Mr. STAFFORD, with 30 minutes on any amendment and 15 minutes on any debatable motion, appeal, or point of order if such is submitted to the Senate, except that on an amendment by Mr. WEICKER, there be a time limitation of 1 hour, and that the agreement be in the usual form.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that at such time as Calendar Order No. 945, S. 2384, the veterans pension bill, is called upon and made the pending business before the Senate—with the understanding that it not be before 1 o'clock p.m. on Monday—there be a time limitation agreement on the bill as follows:

One hour on the bill, to be equally divided between and controlled by Mr. CRANSTON and Mr. STAFFORD; with 30 minutes on any amendment and 15 minutes on any debatable motion, appeal or point of order, if such is submitted to the Senate, provided that there be a 1-hour limitation on an amendment by Mr. JAVITS, and that the agreement be in the usual form.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that at such time as Calendar Order No. 779, S. 2584, the Nuclear Regulatory Commission authorization bill, is called up and made the pending business before the Senate—though with the understanding that it not be called up before August 7—there be a time limitation on that bill as follows:

One hour on the bill, to be equally divided between and controlled by Mr. HART and Mr. STAFFORD, with 30 minutes on any amendment, except on one amendment designated as the Hart-Domenici amendment, on which there be a time limitation of 1 hour; provided further, that there be a time limitation of 15 minutes on any debatable motion appeal, or point of order, if such is submitted to the Senate, and that the agreement be in the usual form.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

AMERICAN INDIAN RELIGIOUS FREEDOM

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask that the Chair lay before the Senate a message from the House of Representatives on Senate Joint Resolution 102.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following message from the House of Representatives:

Resolved, That the resolution from the Senate (S.J. Res. 102) entitled "Joint resolution American Indian Religious Freedom", do pass with the following amendment:

Strike out all after the resolving clause, and insert: That henceforth it shall be the policy of the United States to protect and preserve for American Indians their inherent right of freedom to believe, express, and exercise the traditional religions of the American Indian, Eskimo, Aleut, and Native Hawaiians, including but not limited to access to sites, use and possession of sacred objects, and the freedom to worship through ceremonials and traditional rites.

SEC. 2. The President shall direct the various Federal departments, agencies, and other instrumentalities responsible for administering relevant laws to evaluate their policies and procedures in consultation with native traditional religious leaders in order to determine appropriate changes necessary to protect and preserve Native American religious cultural rights and practices. Twelve months after approval of this resolution, the President shall report back to the Congress the results of his evaluation, including any changes which were made in administrative policies and procedures, and any recommendations he may have for legislative action.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I move that the Senate concur in the House amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

ORDER FOR RECOGNITION OF SENATOR MORGAN TOMORROW

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, are there any orders for recognition of Senators tomorrow?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair informs the majority leader that there are none.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I thank the Chair.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that after the two leaders or their designees are recognized under the standing order tomorrow, the Senator from North Carolina (Mr. MORGAN) be recognized for not to exceed 15 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I ask unanimous consent that following the recognition of Mr. MORGAN on tomorrow, the Senate resume its consideration of S. 2820, the Federal reclamation dam safety measure.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR RECESS UNTIL 9:45 A.M. TOMORROW

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate completes its business today, it stand in recess until the hour of 10 o'clock tomorrow morning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the convening time be changed to 9:45 a.m.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

PROGRAM

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, the Senate will convene at 9:45 a.m. tomorrow.

After the two leaders or their designees have been recognized under the standing order, the Senator from North Carolina (Mr. MORGAN) will be recognized for not to exceed 15 minutes, after which the Senate will resume its consideration of the bill S. 2820, to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to construct, restore, operate, and maintain new or modified features at existing Federal reclamation dams for safety of dams purposes.

There is a time agreement on that bill. Rollcall votes may occur on the bill and/or on amendments or motions in relation thereto.

Upon the disposition of that bill, under the order the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the International Monetary Fund bill, which is S. 2152. Rollcall votes are expected to occur on amendments thereto, and it is possible that other measures may be cleared for action during the day.

Senators may anticipate a good day's work tomorrow, with rollcall votes.

RECESS UNTIL 9:45 A.M. TOMORROW

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, if there be no further business to come before the Senate I move, in accordance with the order previously entered, that the Senate stand in recess until the hour of 9:45 a.m. tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and at 6:11 p.m., the Senate recessed until tomorrow, Friday, July 28, 1978, at 9:45 a.m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES—Thursday, July 27, 1978

The House met at 10 a.m.

Rabbi Herbert J. Mandl, Kehilath Israel Synagogue, Kansas City, Mo., offered the following prayer:

Almighty G-d, we ask Thy blessings on our country, and these, our Representatives, who help legislate laws to further the peace and welfare of all Americans.

Universal Father, help us to unite all the citizens of our Republic by a bond of genuine brotherhood. Sustain us in our endeavors to eradicate prejudice and preserve the precious ideals and democratic institutions of our American way of life.

Enable true liberty-loving men the world over to witness the fulfillment of the vision of our prophet; "Nation shall not lift up sword against nation—neither shall men learn war anymore." Bless these, our legislators, with wisdom and understanding to guide us and the world, as well, to peace and friendship. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

The SPEAKER. The Chair has examined the Journal of the last day's proceedings and announces to the House his approval thereof.

Without objection, the Journal stands approved.

There was no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. Chirdon, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House that on July 21, 1978, the President approved and signed bills of the House of the following titles:

H.R. 2176. An act to amend the Accounting and Auditing Act of 1950 to provide for the audit, by the Comptroller General of the United States, of the Federal Reserve System, the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, and the Office of the Comptroller of the Currency, and for other purposes;

H.R. 9757. An act to impose a moratorium on any increase in the public lands grazing fee for the 1978 grazing year, and for other purposes; and

H.R. 11232. An act to authorize appropriations to carry out the Standard Reference Data Act, and to authorize appropriations for the National Bureau of Standards.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Sparrow, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 5146) entitled "An act to amend the Tariff Schedules of the United States to provide for the duty-free entry of competition bobsleds and luges."

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendments in which the concurrence of the House is requested, a bill of the House of the following title:

H.R. 12255. An act to amend the Older Americans Act of 1965 to provide for improved programs for older persons, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate insists upon its amendments to the bill (H.R. 12255) entitled "An act to amend the Older Americans Act of 1965 to provide for improved programs for older persons, and for other purposes," requests a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and appoints Mr. WILLIAMS, Mr. EAGLETON, Mr. KENNEDY, Mr. CRANSTON, Mr. CHAFEE, Mr. HAYAKAWA, and Mr. JAVITS to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate insists upon its amendments to the bill (H.R. 2777) entitled "An act to provide for consumers a further means of minimizing the impact of inflation and economic depression by narrowing the price spread between costs to the producer and the consumer of needed goods, services, facilities, and commodities through the development and funding of specialized credit sources for, and technical assistance to, self-help, not-for-profit cooperatives, and for other purposes," disagreed to by the House; agrees to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and appoints Mr. PROXMIRE, Mr. SPARKMAN, Mr. MCINTYRE, Mr. BROOKE, and Mr. TOWER to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate disagrees to the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 3084) entitled "An act to amend and extend certain Federal laws relating to housing, community, and neighborhood development and preservation, and related programs, and for other purposes," agrees to a conference requested by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and appoints Mr. PROXMIRE, Mr. SPARKMAN, Mr. WILLIAMS, Mr. MCINTYRE, Mr. BROOKE, Mr. TOWER, and Mr. GARN to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

RABBI HERBERT J. MANDL

(Mr. BOLLING asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BOLLING. Mr. Speaker, Rabbi Herbert J. Mandl, senior rabbi of Kehilath Israel Synagogue which is located in the Fifth Congressional District of Kansas City, Mo., gave the very fine opening prayer we have just heard.

Kehilath Israel is one of the largest traditional synagogues in the State of Missouri with over 4,000 members.

On January 29, 1978, Rabbi Mandl was installed as spiritual leader of the synagogue. I had the pleasure of participating in the installation service.

The rabbi's wife, Barbara, and parents are here, as are several other relatives and friends.

NATIONAL COMMISSION ON SOCIAL SECURITY

(Mr. LEVITAS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. LEVITAS. Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday, of this week, I took the occasion to urge the President to nominate his appointees to the National Commission on Social Security. As the Members will recall, the National Commission on Social Security was established by law last December to make the first comprehensive review of the social security system since 1936 and to recommend fundamental changes to meet our needs for the future.

Mr. Speaker, I have since Tuesday been advised by the White House that the nominees by the President have been selected. They are now undergoing the usual FBI screening, and their names will be sent to the Senate for confirmation in the near future. This is good news.

I would like to point out that the gentleman from Oregon (Mr. ULLMAN), the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, stated, when this legislation passed last year, that it was absolutely essential that this important Commission move expeditiously because this Commission can make the difference.

During the debate, the gentleman from Oregon said:

> I would hope that if we adopt it, the commission is able to organize and get to work quickly on a subject that is terribly important for every American.
>
> Let me say that in accepting this study, I think it is of extreme importance that it be properly constituted, with the best staff available in this country; that we take the problems seriously. I have served on commissions. Ordinarily it takes a year or 18 months even to get organized. I hope that is not the case here. I hope we can move expeditiously, get the proper staffing, and have this commission do what we all expect it to do; that is, look at the whole gamut of retirement and make, in fact, recommendations that will insure that we can move toward a future social security system into the next century.

Mr. Speaker, I trust that the Commission will be appointed promptly.

"BLUNT NEW WHITE HOUSE AIDE"

(Mr. BADHAM asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. BADHAM. Mr. Speaker, our President has engaged the services of a specialist in public relations and put him in charge of what the press has referred to as "polishing his tarnished image."

This highly paid—by the taxpayers—media "expert" began his admittedly difficult task by setting up shop in a large office in the Executive Office Building that was once used by one of our President's predecessors as a "hideaway office."

The new imagemaker for the White House granted an interview in this new office to the Washington bureau chief of the Los Angeles Times as what must be assumed to be part of the opening salvo of his press relations barrage.

Referring to the drapes and furniture in his new office, this image builder for the holder of the highest office in the land pledged that "the first thing I'm going to do is get rid of this San Clemente whorehouse red."

Well, I want my colleagues to know that this highly paid imagineer got off his first shot, and a cheap one at that, by killing two birds with one stone. He not only insulted a beautiful city on the coast of California in my district which he probably has never visited, he also has caused many readers of the Times to wonder just where and how he obtained his expertise in the decor of such establishments.

On behalf of my constituents in that city I greatly resent this comment and as a member of the national legislature with responsibilities to all of our citizens, I wonder again at the people the President hires as personal assistants.

The Los Angeles Times article is as follows:

> [From the Los Angeles Times, July 10, 1978]
>
> BLUNT NEW WHITE HOUSE AIDE—ADMAN CALLED IN TO POLISH CARTER'S TARNISHED IMAGE
>
> (By Jack Nelson)
> When being interviewed in his specious office, where Nixon used to listen to his White House tapes, Rafshoon glanced around at the gaudy red drapes and furniture left behind by the previous Administration and announced:
>
> "The first thing I'm going to do is get rid of this San Clemente whorehouse red."
> The second thing, he said, would be to try to portray Carter as Rafshoon sees him, "as having that steely resolve that came across when he was running for President."

LEGISLATION TO PERMANENTLY REMOVE U.S. TARIFFS ON NATURAL EXTRACTS USED IN PROCESSING LEATHER

(Mr. COHEN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

● Mr. COHEN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak in favor of legislation currently pending before the House of Representatives which would permanently remove U.S. tariffs on natural extracts used in the processing of leather.

Since 1957, Congress has enacted a series of 3-year exemptions from import duties for natural extracts such as chestnut, wattle and quebracho, which are used to produce finished leather. The last such exemption lapsed on June 30. A bill submitted by Representative JAMES BURKE, which has been favorably reported by the House Ways and Means Committee, would make permanent the exemptions on tannery extracts.

This is a clear case where Congress can take action to both promote free trade and protect the interests of American workers. The pending bill would hold down the price of raw materials for the domestic leather products industry. In my own State of Maine, there are 19,900 workers in the leather and leather products industry and, either directly or indirectly, all would benefit under the proposed legislation.

Taking into consideration the wave of leather imports from South America, Europe, and the Far East, I have come to the conclusion that these exemptions are especially necessary. One of the tanneries in my State has already laid off 30 percent of its employees and has reduced production by 40 percent. Imported extracts account for an important share of the cost of producing leather in the Maine plants. A permanent assurance of stable supplies of extracts would reduce the risk to an ailing industry in Maine.

Often, when we lower the tariffs on imports, we must pay a dear price in American jobs. Such is not the case here. There are virtually no domestic suppliers of the natural extracts, which are obtained from trees which are no longer commonly found in the United States. The domestic leather industry buys synthetic extracts, which are not covered by the pending tariff bill, from American firms, but these chemicals are not effective substitutes for natural extracts. Every tanner in Maine to whom I talked reports that both products are necessary to manufacture quality leather.

I urge the House to pass this bill without delay. Unnecessary procrastination in the consideration of this legislation will bring additional hardship to workers in a plagued industry. Rarely is the Congress presented with legislation with so few costs and so many benefits.●

REQUEST TO CONSIDER SENATE AMENDMENTS TO H.R. 11003, CLARIFYING AUTHORITY FOR EMPLOYMENT OF WHITE HOUSE OFFICE AND EXECUTIVE RESIDENCE PERSONNEL

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H.R. 11003) to clarify the authority for employment of personnel in the White House Office and the Executive Residence at the White House, to clarify the authority for employment of personnel by the President to meet unanticipated needs, and for other purposes, with Senate amendments thereto, and concur in Senate amendment numbered 1 and disagree to Senate amendment numbered 2.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the Senate amendments, as follows:

Page 13, strike out all after line 18 over to and including line 2 on page 16 and insert:

"SEC. 113. (a) The President shall transmit to each House of the Congress, and make available to the public, reports containing information described in subsection (b) for each fiscal year beginning on or after the effective date of this section. Each such report shall be transmitted no later than 60 days after the close of the fiscal year covered by such report and shall contain a statement of such information for such year.

"(b) Each report required under subsection (a) shall contain—

"(1) the number of employees who are paid at a rate of basic pay equal to or greater than the rate of basic pay then currently paid for level V of the Executive Schedule of section 5316 of title 5 and who are employed in the White House Office, the Executive Residence at the White House, the Office of the Vice President, the Domestic Policy Staff, or the Office of Administration, and the aggregate amount paid to such employees;

"(2) the number of employees employed in such offices who are paid at a rate of basic pay which is equal to or greater than the minimum rate of basic pay then currently paid for GS–16 of the General Schedule of section 5332 of title 5 but which is less than the rate then currently paid for level V of the Executive Schedule of section 5316 of title V and the aggregate amount paid to such employees;

"(3) the number of employees employed in such offices who are paid at a rate of basic pay which is less than the minimum rate then currently paid for GS–16 of the General Schedule of section 5332 of title V, and the aggregate amount paid to such employees;

"(4) the number of individuals detailed under section 112 of this title for more than 30 days to each such office, the number of days in excess of 30 each individual was detailed, and the aggregate amount of reimbursement made as provided by the provisions of section 112 of this title; and

"(5) the number of individuals whose services as experts or consultants are procured under this chapter for service in any such office, the total number of days employed, and the aggregate amount paid to procure such services.

The information required under this subsection to be in any report shall be shown both in the aggregate and by office involved.

Page 18, line 10, after "1978" insert ", except that no budget authority (including permanent budget authority) which is authorized under these amendments may be obligated or expended during a fiscal year beginning after September 30, 1983, unless the enactment of such budget authority is authorized by provisions of a law enacted after the date of the enactment of this section. For the purposes of this section the term "budget authority" has the meaning given to it by section 3(a)(2) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974".

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Colorado?

Mr. DERWINSKI. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I do so only to give the gentleperson from Colorado the opportunity to explain the legislative situation.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. If the gentleman would yield, Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from Illinois for his request, and I will be more than happy to explain the legislative situation.

As we know, there is a slight disagreement between the Senate and the House; and hopefully, we can work it out. The other alternative would be to go to conference, but we thought we might accept one Senate amendment and disagree with the other amendment which is the 5-year sunset amendment. I know the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. DERWINSKI) has worked very hard against the sunset amendment. We are hoping the other body will accept this compromise and that it will expedite the situation without necessitating a conference.

Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Colorado?

Mr. BAUMAN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, can the gentlewoman from Colorado tell us whether or not the amendment to which the House is being asked by unanimous consent to agree is the other body's suggestion that the authorization for White House operations not be open ended, but be limited, I believe, to a 5-year period; is that what we are agreeing to?

Mrs. SCHROEDER. If the gentleman will yield, that is correct. The Senate put a 5-year sunset provision on the bill. Many people feel we should not have a sunset provision in this case, because if the sun does set, then we will go back to where we were, which means the White House can have any number of employees they want. In other words, we have the authority to put the sunset provision in on this bill, but we really do not have the constitutional authority to "sunset" the whole White House. We know it is always going to be with us. So the 5-year sunset only would apply to the limits not the whole White House.

Mr. BAUMAN. That is the point of view of the individual speaking.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Furthermore, the House did defeat the sunset amendment here by a vote of 171 to 232. Therefore, we feel we should pressure the Senate about this disagreement.

Mr. BAUMAN. Further reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, that is usually done in conference rather than by disagreeing to a Senate amendment. I would suggest that perhaps a conference would be the better method by which to resolve the difference.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Speaker, I think the gentleman knows about the pressure on the calendar before adjournment. We feel with such a strong vote of rejection in the House, 171 to 232, plus the fact that this is a unique kind of sunset amendment allows more expeditious treatment. This is not an executive agency which could be created and destroyed at will—this is really a third part of the Government established by the Constitution; it is the White House. We are not going to be able to constitutionally sunset it through legislation, we can only end the limits we place on it. Sure this is different from the normal sunset provision, I feel the Senate will be willing to settle it in this manner.

Mr. BAUMAN. Further reserving the right to object, I have it on the President's own authority, based on his statement the other day, that no one on the White House staff is above the law.

Mr. Speaker, I do object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard.

APPOINTMENT OF CONFEREES ON H.R. 11003, CLARIFYING AUTHORITY FOR EMPLOYMENT OF WHITE HOUSE OFFICE AND EXECUTIVE RESIDENCE PERSONNEL

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's desk the bill (H.R. 11003) to clarify the authority for employment of personnel in the White House Office and the Executive residence at the White House, to clarify the authority for employment of personnel by the President to meet unanticipated needs, and for other purposes, with Senate amendments thereto, disagree to the Senate amendments, and request a conference with the Senate thereon.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Colorado? The Chair hears none, and appoints the following conferees: Messrs. NIX and UDALL, Mrs. SCHROEDER, and Mr. DERWINSKI.

PROVIDING THAT BOTH HOUSES OF CONGRESS SHALL NOT ADJOURN FOR MORE THAN 3 DAYS OR SINE DIE EXCEPT BY CONCURRENT RESOLUTION ADOPTED BY BOTH HOUSES

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the Senate concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 98) providing that the Senate and House of Representatives shall not adjourn for a period in excess of 3 days, or adjourn sine die, until both Houses of Congress have adopted a concurrent resolution providing either for an adjournment (in excess of 3 days) to a day certain, or for adjournment sine die, and ask for its immediate consideration.

EXPLANATION OF SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 98

(Mr. WRIGHT asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, this is the routine concurrent resolution annually passed by the House and Senate, setting aside our otherwise mandatory adjournment on July 31.

The Senate already has passed the concurrent resolution.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I ask for its immediate consideration.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas for the immediate consideration of Senate Concurrent Resolution 98?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the Senate concurrent resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

S. CON. RES. 98

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That notwithstanding the provisions of section 132(a) of the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946 (2 U.S.C. 198), as amended by section 461 of the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1970 (Public Law 91-510; 84 Stat. 1193), the Senate and the House of Representatives shall not adjourn for a period in excess of three days, or adjourn sine die, until both Houses of Congress have adopted a concurrent resolution providing either for an adjournment (in excess of three days) to a day certain, or for adjournment sine die.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

The was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the Senate concurrent resolution.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present and make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently a quorum is not present.

The Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—yeas 302, nays 44, not voting 86, as follows:

Mr. MARLENEE changed his vote from "yea" to "nay."

So the Senate concurrent resolution was concurred in.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

TENTH ANNUAL REPORT OF DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORTATION—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read and, together with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Public Works and Transportation, the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries:

To the Congress of the United States:

I transmit herewith the Tenth Annual Report of the Department of Transportation. This report has been prepared in accordance with Section II of Public Law 89–670 and covers Fiscal Year 1976.

The Report covers activities of the Department during a period prior to the commencement of my term of office.

JIMMY CARTER.

THE WHITE HOUSE, July 27, 1978.

SUGGESTED MEMBERS FOR DELEGATION TO SALT

(Mr. HYDE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

● Mr. HYDE. Mr. Speaker, Congressman RON SARASIN and I have given a great deal of thought to an appropriate congressional delegation to the SALT negotiations, and have a few suggestions to offer.

Certainly any delegation to SALT should be led by Congressman PEPPER, and the following Members' names suggest themselves as providing food for thought: PICKLE, PEASE, PIKE, ROE, STEERS, QUAYLE, and GINN.

As Vice Chairman, who else but our valued colleague HAM FISH?

We are sure any report submitted by this group would be digested by the Members very, very carefully.●

AMENDMENT REQUIRING CONGRESS TO MAINTAIN A BALANCED BUDGET

(Mr. HILLIS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

● Mr. HILLIS. Mr. Speaker, the results of my annual survey were recently completed and it was not surprising to find that the vast majority of respondents rated inflation as the chief problem the Congress should address. Although inflation is a problem from which none of us escapes regrettably, the Congress far from addressing this issue has contributed to it.

The Federal deficit is widely recognized as a major source of inflation, yet we continue to pass one inflationary measure after another. It has become obvious that we need some type of incentive to bring spending under control. For this reason, I became a cosponsor, as many of my colleagues, of legislation suggesting an amendment to the Constitution requiring the Congress to maintain a balanced budget. There are several such measures pending in the Judiciary Committee. Because I believe it imperative the Congress take action on this legislation, yesterday I took the unusual step of signing the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. LATTA'S discharge petition No. 7. Twenty-nine State legislatures have already petitioned the Congress to balance the budget. How long can we avoid addressing this issue head on? I would like to strongly urge my fellow colleagues to join me in signing this discharge petition. It is my understanding approximately 50 signatures have already been obtained since the petition was initiated this past week. The average American must live within his budget. Why should less be expected from the Congress? ●

PERMISSION FOR COMMITTEE ON BANKING, FINANCE AND URBAN AFFAIRS, TO SIT DURING 5-MINUTE RULE ON FRIDAY, JULY 28, 1978

Mr. NEAL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs may have permission to sit during the 5-minute rule on Friday, July 28, 1978, to hear testimony from the Chairman of the Federal Reserve Board.

No legislation will be considered and there will be no markups during this meeting.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

EXPORT-IMPORT BANK

Mr. NEAL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H.R. 12157) to amend and extend the Export-Import Bank Act of 1945.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. NEAL).

The motion was agreed to.

IN THE COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H.R. 12157 with Mr. LONG of Louisiana (Chairman pro tempore) in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. When the Committee of the Whole rose on Friday, June 2, 1978, the bill had been considered as having been read and open to amendment at any point.

Are there any further amendments?

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. LONG OF MARYLAND

Mr. LONG of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LONG of Maryland: Page 5 immediately after line 6, insert the following new section:

SEC. 8. Section 2(b)(1) of the Export-Import Bank Act of 1945 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"(C) Consistent with the policy of section 501 of the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Act of 1978 and section 119 of the 1961 Foreign Assistance Act as amended, the Board of Directors shall name an officer of the Bank whose duties shall include advising the President of the Bank on ways of promoting the export of goods and services to be used in the development, production, and distribution of non-nuclear renewable energy resources, disseminating information concerning export opportunities and the availability of Bank support for such activities, and acting as a liaison between the Bank and the Department of Commerce and other appropriate departments and agencies.

(b) section 9(b) of such Act is amended by adding at the end thereof the following: "In addition, the Bank shall include in that report a description of specific activities and programs undertaken by it to achieve the policy of section 501 of the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Act of 1978 and section 119 of the 1961 Foreign Assistance Act, as required by subparagraph (C) of this paragraph."

Redesignating the succeeding section accordingly.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. LONG).

The amendment was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. GARY A. MYERS

Mr. GARY A. MYERS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GARY A. MYERS: Page 5, immediately after line 6, insert the following new section:

SEC. 8. Section 7(b) of the Export-Import Bank Act of 1945 is amended by striking out the second and third sentences thereof and by striking out "after receipt of such report together with the reasons, the Congress adopts a concurrent resolution approving such determination." and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "within sixty days of continuous session of the Congress after receipt of such report together with the reasons, the Congress fails to adopt a concurrent resolution disapproving such higher limitation. For the purpose of the preceding sentence, continuity of a session of the Congress shall be considered as broken only by an adjournment of the Congress sine die, and on the days on which either House is not in session because of an adjournment of more than 3 days to a day certain shall be excluded in the computation of the 60-day period referred to in such sentence.".

Redesignate the succeeding section accordingly.

Mr. GARY A. MYERS. Mr. Chairman, what is at issue in this amendment is the question of executive flexibility in pursuit of policies which relate to Eximbank's ability to offer credits to the Soviet Union.

Presently, with respect to the Soviet Union, Eximbank has a $300 million maximum in credits that is available, and the President can only increase that by action in which he recommends to the Congress a lifting of the amount. The Congress would, therefore, then have to approve that action.

The effect of this amendment would be twofold. First of all, it would remove the current Stevenson amendment, which imposes a limitation with regard to the amount of credits that can be given in the area of development and production of fossil fuel energy.

More importantly, what the amendment would do would be to allow the President to offer as a "carrot" to the Soviet Union the opportunity for increased credits above the currently authorized $300 million unless Congress disapproves. This does not in any way prevent Congress from disapproving the increases beyond the $300 million.

What I am trying to do in this area is to allow the President some flexibility so that, instead of acting only on the basis of reprisals when we are unhappy with the Soviet Union's action in international affairs, the President has the ability to offer incentives to the Soviet Union to proceed with policies which would be more in line with what we believe to be the best interests of the people in international situations.

The amendment does not in any way remove the requirements of the current law with respect to the Jackson-Vanik amendment. The Soviet Union would still have to be in compliance with that amendment. What I am trying to get at is that we should allow the President the ability to nudge the Soviet Union in the direction of compliance with Jackson-Vanik by being able to put a "carrot" before it and say, "Here are the items that are available."

The $300 million is available right now, and the Soviet Union has not picked it up. I think one of the reasons for that is that they see it as a maximum limit. There is no incentive for them to go in the direction of compliance with Jackson-Vanik if in fact, they are going to reach a maximum or ceiling under current law.

This amendment does not take away, as I say, the right to disapprove. The President has argued that he, in fact, does want flexibility—and I believe he does need flexibility—in some areas to offer "carrots" instead of only being in a position to use a stick and punish the Soviet Union if affairs are not going the way we think they should.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I am just shocked that, at this stage in United States-U.S.S.R. relations, we would be considering this morning an amendment to relax the trade restrictions in this legislation with respect to the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics. It is clear that the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics has recently committed a flagrant violation of the Helsinki agreements. They have engaged in the most shocking conduct, the most cruel conduct, with respect to the dissidents within the Soviet Union. I am absolutely flabbergasted that this House would consider at this time that it is appropriate to relax trade restrictions and that we would consider that the proper response to that kind of action on the part of the Soviets is to signal the Soviet Union that we are willing to be more generous with them than at present.

Mr. Chairman, I therefore strongly urge that we defeat this amendment.

Mr. GARY A. MYERS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. GARY A. MYERS. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman if it is not his hope that the current increase in hostility between the Soviet Union and the United States is a temporary situation and that, further, the only response that the President now has that he is able to offer in direct response to international frustrations, regardless of how tense they are, is essentially a penalty, the stick effect?

If we read the amendment there is nothing in the amendment that permits the President to offer any increase in credits unless the Soviet Union is essentially in compliance with the Jackson-Vanik amendment. It does not remove the Jackson-Vanik amendment or its provisions.

Mr. Chairman, it is my hope that we find some mechanism—if it is not this mechanism, then some other appropriate mechanism—to move at least back to the stage that we were prior to the installation of the Jackson-Vanik amendment.

If we look at the statistics, they do in fact confirm the fears of many people that the bottom-line effect of these fixed restrictions has been to increase the burden and the pressure on Soviet citizens and decrease the emigration from the Soviet Union.

I in no way endorse those types of actions and situations that have recently been developing in the Soviet Union, but I only want this House and this Government to look at it in realistic terms. The Jackson-Vanik amendment with the current cap has not worked. It is time, I think, to give the President another tool. It does not force him to. I think we have to look at the record of this President. He has in fact indicated he is not going to be extremely lenient. It does provide a 60-day review. If we feel it is inappropriate and the Soviets are not moving in the proper direction internationally, we will have the final say. I want to be an instrument to finding a more appropriate response tool for this administration.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Chairman, I first want to state that I am sure that the gentleman shares with me my shock at the recent actions of the Soviet Union. I never suggested otherwise. But I do want to suggest that this amendment can only be seen as doing something favorable for the Soviet Union, and I do not think that this is the time to do that.

Mr. STANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. STANTON. Mr. Chairman, I wish to compliment the gentleman in the well for pointing out, of course, exactly where we would stand on this amendment and that this is certainly not the time, of all times in the history of the relationship of the two countries, to signal a softening of a good will relationship through this type of signal to the Soviet Union.

While the proponent of the amendment may have had this in mind several weeks ago, that is one thing; but in the light of what the gentleman in the well has pointed out, and in the light of the activities in the last few weeks, to send this signal would be counterproductive to what the policy of the Federal Government, is at the present time.

Mr. Chairman, I join the gentleman in strongly urging the defeat of this amendment.

Just for the Members' attention and for their benefit, of course, the controlling point of view is the Jackson-Vanik amendment as far as the relationship with the Soviet Union is concerned. There is another section, in the bill which this amendment deals with, in which case, if the amount is over $300 million, it would have to come to the Congress for approval.

This amendment, of course, reverses that. The President could do it unless the Congress vetoed his action, more or less.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I strongly urge defeat of this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York (Mr. GREEN) has expired.

(On request of Mr. GARY A. MYERS and by unanimous consent, Mr. GREEN was allowed to proceed for 3 additional minutes.)

Mr. GARY A. MYERS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. GARY A. MYERS. Mr. Chairman, of course, the timeliness of offering this amendment has been severely crippled. Perhaps if the Soviets had, in fact, taken different actions, certainly, in their internal affairs over the last few weeks, I would have felt more comfortable. The fact of the matter is that I might have been precluded by a more senior member of the House moving in this direction and bringing the amendment to the floor.

The facts are that Jackson-Vanik coupled with limits such as this cap in its present context, has not been working to the advantage of those people who want to emigrate.

I think we also have to address the question of the events of the last few weeks, as to whether they are just unfortunate developments or whether they are a signal for a long-term fight in which we are going to entrench ourselves and be in such a position that the only reaction we can make is to ask for international penalties of some sort.

Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that we owe it to ourselves to at least give consideration to move to a conference in which the wisdom of the House and Senate may or may not be exercised on this subject. However, if we take such an adamant view that we only want to try to invoke international policies with respect to the Soviet Union's domestic handling of their affairs through the stick and the penalty approach, then I think we should reject this approach.

I think it is necessary that there be a reasonably open mind with respect to what is the proper response to recent events. I disagree with the decisions that they have made. I wish they had not made them. I think that if, in fact, the matters had gone the other way, which I think is the gentleman's desire and every other Member's desire, that the amendment may have gone through here rather easily.

However, Mr. Chairman, I did not think I could realistically withdraw the amendment. It was on record that I intended to offer it. If I had withdrawn it, I think it would have been a signal that I endorsed the idea that we should only penalize or that I felt the current situation is a long-term trend and that we should use no other tools than reprisals and penalties.

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I completely agree with the gentleman in the well in his opposition to the pending amendment.

It seems to me that the way the Soviets would regard passage of this amendment and the way they would use it—as they did the statement of Ambassador Young—would be very detrimental to any relationship we might be able to build in the future. I think it is a very inappropriate time now. It might make some sense at some other time, as has been pointed out before; but I think at this time it would definitely be used by the Soviets for their own devious purposes.

Again, Mr. Chairman, I commend the gentleman for his statement.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman from California (Mr. LAGOMARSINO).

Mr. NEAL. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I would just like to say that I think the gentleman from New York and the gentleman from Ohio made the case in their very excellent way. I think the gentleman from Pennsylvania is attempting to deal with a very serious problem, but it just seems, as the gentleman who preceded me has said, that this is the wrong time to send this kind of signal to the Soviet Union. I would like to commend the gentleman for his thoughtfulness, but I certainly would urge defeat of the amendment.

Mr. GARY A. MYERS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEAL. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. GARY A. MYERS. Mr. Chairman, I will engage in colloquy because it is the gentleman's committee which has dealt with the Jackson-Vanik amendment what its impact has been with regard to Eximbank activity. Does the record show that Jackson-Vanik has in fact improved the record of immigration from the Soviet Union? It is my understanding that was the objective of it. Does the record prove that?

Mr. NEAL. I say to the gentleman that I personally do not think the Jackson-Vanik has been very helpful. Our committee does not deal with Jackson-Vanik, so I could not give the gentleman a committee position on it. It is my understanding, and I would agree, that we should reconsider that, probably next year. I would think this would not be the time to take it up in this highly charged election year, but I think we should reconsider that, and a lot of these other problems also. I am just saying that now is the wrong time to send that kind of signal to the Soviet Union.

Mr. GARY A. MYERS. On the point that now is not the time, a critical decision is to be made. It seems to me that if we are setting ourselves for a long, entrenched action-reaction type of international situation, the attempt to deal with Jackson-Vanik and its true impact later down the road may be much more difficult than it is today.

I think what we have right now is a record which has been established with fairly amicable relationships between the Soviet Union and ourselves on a relative basis over the last few years. We see that provision has not worked. If it in fact turns out, as it probably will, we can use only the stick approach, then the argument for change might be much weaker a year from now. That is why I think it is important that we consider seriously whether now is the time we give the President a little bit of working room in his dealings with the Soviet Union, just enough so that he can see whether the Soviets are going to return to a more favorable situation in this regard. If it does not happen, he does not have to recommend it. In our interpretation, if a request from him is inappropriate, we can disagree.

But, I cannot accept the argument that we must wait another year. I think the next year is critical in the relationships between the Soviet Union and ourselves. I cannot endorse what they have done, but I cannot ignore the fact that we have a serious responsibility. In my opinion, unilaterally we have been able to affect the Soviet Union's response in respect to the request for immigration. Now, we cannot just cast aside the full impact of that with some very narrow assessment of this important U.S. activity.

I think we have to approach this over a longer time. Certainly, by the time the President would come back for any request it would give us another 3 or 4 months, and another 60 days after that to attempt to evaluate the situation.

Mr. NEAL. Has the President requested this kind of authority?

Mr. GARY A. MYERS. As the gentleman well knows, the President is not going to a second-term Republican Member and ask him to offer this amendment.

Mr. NEAL. Did he ask anyone?

Mr. GARY A. MYERS. I think if the gentleman looks at the President's public requests, he certainly has asked the Congress for more flexibility in the day-to-day dealing in international affairs. I see that signal clearly. I would hope that the majority party would see that signal clearly. He is not the President of my party. I could accept the majority's criticism if in fact we were one administration back and the President was a Republican. I have heard what he has said. He has said, "Don't put any crippling amendments on these international institutions. Give me flexibility."

Mr. STANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEAL. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. STANTON. Mr. Chairman, this is all very good discussion, but I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania realizes that the Jackson-Vanik amendment does not come in original jurisdiction out of our committee. It comes from the Ways and Means Committee, the Tax Act of 1974. We added the Eximbank on to that, but if the gentleman wants to look at the Jackson-Vanik amendment, this is the wrong format for that.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired.

(At the request of Mr. GARY A. MYERS and by unanimous consent, Mr. NEAL was allowed to proceed for 3 additional minutes.)

Mr. GARY A. MYERS. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield further, in response to the gentleman from Ohio it seems to me that just by the nature of the subject matter that we are dealing with here, we are involved in the implication of the Jackson-Vanik amendment.

The committee certainly had a bill under its jurisdiction with which they could have made a response. Now whether it comes from another committee or not, I am not on the gentleman's committee, but I cannot ignore the impact of it. The bottom line of this amendment is that it does not change Jackson-Vanik. It changes the method in which the President can increase the credits to the Export-Import Bank, and that is specifically under the jurisdiction of the gentleman's committee and I think specifically his committee should have asked why that $300 million has not been picked up by the Soviet Union and why they have not improved with respect to Jackson-Vanik.

It would have been appropriate for the gentleman's committee to have considered it and it is somewhat inappropriate for his committee to put blindfolders on and say that since it is in the original jurisdiction of another committee the gentleman's committee should not deal with it.

We can involve ourselves significantly with the impact of it in international relations. If the Banking and Currency Committee does not want to do that, that is fine. But I think they have the opportunity to wedge in and have some little bit of leverage in that area.

I think the comments of the gentleman from Ohio are somewhat incorrect as to the involvement of this committee. That is a difference of opinion between him and me. I am somewhat on quicksand here, but I wanted to bring to the attention of the Members that Jackson-Vanik is not working, the $300 million has not been picked up by the Soviet Union, and the President is not probably going to ask for anything above it because there is not an incentive.

I do not know whether this is an appropriate solution.

Mr. NEAL. I thank the gentleman from Pennsylvania for his comments.

I would still have to urge defeat of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. GARY A. MYERS).

The amendment was rejected.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. LONG OF MARYLAND

Mr. LONG of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LONG of Maryland: Page 5, immediately after line 6, insert the following new section:

SEC. 8. Section 2(B) of the Export-Import Bank Act of 1945 is amended by inserting at the end thereof the following new section:

"(9) Maintenance of free enterprise requires that foreign producers not have access to U.S. financing and markets on terms better and cheaper than those available to U.S. producers. It is the policy of the United States not to provide financing at subsidy rates to foreign industries which directly compete with the products of American firms and their workers.

"The bank shall not extend, or participate in the extension of loans, guarantees, insurance or credit in connection with establishing or expanding production of any commodity unless the President certifies in a report to Congress based on statistical findings set forth in the report, that the commodity is not in surplus and its import into the United States will not cause substantial injury to U.S. firms and employees producing the same, similar or competing commodity."

Mr. NEAL. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. LONG).

Mr. Chairman, I personally think that this would be the most damaging amendment that we will deal with today. It could be very costly to businesses in this country, to profits in this country, and to our capacity to produce.

The fact of the matter is that it does not accomplish anything. As the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. LONG) just said, if we do not finance the steel plant in Trinidad, Tobago, and if we do not finance some of the other projects in some of the other countries of the world, that there are other countries who will. The world is full of competition for our markets and they will be happy to do it.

In fact, since the gentleman mentioned the steel plant in Trinidad, Tobago, let us talk a little bit about it.

The Government there came to the Export-Import Bank some time ago and asked for financial assistance for this project. The Export-Import Bank, because they were worried about the competitive situation, as they are required to be worried about it in the making of their loans, therefore refused. So the Government of that country went to the French, they went to the Germans, and so on, to build the plant which it planned to build, with $60 to $70 million out of those other countries. Now the Export-Import Bank is saying that the plant will be built anyway, so why do we not let our own exporters in on some of this business since we are running a $20-billion-a-year deficit, and they agreed. And there has been no objection, because the majority of the people in this body recognized the fact that this kind of proposal has no effect.

The project goes ahead anyway. All we do is lose the jobs and profits in this country.

Mr. LONG of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEAL. I will be happy to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. LONG of Maryland. How does the gentleman meet my argument that most of this steel will be sold in the United States, not in the countries that are building the plants, and the only way they can guarantee access into the U.S. market is to get an Eximbank loan, as a result of which they can always say, if we do not go ahead, if the steel is prohibited from coming into the United States, then we will not get our money back. So they have to have the Eximbank loan in order to make the future of that steel firm in Trinidad a viable one. How does the gentleman answer that?

Mr. NEAL. Let me ask the gentleman, has that happened before? Has anyone conditioned the repayment of an Eximbank loan upon entry into our markets?

Mr. LONG of Maryland. That is exactly it. We have been building steel capacity all over the world, and we are ruining our steel industry.

Mr. NEAL. What I am saying to the gentleman is I share his concern. I do not want to see this happen, but what I am trying to say is whether we make the loan or not makes absolutely no difference. The plant is going to be built anyway. The only difference it makes is we give that business to the West Germans, the French, the Japanese, or someone else.

Mr. LONG of Maryland. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEAL. I will be happy to.

Mr. LONG of Maryland. I do not know how far along this steel plant is.

Mr. NEAL. It is about $70 million along.

Mr. LONG of Maryland. All right. What happened was they got some sort of a wink or a nod to begin with that the Eximbank would help finance it and that would guarantee the access to U.S. markets. If we slam the door on this, we shall teach them a lesson in the future and there will not be any more of this. That is what I want to do. I want to tell the developing world, listen, no more of this stuff of conspiring to create production that is going to come into the U.S. market, with U.S. investment.

The Iron and Steel Institute has just announced that 45 percent of imports of steel into the United States in May are not from Japan, not from Europe, but from the developing countries, mostly plants that the Eximbank helped to build and that is guaranteeing their production, because we cannot slam the door on their imports without their saying, oh, we will not get our investments back.

Mr. NEAL. That has not happened, I will say to the gentleman. I think it is pure speculation. It may or may not happen. It could happen, I guess, but it has not happened. We get the full faith and credit of the government that we are doing business with. It is conceivable that they would default on a loan. As the gentleman knows, the loan repayment history for Eximbank is just excellent. There have been very few defaults. The Eximbank, as the gentleman knows, makes money for us.

Mr. LONG of Maryland. If the gentleman will yield, it is an absolute fact, and there is no question about it, that the steel industry in the United States is hurting because of vast imports from the developing world. That is not speculative; that has happened.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. NEAL was allowed to proceed for 3 additional minutes.)

Mr. NEAL. I would just like to say to the gentleman that I share his concern, but this amendment in this bill would do nothing about it. That is the point, I will say to my friend. It does not do anything. All it is going to do is hurt our exports. It is not going to do anything about imports. The gentleman is concerned with these imports. I would argue with the gentleman if he proposes protectionist measures to keep the imports out that we must move very cautiously in that area. But the fact is that this amendment—the gentleman is concerned about imports—would do nothing about imports.

Mr. LONG of Maryland. Let me say it will do something about imports because there are plans under way to build as much as 500 million tons of steel capacity in the developing world. Whether they all will get built or not, I do not know. A minimum estimate is a steel capacity equal to the capacity of the United States, and that cannot be built unless it is known that we are going to be subsidizing the production facilities, and that having subsidized the production, we will not slam the door against imports. They are counting on the steel coming into the United States. They would be foolish to build that steel capacity unless they could bring it into the United States, because none of the other countries—Japan, Germany, and the countries helping to build those plants in Trinidad—would help in the building of those steel plants in their countries. They are counting on it coming into our country.

Mr. NEAL. But this amendment does not speak to that problem.

Mr. LONG of Maryland. I have to disagree with the gentleman. I think it goes precisely to that problem. I am for free enterprise. I do not believe we should be subsidizing even in the United States, but certainly not our foreign competition.

Mr. NEAL. Let me say to the gentleman the Eximbank does not really subsidize production in other countries. There is not a dollar of Eximbank funds that leaves this country. It all finances a product to be exported. There is no subsidy of other countries. This is not an aid bill, as the gentleman knows.

This is a trade bill. This means jobs and profits for people in our country.

Mr. LONG of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield further, the statement of the head of the American Iron and Steel Institute before my Hearing definitely stated that in his opinion this is a subsidy because it provides interest rates backed by the U.S. taxpayer that are not available to U.S. firms to help build domestic production; so we are giving better terms to foreign producers of steel than we are providing to our own steel industry. That is why for years people have been saying the American steel industry consists of a bunch of antiquated rust pots.

Mr. NEAL. These interest rates are market-related rates. Last year their profit was something like $50 million. They have to make money. They have to pay their own way. They do not come here for an appropriation to run their business. It is a moneymaking business. They offer rates that are competitive to what other exporting nations are offering. Their rates are sometimes higher, sometimes lower than domestic rates, depending on the rate in competition and the interest rate in effect.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. NEAL) has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. NEAL was allowed to proceed for 5 additional minutes.)

Mr. LONG of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield further so I could respond on that. If it were true that this were purely competitive, there would be no need for an Export-Import Bank at all.

In fact, the Wall Street Journal has a very interesting article in today's paper which states that the Export-Import Bank cannot improve the balance of payments and bolster the dollar in the short run.

Mr. NEAL. No one claims they are doing it in the short run.

Mr. LONG of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield further, it states:

WE SHOULD RESTRAIN U.S. FINANCING OF EXPORT PROGRAMS

(By Stephen H. Goodman)

The essence of the economic policy problem facing America is that every economic interest group—agriculture, labor and the business and financial communities in particular—recognizes the need to reduce government spending but continues to support programs that serve its special interests. How many captains of industry and finance, for example, preach the virtues of the free enterprise system four days a week and spend the fifth day in Washington seeking greater government assistance?

A striking example of the business and financial communities acquiescence to the growth in government spending is their support of the House bill to extend the life of the Export Import Bank and, in effect, to increase its commitment authority by 47% to nearly $60 billion. Despite the increasing interest at least in the concept of reducing government spending (and the administration's commitment to zero-based budgeting) this year's review of the bank was much less thorough than the last examination in 1974. At that time, a number of very serious questions were raised—some in the editorial columns of this paper—about the economic rationality of the very existence of the Bank.

Apparently the huge trade deficit and the weakening dollar have muted criticism of the Export Import Bank as well as of other export promotion programs. Indeed, the Carter administration is planning to expand and enlarge government export promotion efforts as a key element in its program to defend the dollar despite the near universal recognition by economists of every persuasion that these efforts cannot significantly improve the balance of payments.

Clearly the Export Import Bank cannot improve the balance of payments and bolster the dollar in the short-run. Any exports stimulated through the Banks programs—both monetarist and Keynesian economists believe the volume is not likely to be large, although for different reasons—will generally only be shipped after a lag and will generate the bulk of their balance-of-payment receipts only when the credits are repaid, often many years later. Thus, the positive effect on the trade account—if any—is largely offset by the debit on capital account.

To the extent that the Bank's credits do not stimulate additional exports they will have an adverse effect on the short-run balance of payments by contributing to the capital outflow. Export Import Bank credits consequently may actually accentuate the sharp swings in U.S. balance-of-payments performance and the value of the dollar by shifting receipts from periods of balance-of-payments stingency and a depreciating dollar to periods of balance-of-payments strength and a rising dollar.

This phenomenon is clearly illustrated by the recent Bank decision to provide a credit to All Nippon Airways to finance two Boeing 747 SR aircraft and similar loans and guarantees to other major foreign airlines including the official airlines of countries with growing trade surpluses such as Lufthansa and JAL. All Nippon, spurred by Japanese government efforts to increase imports from the United States, had already decided to purchase these aircraft and could have easily arranged the necessary financing in the private market or through the Export Import Bank of Japan.

The Export Import Bank, however, taking advantage of its preferred access to capital as a government agency, undercut the competition from foreign and U.S. private lenders, offering the Japanese an 8% credit for a total term of eight years—far more favorable terms than are available to most private borrowers. Thus, the Export Import Bank was successful—successful in offsetting the favorable short-term balance-of-payments impact of the export sale while adding to the government deficit, thereby crowding out private capital and exacerbating inflationary pressure.

Other examples of the Bank's "successes" include: a credit to Japan to finance the sale of U.S. cotton to be made into textiles, much of which will be exported to the United States; a credit to Algeria to finance the transportation of liquid natural gas being brought to market at prices substantially above the controlled domestic price and above the price we are willing to pay for more secure Mexican gas; a credit to Jamaica to finance a steel mill the bulk of whose output will be exported to the already troubled U.S. market.

Those who benefit from the Bank and other export promotion programs sometimes justify their call for increased government support by citing the need to meet "unfair" officially supported foreign competition. But if other countries wish to inflate their governments' deficits in order to give away their exports, it's no justification for us to do the same.

It is interesting to note that among the major countries, Germany and Switzerland provide the fewest officially supported export credits and have the least costly export promotion programs, yet these are countries with strong and appreciating currencies. The United Kingdom, on the other hand, has the most costly export promotion program but faces periodic balance-of-payments crises.

Clearly, the best way to effectively meet foreign competition is to provide a superior product at a competitive price. This requires an environment conducive to growth with price stability, an environment in which government support for programs of questionable value is substantially reduced, including export promotion programs such as the Export Import Bank.

This call for restraint in the government export promotion effort is not a call for the total abandonment of the Export Import Bank and their government programs where they serve justifiable and well defined purposes. The Bank can play an important role, for example, in assuming—using insurance principles—those reasonable commercial and political risks that the private sector is unable or unwilling to undertake.

I say if we are going to subsidize, let us subsidize our own steel industry to compete with these countries, not put up import barriers and not subsidize our foreign competition.

Mr. NEAL. If the gentleman wants to subsidize some domestic industry, that is certainly an interesting idea and we ought to consider it in the proper committee and with proper hearings, but that is not what we are here for today.

The language of the amendment is extremely vague. It says, "not in surplus." Does that mean scarce or not superabundant? We do not know what it means. Do we ask the President to make the determination? How?

Markets change quickly. Take the example of a steel mill. It takes several years to plan and build a steel mill. Steel may be in surplus under the terms of this amendment today, but a year from now we may have a great shortage of steel. I do not know what is going to happen. I do not think anybody else does, either.

The amendment requires a Presidential determination for every single transaction in which the Eximbank engages. In the course of our hearings, the major complaint that business people voiced about the Eximbank is that they are not as competitive as other financial lending institutions that they compete with because of bureaucratic delays and paperwork and so on.

This would only add another layer to that. What we will be doing by this amendment is sending a signal to the rest of the world that, yes, in fact, we have finally decided we are going to go protectionist, and surely the gentleman knows that would invite retaliation from all around the world.

If we adopt this amendment, we would lose $1.6 billion in exports, which translates into a loss of between 50,000 and 90,000 jobs in this country, not to mention the profits.

That is not to mention the fact that it would exacerbate our trade deficit and weaken the value of the dollar. I just say that it is a very ill-advised amendment, and I urge its defeat.

Mr. LONG of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. NEAL. I will be happy to yield to the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. LONG of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, whatever the Export-Import Bank says or whatever it pretends to mean, it is clear that most economists take a different position. The Wall Street Journal, which is no radical outfit, states this: Most economists agree we do not improve our balance of payments or our exports by subsidizing this type of industry. For one thing, it just gives out more money and more credit, and that does not improve our balance of payments; we just get more I O U's.

We have enough of those I O U's already. What we need to do is to improve our own industries to help us with our balance of payments. We do not get this with the Export-Import Bank, and these credits are given out at low interest rates.

The senior vice president of the American Iron and Steel Institute has said that these "Exim loans are at subsidized interest rates," and that they are subsidized loans to foreign producers.

Mr. NEAL. He is simply mistaken in that.

Mr. LONG of Maryland. Mr. James Collins of the American Iron and Steel Institute says that these "Exim loans are at subsidized interest rates in terms of the ability of our steel companies to obtain such loans * * *" That is the position also of the executive committee of the steel caucus.

Mr. NEAL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman answer this question for me?

I have talked to some members of the steel caucus, and I was informed they did not endorse this proposal. Is that not correct?

Mr. LONG of Maryland. I said that the executive committee voted for this.

Mr. NEAL. The executive committee voted in favor of it?

Mr. LONG of Maryland. They voted in favor of it.

Mr. NEAL. Was this proposal not put before the entire steel caucus for its consideration and they refused to endorse it?

Mr. LONG of Maryland. No, this was not put before the whole caucus. It was put before the executive committee, and the executive committee voted to support it.

Mr. NEAL. Whatever the vote was, it did not include the rest of the members.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. NEAL) has expired.

(On request of Mr. LONG of Maryland, and by unanimous consent, Mr. NEAL was allowed to proceed for 3 additional minutes.)

Mr. LONG of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield further, other supporters of the amendment are the American Textile Manufacturers Institute, the International Ladies Garment Workers, the Amalgamated Clothing and Textile Workers, and the American Federation of Labor-Congress of Industrial Organizations. Translated, that is the AFL–CIO. It also supports this amendment.

I repeat that this amendment is not protectionist; it is the opposite. I believe that protectionism is subsidy, and I am against subsidy of our own industry and of foreign industry, especially when foreign industry hurts U.S. industry.

Mr. BROYHILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEAL. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. BROYHILL. Mr. Chairman, is the gentleman aware of the action that was taken a year or so ago when American taxpayer money was used to rebuild the Egyptian textile industry? Is he not familiar with that transaction that took place a year or so ago?

Mr. LONG of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from North Carolina will yield further, I understand the gentleman is referring to the Egyptian textile industry, and I was not aware of that.

Mr. BROYHILL. In any event, this is a perfect example of what the gentleman is talking about, where American taxpayers' money is being used in a way that would have a detrimental effect on domestic industry.

Mr. STANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEAL. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. STANTON. Mr. Chairman, I will just say to my friend, the gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. BROYHILL) that he does make a point in this regard. and he is absolutely right. Supposedly, and I am not sure that they did, a year or two ago Egypt did get an Export-Import Bank loan for textile machinery to improve their textiles.

The point the gentleman in the well is making in opposition to this amendment is that if we did not give it to them, the Germans would have, and they would have built that textile plant in the same way and at the same time, one way or another. I do not know how that would have come out financially, but we could not have stopped that plant from being built at that particular time. That is the point.

Mr. Chairman, we have listened to the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. LONG) for quite awhile, but when the gentleman gets on the subject of banks, that is another matter. But here, on the subject of the Export-Import Bank, when he tries to put in the type of restrictions he is talking about, regrettably, he is being counterproductive.

I do not know how many Members have been listening to the gentleman in the well, the gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. NEAL), but I submit that what the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. LONG) is doing is costing Americans jobs by his amendment. I am not just saying that. The only other authority we can appeal to is the Export-Import Bank people themselves. If they are not the authority, nobody is.

They tell us that the Long amendment will cost 65,000 American jobs. That is 140-some jobs in every congressional district in the country. Not only that, but it will cost us $1.8 billion in trade. Yet here we are talking about the extent of our problems with balance of payments and all the rest of it. That is the point I think the gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. NEAL) is making.

I would say further to the gentleman that we could never convince the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. LONG) in our arguments with him, because I have listened to him before.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. NEAL) has again expired.

(On request of Mr. STANTON, and by unanimous consent, Mr. NEAL was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. STANTON. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield further, and if I may continue, as I was saying, I think we ought to get on with this question, because I am convinced we will never convince the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. LONG). I admire the gentleman for defending his position, but I have heard it 10 times before. I have heard it all over and over as to who is in favor of that position and who is not.

Mr. Chairman, I say that we should get on with the vote here. This amendment is just counterproductive and will cost American jobs. That is why the State Department, the U.S. Government, the Commerce Department, the Export-Import Bank, and industry, and, hopefully, labor, are opposed to such an amendment.

Mr. NEAL. That is a good point, I would say.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to point out, along these same lines, that the gentleman has listed a long list of supporters. One of them is the AFL–CIO.

Mr. STANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield on that point?

Mr. NEAL. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. STANTON. Mr. Chairman, we have heard about this steel caucus. I stand here and I mention this point: Within 120 miles of my hometown and within my congressional district and the surrounding area is 80 percent of the steel-producing efforts of the United States of America. Three out of five of the largest corporate headquarters are surrounding my area. Do the Members think I would stand up here and fight against this amendment if I thought it would cost American jobs? Why, I would be absolutely crazy to do that. I say, let us get down to the fact that the gentleman from North Carolina pointed out. It is absolutely counterproductive.

Mr. NEAL. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman mentioned earlier that he thinks the Export-Import Bank is financing 25 percent of the world steel production. Is that the figure?

Mr. LONG of Maryland. If the gentleman will yield, it has financed 50 percent of the steel production capacity in the underdeveloped nations of the world. In other words, $4.6 billion has been financed by all of the various banks of the Export-Import Bank. The Export-Import Bank, $2.6 billion, which is more than half. Thirty-seven million tons of steel capacity in the developing countries.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. NEAL) has expired.

(On request of Mr. LONG of Maryland and by unanimous consent, Mr. NEAL was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. NEAL. Mr. Chairman, let me say to the gentleman that the Bank tells me that they have financed about 2 percent of foreign steel plants built in the early 1950's. I guess we will have to try to get at the bottom of the figures.

There is one other point, and that is that the Bank is already required to take into account the effect those exports will have on domestic jobs and profits. They have a system which works. If it can be demonstrated that the costs outweight the benefits, then they should not be making the loans.

Mr. Chairman, I would just say that we should move toward freer and more open trade. Let us defeat this amendment.

Mr. LONG of Maryland. If the gentleman will yield further, I think I made my argument, but let me respond to one point that the gentleman from Ohio made.

The gentleman from Ohio said the Export-Import Bank claims that my amendment is going to cost a lot of jobs. Is the gentleman claiming, then, that the various union organizations are conspiring with CLARENCE LONG to cost their industries a lot of jobs?

The International Ladies Garment Workers, the Amalgamated Clothing and Textile Workers, the AFL–CIO, the American Iron and Steel Institute—all of those labor organizations—apparently do not agree with the Export-Import Bank that my amendment is going to cost a lot of jobs. On the contrary, they think, and they have told me overwhelmingly, that it is going to save jobs.

We have been using American taxpayers' money to export jobs to other countries. Incidentally, once we export these jobs to other countries, the firms, once they get their money abroad, they do not pay any more income taxes until they bring their money back into this country. The figures recently released show that 150 corporations are paying more income taxes to foreign countries than they are paying to the United States.

Mr. NEAL. Mr. Chairman, would the gentleman like to apply that principle to our exports if he had the oportunity?

Mr. LONG of Maryland. Only the subsidized exports of the American taxpayers.

Mr. NEAL. Mr. Chairman, I urge the defeat of the amendment.

● Mr. CONTE. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment of the gentleman from Maryland. I voted against the insertion of language similar to this during the foreign operations appropriation markup. Placing restrictions on the loan and financing actions of the Export-Import Bank, which on the surface appears to benefit our domestic industry, would on an overall basis, do more harm than good. Allow me to explain.

First. The Eximbank is unique among export credit agencies, because its mandate requires it to support projects in which it has a reasonable assurance of repayments on all loans. For this reason, the projects it seeks to fund are generally very desirable to finance. The projects are as attractive to other countries as to the United States. Therefore, if they are not funded by the United States, they will most certainly be taken up by other countries.

In other words, the withdrawal of U.S. funding does nothing to stop completion of a potentially harmful steel mill or sugar processing facility in another country. The potential of the projects to inflict damage to U.S. industry exists regardless of whether or not we fund the project. And the benefits that would accrue from the purchase of American machinery, construction material, and the other necessary means to implement the projects would be lost by the rejection. Such action would further escalate the already unprecedented balance-of-payments deficit—a deficit of $31.5 billion in the international merchandise account.

Second. The Eximbank estimates that similar but less restrictive language, section 508, which appears in this year's foreign assistance appropriations bill, could cost the United States $750 million to $1 billion in exports by the year 1980. The Department of Labor estimates that every billion dollars in exports creates 40,000 domestic jobs. These jobs would be sacrificed to protect other jobs which for a variety of reasons may be unsavable. The crucial question of whether the U.S. employment generated by the exports required is greater than the potential U.S. employment lost cannot be addressed if Mr. Long's suggested language is adopted. The anticompetitive nature of the amendment will drive up prices on the affected commodities, thus fueling inflation. If the amendment is adopted, we may be saving our face, by cutting off our nose.

Third. Most importantly, the restrictive approach as set forth by Mr. Long would hurt the U.S. bargaining position in achieving an effective solution to overcapacity and oversupply in the international market. The only way to get a grip on this problem is for all of the international export credit agencies to get together and take multilateral action against the creation of overcapacity. It makes little sense to stop the Eximbank from funding projects as long as other nations are eager to take our place in these projects. All nations with such programs must show restraint before a solution can be found. For the United States to pull out of projects which other nations are willing to fund constitutes unilateral disarmament of a sort. It gains us nothing.

For these reasons, I urge rejection of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maryland.●

● Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Chairman, while I share the concerns that this amendment purports to deal with, it seems to me that the conditions it would impose are so rigid as to undermine the ability of the Export-Import Bank to function. There is little doubt that the Export-Import Bank has on occasion been used to facilitate the construction of foreign plants which have significantly undercut domestic American industries. On the other hand, in most cases, the plants would have been built anyway, with or without Export-Import Bank or American participation, so that the loss of American jobs would have taken place in any event. Frequently the only way that American companies have been able to preserve some of their business in various foreign countries has been through the construction of a plant in such countries.

My criticism of the Export-Import Bank is that it has sometimes been used to supply credits for the construction of facilities abroad, even though the private sector, either in this country or the foreign country, was able and willing to supply the necessary financing. I believe that this is the kind of situation in which we should be restricting the Bank's role, but not by the unrealistic and crippling restrictions contained in the amendment before us.●

● Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Chairman, despite the very sincere and well-intentioned arguments of the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. LONG), I am not so sure his amendment is in the best interests of the American working man or the American economy.

I agree with those who may argue that it is our duty to see to it that American industry and the American economy do not suffer from transactions made by the Eximbank. However, I do not believe we accomplish this by passing legislation that is ambiguous, needlessly restrictive and probably, in the long run, capable of bringing about precisely those adverse economic effects it seeks to avoid.

Under current law, the Eximbank Board of Directors is required to "take into account any serious adverse effect of (a) loan or guarantee on the competitive position of U.S. industry * * * and employment." If Eximbank is to be required to consider such facts, the existing statutory language would seem preferable.

The amendment of the gentleman presumably would focus on whether a particular commodity was in surplus at the time the transaction was authorized. Even assuming that we can determine whether something is "in surplus on world markets" I question whether we should impose restrictions on proposed transactions unless the surplus condition was likely to exist at the time the exported productive capacity was "on line."

Many of the transactions financed by Eximbank involve construction periods of 2 or 3 years, during which time no increased productive capacity would exist from the export. During this period, there may be occasions in which substantial new demand can reasonably be projected.

An amendment of this nature is unnecessarily restrictive. Present language permits Eximbank to examine the impact of the transaction on U.S. industry and employment as a whole and not just the impact on "producers of the same, similar or competing commodities."

As I understand, it is the present Eximbank practice to examine two important factors:

A. Would the absence of Eximbank support for the transaction reduce the potential for adverse impact, and

B. Would the U.S. economy receive a net benefit if the transaction goes forward (in other words, is the U.S. employment generated by the export greater than the potential U.S. employment lost).

Since all Eximbank money must be spent in the United States, buying U.S. equipment and supplies, Eximbank loans stimulate additional export markets for U.S. goods, above and beyond the value of the loan itself. Preliminary analysis of projected fiscal year 1979 activity indicates that approximately 20 percent of potential Eximbank activity will involve commodities that arguably have "surplus" world capacity at present. If only half of these projected transactions were prohibited by this amendment, Eximbank authorizations alone could be reduced by $400–$500 million per year. This could result in a reduction in U.S. exports of up to $1 billion per year.

Mr. Chairman, adoption of this amendment will inhibit our exports. It is one more example of an antiexport policy. Business Week recently described the United States as "The Reluctant Exporter." We had a record trade deficit of $31.5 billion in 1977, and the first quarter of 1978 set still another record with an all-time high deficit of $11.2 billion for January–March 1978. While our trade deficit rises, and an administration task force is trying to come up with ideas for expanding exports, this proposal adds still another new obstacle to exports and exporters.

The issue is not whether projects abroad are going to be brought to fruition. Competitive equipment and financing are available from other countries. The question is whether the United States will get a share of the sales and jobs that go into building new facilities that will be built in any event.

In summary, Mr. Chairman, there is no apparent guarantee that any protection will be accorded any U.S. commodities through this amendment.

There is a very real possibility that other industries and the economy in general will be seriously harmed by this approach.●

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. LONG).

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. LONG of Maryland) there were—ayes 2, noes 13.

Mr. LONG of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, I demand a recorded vote, and pending that, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Evidently a quorum is not present.

The Chair announces that pursuant to clause 2, rule XXIII, he will vacate proceedings under the call when a quorum of the Committee appears.

Members will record their presence by electronic device.

The call was taken by electronic device.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. A quorum of the Committee of the Whole has not appeared.

The Chair announces that a regular quorum call will now commence.

Members who have not already responded under the noticed quorum call will have a minimum of 15 minutes to record their presence. The call will be taken by electronic device.

The call was taken by electronic device, and the following Members failed to respond:

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LONG of Louisiana, Chairman pro tempore of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill H.R. 12157, and finding itself without a quorum, he had directed the Members to record their presence by electronic device, whereupon 358 Members recorded their presence, a quorum, and he submitted herewith the names of the absentees to be spread upon the Journal.

The Committee resumed its sitting.

RECORDED VOTE

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The pending business is the demand of the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. LONG) for a recorded vote.

Mr. LONG of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, I renew my demand for a recorded vote.

A recorded vote was ordered.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—ayes 197, noes 199, not voting 36, as follows:

The Clerk announced the following pairs:

On this vote:

Mr. Roberts for, with Mr. Jenrette against.

Mr. Teague for, with Mr. Burke of Massachusetts against.

Mr. Le Fante for, with Mr. Harrington against.

Mr. Preyer for, with Mr. Ashley against.

Mr. Dent for, with Mr. Shipley against.

Mrs. SMITH of Nebraska and Messrs. DERWINSKI, ENGLISH, EDWARDS of Oklahoma, GAMMAGE, KOSTMAYER, MOAKLEY, RUSSO, WALKER, and ANDREWS of North Carolina changed their vote from "aye" to "no."

Mr. AKAKA changed his vote from "no" to "aye."

So the amendment was rejected.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. GONZALEZ. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I rise for the purpose of asking some questions of the distinguished chairman of the subcommittee, the gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. NEAL) and I have not had the opportunity to have a private discussion a few minutes ago, and this has to do with a very disturbing article that appears in the magazine the Washington Monthly, for the month of June, entitled "Tapping the Federal Till the Occidental Way" by Tom Gilroy and I will read significant paragraphs in order to lay the preface for the questions because I did not want to obstruct in any way the bill and did not prepare any amendment, because I wanted to have a chance to discuss and ask these questions. The article says that in 1954 Occidental Co. secured a 20-year, $20 billion fertilizer trade agreement with the Soviet Union:

In 1974, Occidental signed a 20-year, $20-billion fertilizer trade agreement with the Soviet Union. The agreement, which is extremely complex, calls for the USSR to sell Occidental large quantities of ammonia, the building block for all nitrogen fertilizers. In return Occidental will supply the Soviets with super phosphoric acid used in the production of phosphate fertilizer.

For the Soviets, the deal has a dual purpose. First, they hope it will provide them with phosphate fertilizer they badly need for their agricultural program; and second, they are counting on the trade to generate enough surplus funds to pay off a $360-million loan from the Export-Import Bank that the Soviet Union used to build the ammonia facility in the first place.

To insure that, Occidental accepted two provisions to the trade. It agreed to buy a great deal more ammonia than it would sell of its phosphoric acid, and it also agreed to market most of the Soviet product in the U.S.—thereby keeping Occidental from competing with Soviet ammonia exports to other countries. With the money generated by the sale of the ammonia, the USSR could pay Occidental for its acid and still have enough left to repay the Export-Import loan. In essence, then, a U.S. loan that played a key part in building up the Russian fertilizer industry would be paid off with U.S. dollars supplied by Occidental.

There are several interesting things about the loan to the Soviets. First, although the Supreme Court ruled recently that the terms of the loan may remain secret, reliable sources say that repayment extends over 20 years, with several years' grace period, at a fixed interest rate of six per cent. Except for government credits to less-developed countries, it would be hard to find a more concessionary loan.

But the sad fact is that the money will create more jobs in the Soviet Union than it does in the U.S. Promises of a healthier economy and more jobs—even when true—are the argument that big business uses every time it wants more money from the government.

The article goes on to say that the particulars of this agreement have been and still are maintained in secrecy as a result of a Supreme Court decision that says that the terms of the agreement do not have to be disclosed.

The article goes on and points out that this fertilizer deal would be based on the premise that Occidental would have large quantities of ammonia, which is a building block for all nitrogen fertilizers and Occidental would supply the Soviets with super phosphoric acid which is used in the production of phosphate fertilizer.

Apparently, in the course of this transaction the Export-Import Bank financed the deal for the construction of an ammonia plant in Russia.

The important part of this is in this significant portion of the article which says that there are several interesting things about the loan to the Soviets. First, although the Supreme Court ruled recently that the terms of the loan may remain secret, reliable sources say that the payment extends over 20 years, with several years' grace period, at a fixed interest rate of 6 percent. Except for Government credits to less-developed countries, it would be hard to find a more concessionary loan.

Apparently the hope is that the Russians expect to develop enough surplus funds for this transaction with Occidental in order to pay off the $360 million Export-Import Bank loan for the construction of this ammonia plant in the Soviet Union.

It goes on and says that because ammonia is produced from natural gas, any rise in the price of gas means a rise in the price of ammonia, therefore, the United States will end up in being a dependent for phosphates imported from Russia and we will, in the meanwhile, be importing ammonia from Russia which is competing with a distressed industry now.

Apparently, according to this article, the ammonia production industry in the United States is not in a good financial condition.

This is very disturbing, and I was wondering if the subcommittee or the full committee was aware of this transaction?

Mr. NEAL. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, we are checking out the details of this particular loan the gentleman has referred to, and I am not familiar with it, and I hope to have the information soon. But, in the first place, the Export-Import Bank is prohibited from making any kind of loans to the Soviet Union because of the Jackson-Vanik amendment. I believe the loan the gentleman is talking about occurred many, many years ago. And on the question of concessionary financing, there was a time in the Bank's history when it came under severe criticism from the press and the public that it was making below normal interest rate loans to foreign purchasers of our products. That happened at a time when our entire inflation went way up and our domestic rates went up and we were still promoting exports. That is no longer the case. The bank is required by its charter to make loans at market-related interest rates. They cannot set lower rates. The only time the Export-Import Bank might be involved in the market is if the private money is not available, and further, they are not to compete with private capital. So the Export-Import Bank only makes loans when private capital is not available, and makes the loans at market rates. Historically it has made a good profit. Last year it made, I believe, something like $50 million.

Mr. GONZALEZ. If the gentleman will yield my time back to me, this may be well and true, but, nevertheless, the fact is equally true that on the basis of a loan by the Eximbank this facility has been constructed in Russia and that its product is now in competition with ours.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. GONZALEZ was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. GONZALEZ. The disturbing point about this is that—and I did not bring it up before because I realized the issue on this other amendment would get complicated because in the course of the debate on the Long amendment statements were made, but they were made in a general way. Whereas, and this is disturbing, this article points to one specific transaction, and the author says categorically this will leave the U.S. farmers dependent on the Soviet Union for an important fertilizer ingredient vital to the production of wheat and corn, and that is phosphate, in the future.

Mr. NEAL. I am somewhat at a disadvantage in that I have not read the article, and I know nothing about the accuracy of that statement. I would tend to doubt it, frankly. It does not appear to me that we are dependent. I am just sort of guessing, however. I wish there were someone here who could help us. I am not sure of the status of the phosphate production in this country. I am inclined to doubt that we are dependent on the Soviet Union for anything.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GONZALEZ. I yield to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. McCORMACK. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I have not read the article either, but I would like to point out to the gentleman that there is substantial phosphate production in this country from many sources now, in Idaho, Florida, and various other places, and that we have large resources of phosphate that do respond to market demand. I do not know anything about the situation the gentleman has described in the article to which the gentleman is referring. I do not think it necessarily bad for us to be importing phosphates. They are an essential ingredient, of course, for fertilizer, and the more we get from other sources, the less we have to use of our own supplies. They are undoubtedly a limiting element in agricultural production, but I do not believe that importing phosphates from Russia puts us in a vulnerable position, because we can quickly expand our own production.

Mr. GONZALEZ. According to the article again—and this is the reason I was raising the question because I think we ought to be aware of this; this is a very serious article to read at a time when we are discussing the extension of the Eximbank—what he says here is that in any event we will be dependent on them for phosphates and that U.S. tax resources are being used to undermine an American production.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Texas (Mr. GONZALEZ) has expired.

Mr. McCORMACK. I thank the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Are there further amendments?

Mr. MURPHY of New York. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I want to commend the Banking Committee for its thorough and balanced study of the Export-Import Bank operation. No doubt the Bank needs added authority, which I trust will be provided soon. But the committee also stated that sometimes the Bank fails to promote our exports aggressively, using the authority it already has. I am reminded of recent press reports on the Bank's refusal to help a small firm in its uniform-exporting business, because of a policy against military items.

I would like to address a question to the Chairman.

Is this not an example of a rigid and cautious attitude within the Bank that we cannot afford any longer? Can the gentleman comment?

Mr. NEAL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURPHY of New York. I would be happy to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. NEAL. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman. His point is well taken. The military credit restrictions were enacted when Eximbank unwisely participated in certain armaments sales sponsored by the Defense Department. These restrictions are still important today, but uniforms are not guns or tanks; they are not armaments as contemplated at the time nor are they lethal. I think the Bank erred on the conservative side in interpreting the congressional intent in this specific case. It certainly should have made a distinction between military hard goods and soft goods and, also, between sales by the Defense Department from its own stocks and sales generated in the private sector.

The Bank should bear in mind section 1 of the Foreign Military Sales Act of 1968, as amended, in which Congress declared:

> . . . that the United States and other free and independent countries continue to have valid requirements for effective and mutually beneficial defense relationships in order to maintain and foster the environment of international peace and security essential to social, economic and political progress. Because of the growing cost and complexity of defense equipment it is increasingly difficult and uneconomic for any country, particularly a developing country, to fill all its legitimate defense requirements from its own design and production base. The need for international defense cooperation among the United States and those free countries to which it is allied by mutual defense treaties is especially important since the effectiveness of their armed forces to act in concert to deter or defeat aggression is directly related to the operational compatibility of their defense equipment.

In the case of the small firm in its uniform-exporting business, the apparel industry is highly vulnerable to imports and it is anomalous indeed that any counterbalancing export should fail to receive the full support of the Bank. Yes, this is a good example of the committee's view that Eximbank should push exports more vigorously and aggressively and help clear the trade deficit.

Mr. MURPHY of New York. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for his response.

Mr. HANNAFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I want to commend the chairman of the subcommittee, the gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. NEAL) for this legislation that addresses a time of torrential change in international trading. It is an extremely important piece of legislation and the gentleman has done a most credible job.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to engage the gentleman from North Carolina in a colloquy, if I could.

Perhaps I could pose a question first, Mr. Chairman.

As the gentleman from North Carolina is aware, the sale of Airbus Industrie A300's to Eastern Airlines and of Lockheed L1011's powered by Rolls-Royce engines to Pan American earlier this year greatly disturbed me. The terms of the sales is what troubles me, for I believe some of those terms constitute predatory financing on the part of the European manufacturers.

For example, the British export credit department provided 100 percent financing and guarantees for the Lockheed/Rolls-Royce sale to Pan Am, even though this represented four times the value of the actual Rolls-Royce jet engine content of the aircraft. In addition, the British provided a 15-year repayment term and required no down payment on the purchase. All of these terms were direct violations of the 1975 Standstill agreement of the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development.

I fear that similar violations may occur on the part of our foreign competitors in their zeal to penetrate the world aircraft market in a big way. I ask the gentleman from North Carolina: Will the Export-Import Bank continue to be held to the already abrogated terms of the OECD aircraft agreement when competing with foreign companies in foreign markets?

Mr. NEAL. It is the intent of the committee that the Export-Import Bank meet violations of the OECD agreement on their own terms. That is, if a foreign aircraft manufacturer should offer financing terms in violation of the OECD Standstill agreement, Eximbank should offer commensurate support to American sales efforts that compete with the abrogating party in foreign markets. The goal is to so neutralize the unfair advantage gained by violation of our international agreements that the advantage disappears. I trust the mere authority of the Eximbank to take similar liberties as our foreign competitors will suffice to guarantee that these violations cease.

Mr. HANNAFORD. Mr. Chairman, I thank the subcommittee chairman for this assurance, and I am very pleased to have that assurance.

Mr. Chairman, the Airbus Industrie sale to Eastern Airlines raised a different kind of difficulty. In that case there were no apparent express violations of the OECD agreement. Yet it was French and German Government financing of the Airbus deal that made it so attractive to the airlines. Our aircraft manufacturers simply could not compete with the German and French national treasuries in financing terms.

Ironically, our Export-Import Bank has been extremely reluctant to support our own aircraft sales abroad. Only recently has there been any progress in securing Eximbank financing for such sales. Will the Eximbank continue to be restrained in its support of American aircraft sales efforts abroad?

Mr. NEAL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HANNAFORD. I will be glad to yield to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. NEAL. Mr. Chairman, the Bank has historically been hesitant to finance aircraft sales for essentially three reasons. First, there was a fear that Eximbank resources were not of the magnitude to support both extensive aircraft sales while continuing to support other American sales overseas. Second, there was no reason to support American aircraft sales abroad when only American companies were competing. This was the usual case since American aircraft was technologically superior to its competitors. Finally, there was pressure from U.S. airlines not to support aircraft sales, since it meant that foreign airlines could often operate less expensively than U.S. airlines thanks to U.S. Government financing of aircraft purchases.

Obviously these historical arguments have disappeared. The reauthorization that we are now considering guarantees adequate Eximbank resources for these kind of endeavors. That our aircraft manufacturers now need Eximbank support is clear; the Airbus is a competent and aggressive competitor in every aircraft market in the world.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. (Mr. SISK). The time of the gentleman from California (Mr. HANNAFORD) has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. HANNAFORD was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. NEAL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. HANNAFORD. I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. NEAL. Mr. Chairman, if I may continue, furthermore, the enthusiasm of the British, French, and German Governments in assisting Airbus sales in the United States assures us that our airlines will not suffer if Eximbank supports our aircraft sales overseas.

Consequently, it is the intent of the committee that Eximbank should wholeheartedly support American aircraft sales ventures abroad, especially where American aircraft are in direct competition with foreign aircraft manufacturers. The Bank should extend substantial direct credits to aircraft exporters and take whatever other action necessary to return our domestic aerospace manufacturers to a position of equality in financing capability.

However, the aircraft sales situation is only a symptom of a much broader problem applying to all products, services, and commodities. Since some of the largest exporting nations have been found violating the "gentleman's agreement," the OECD standstill agreement, and the spirit of free trade, the committee recognizes that as a last resort it may be necessary in a few instances to match the questionable practices of these nations in order to demonstrate that the United States will not stand mute while its exporters are forced to compete with foreign national treasuries. If these violations continue, the violators will have to contend with the full faith and credit of the U.S. Treasury.

In the event that other corrective attempts fail and the Bank must take such action as I have just described, the Bank should do so fully aware that it must compensate for below-cost loans with other profit bearing loans. The Bank should know that the committee feels this to be an acceptable option after all other avenues have proven fruitless, and that this approach would be used in an instance or two to insure that the United States does not become the only gentleman left in the game.

Mr. HANNAFORD. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. NEAL) very much for those assurances. I wholeheartedly agree with the approach he is taking in helping to direct the Eximbank on a course of being a changing institution to fit a changing world. I commend the gentleman for his good work, and I certainly support the legislation.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. RINALDO

Mr. RINALDO. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. RINALDO: Page 5, immediately after line 6, insert the following new section:

SEC. 10. Section 2(b) of the Export-Import Bank Act of 1945 is amended by inserting at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"(9) The Bank shall not guarantee, insure, or extend credit or participate in any extension of credit in connection with the purchase or lease of any product by any country, or agency or national thereof, which country, as determined by the Secretary of State, aids or abets, by granting sanctuary from prosecution to, any individual or group which has committed an act of international terrorism. The Secretary of State shall notify the Bank within 30 days of enactment and subsequently thereafter of any such determination and such prohibition shall remain in effect—

(A) unless and until the Secretary of State certifies to the Bank that termination of assistance from the Bank to such country, or agency or national thereof, would not be harmful to national security, or

(B) for 90 days after the date the Secretary of State certifies to the Bank that such country no longer aids or abets any such individual or group, whichever occurs earlier.

Redesignate succeeding section accordingly.

Mr. RINALDO (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

Mr. NEAL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RINALDO. Yes, I am glad to yield to the subcommittee chairman.

Mr. NEAL. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

We have had an opportunity to read the amendment, and we think it is very constructive. I urge its adoption.

Mr. RINALDO. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman.

Mr. Chairman, the amendment I am offering today would prohibit the Eximbank from extending any assistance—insurance, guarantees, or credit—to any nation which harbors international terrorists.

My amendment is patterned after language contained in section 621 of the Foreign Assistance Act (22 U.S.C. 2371).

That provision was added 2 years ago when the International Security Assistance Act was enacted into law.

Under that section of the statute, the President must terminate all assistance * * * "to any government which aids or abets, by granting sanctuary from prosecution to, any individual or group which has committed an act of international terrorism."

Earlier in this Congress, the House and Senate added almost identical language to the foreign aid appropriations bill (Public Law 95–148).

That law states that none of the funds provided under the act "may be obligated for any government which aids or abets, by granting sanctuary from prosecution to, any individual or group, which has committed an act of international terrorism, unless the President of the United States finds that national security requires otherwise."

Although that prohibition applies to the Eximbank, it is only effective for the duration of current appropriations.

My amendment would place almost identical language in the authorizing statute, thus, making permanent the intent of Congress as expressed on two separate occasions.

Additionally, Mr. Chairman, I would like to point out that this amendment has been modified in response to comments I have received from the committee and representatives of the Department of State.

I urge the adoption of the amendment.

Thank you.

Mr. STANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RINALDO. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. STANTON. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, as the gentleman well knows, the majority has already accepted this amendment, and we have had an opportunity for weeks to look at this. I simply want to say that the minority has no objection to it.

The subject has been brought up, though. Does the gentleman have specific examples of what countries this would affect at the present time?

Mr. RINALDO. I called the State Department. At the present time, no countries would be involved. We have already checked this out with the State Department.

Mr. STANTON. Our good friend, the gentleman from Washington, has asked a question on the subject of Libya, for example. He is concerned about an attempt to get that permit lifted at the present time. To the gentleman's knowledge, Libya would not be affected under this amendment?

Mr. RINALDO. Of course, it would depend on the Secretary of State.

Mr. STANTON. On their determination.

Mr. RINALDO. We asked his office just this morning, based on similar language in other statutes, whether or not such a sanction has been applied to any other country as of this date, and we received a negative answer.

Mr. HARKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RINALDO. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. HARKIN. I thank the gentleman for yielding, and I rise in strong support of the gentleman's amendment. I consider his amendment to be in the nature of a human rights amendment. I will be very shortly offering a human rights amendment to this bill. I support the gentleman's amendment on terrorism because I think it fills in a gap which I will openly admit I had not added in my amendment, but which was on my amendment in the past.

I compliment the gentleman in the well for bringing this up to date and filling in a part of a human rights amendment which my amendment did not address itself to. I am hopeful that, with the adoption of the gentleman's amendment and, hopefully, with the adoption of my amendment, the two will complement one another in covering the human rights aspect of this particular piece of legislation.

Again I commend the gentleman for offering this amendment.

Mr. RINALDO. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RINALDO. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding, and I want to commend the gentleman for introducing this amendment. I think it is extremely important. While we do a lot of talking about, we do too little about terrorism. The gentleman's proposal gives some teeth to our combating terrorism and underscores our disdain for these lawless acts and individuals.

Mr. Chairman, I support the amendment offered by my distinguished colleague, the gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. RINALDO) barring the granting of Export-Import Bank credits to any nation which the State Department determines has granted sanctuary to terrorists.

The menace of international terrorism must be fought on many fronts, by all practical means, to rid the international community of hijackings, kidnapings, assassinations, and other vile manifestations stemming from a blatant disregard for human life.

Congress now has before it, legislation to suspend U.S. foreign assistance to nations aiding or granting sanctuary to terrorists, and to cut air traffic to such countries.

Testifying on the subject of terrorism most recently before the Subcommittee on Aviation of the House Committee on Public Works and Transportation, I joined with other interested Members of Congress and concerned individuals to urge expeditious action on legislation directing strong retaliatory measures against nations which assist terrorists in committing their inhumane deeds and which also shield these criminals from the severe punishment to which these individuals should be subjected.

I support this amendment as I believe it will add another needed weapon which this Nation can employ against terrorists and nations backing terrorist causes.

Export-Import Bank credits were designed to assist U.S. exporters in providing competitive credit terms to attract foreign customers. However, while intended to assist U.S. firms, such credits were also designed to contribute to strengthening and developing the economies of those foreign nations with which U.S. firms deal.

The Export-Import Bank was not established for the purpose of in any way assisting economies of countries which embrace the heinous philosophy of terrorism. Neither was the intention to encourage trade between U.S. business concerns and nations flaunting basic tenets of civilized society.

Accordingly, Mr. Chairman, I ask my colleagues to support this amendment seeking to combat terrorism on yet another front.

Mr. RINALDO. I thank the gentleman for his contribution.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the chairman would answer a few questions? There is not a person in this body who could disagree with our concern over terrorism; but at the same time, in dealing with the State Department over a recent denial of an export permit to Libyan Airlines for the purchase of domestically produced aircraft, which were ordered years ago, I am really wondering if we do not have enough flexibility in the existing management of the Export-Import Bank and the existing ability of the State Department to deny export permits, that we really need this language.

Mr. NEAL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. NEAL. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman from Washington (Mr. CUNNINGHAM) is aware that also at Bonn recently the President was trying to negotiate, and apparently had success in negotiating, with other countries to end this kind of activity.

My own feeling is that there is absolutely no harm that I can see in this amendment; and that if it helps in a positive way to speak to this problem, then I would urge the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. I am not saying that I would have to disagree with the gentleman. It is probably not absolutely necessary, and there are probably other ways to deal with it; but this Eximbank bill is before us. We do have the opportunity to speak to this question, and I think it is wise to do so.

No one in his right mind can oppose a concern over terrorism, but what I am concerned about, if the body is unaware of it, is that our relations with Libya are at an almost all-time low. At the same time, the LAA Airlines is a significant Mideast carrier which has an increasing fleet and is now carrying about 1.5 million passengers per year. In the next 7 years it is estimated, I believe, that it will be about 2¼ million passengers since it is anticipating a significant increase in the number of planes that the airline will be putting on its routes as it expands its routes.

Of course, they have in the past permitted terrorists to land there, although they are not doing it now. It is on that basis that members of our State delegation and others have asked the State Department to reconsider their denial of an export permit, at least on a nonmilitary item.

This type of language could technically force this airline, which is a viable airline, into buying, for instance, $1.2 billion worth of the French consortium A300B.

I do not want to disagree with the chairman, but I really wonder if in our zeal to address the terrorism problem we are not making the taxpayers of this country virtually the whipping boys by possibly forcing such countries as Libya to purchase from other countries at a future date.

Mr. NEAL. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield further, I think philosophically, in general terms, I would agree with him.

I think most often these kinds of amendments, including the one we just defeated, which is a good example, are harmful to our country and serve no beneficial purpose.

This amendment seems rather mild to me.

It says a country that aids or abets, meaning currently aids or abets, terrorists, as I read the language. It has two escape clauses, as I see it, or two ways to remove a country from this kind of provision, which seems reasonable to me.

Mr. RINALDO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CUNNINGHAM I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey, the author of the amendment.

Mr. RINALDO. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

We have gone over this amendment very carefully with the State Department.

First of all, at the present time Libya is not harboring any terrorists.

Second, the language, as was just noted by the distinguished chairman of the subcommittee, is very carefully written.

It says that the country, as determined by the Secretary of State, must aid or abet by granting sanctuary from prosecution to any individual or group which has committed an act of international terrorism.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Washington (Mr. CUNNINGHAM) has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. CUNNINGHAM was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. RINALDO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. RINALDO. Thirdly, Mr. Chairman, and I may be redundant here, but as I stated earlier, at the present time, according to the information we received, Libya is not harboring any terrorists. Therefore, there would be no problem.

Finally, I think the gentleman is aware of the fact that as far as aircraft flights go, not aircraft purchases, but flights, this would be covered by the Bonn agreement. There was a new antiterrorists agreement there. Seven countries participated in an expression of will and intent so that if a country harbors hijackers, the seven countries agreed at Bonn that they will not receive flights from the country involved or fly their own planes into it.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I think this is part of a general pattern. I think the sanction should be there.

The sanction is in many, many other laws. This merely puts it into the Eximbank law and makes it a permanent part of the law. I can see absolutely no justification whatsoever for saying that it should not be there even if, in some instances, it does mean that we lose some business.

I, for one, would state that I am probably one of the strongest proponents of business. I want to revise the economy. I want to do everything possible to see the United States get more business. I want to increase our exports, but not at the expense of harboring terrorists. I think this may act as a signal to these other countries that we do mean business. The amendment, which is in so many other laws, is in this particular one. I might say that the amendment was amended after many consultations with the State Department, so it is backed by the State Department, and ostensibly by the administration.

Mr. FINDLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. FINDLEY. Mr. Chairman, just to help clarify the legislative history, am I correct in stating that the author of this amendment did not have Libya in mind in drafting the amendment?

Mr. RINALDO. That is absolutely correct. Libya would not be covered by the provisions at the present time.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. I yield to my colleague from Washington.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. RINALDO) has just answered the very question I was prepared to ask. If we assume that today's situation, as it has been described, continues to exist, and if we assume that there is no aggravation of any sort by Libya, such as providing sanctuary for terrorists, then this amendment, in and of itself, would not provide a barrier to the completion of that sale of commercial U.S. airplanes which is being negotiated?

Mr. RINALDO. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. McCORMACK. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, my big concern is that we are looking at the Eximbank, not another confirmation of the Helsinki agreement. I do not know why we are mixing the two together. Although we all have the concern, I just think that this is an inappropriate vehicle to do this.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Washington has expired.

(At the request of Mr. McCORMACK and by unanimous consent, Mr. CUNNINGHAM was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, I concur with the amendment. Providing the assurances we have been given, I think we are in good shape. No one is more opposed to terrorism than I am, and I believe we can provide economic sanctions to prevent terrorism. I think, however, that with the assurances we have been given, that the amendment serves a constructive purpose, without doing thoughtless damage. I support the amendment.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. I hope my colleagues are aware, for instance, that on the Oshkosh truck situation, where the denial to export was issued, that was predicated on existing law, on the determination that it was not in our best interests as a country to go ahead and export those. Not everything that is impacted by Eximbank is necessarily to our best or our worst interests. I sincerely would again wonder if we should be doing this type of thing on an Eximbank bill instead of addressing the issues in the normal foreign affairs method.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. RINALDO).

The amendment was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. CAVANAUGH

Mr. CAVANAUGH. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CAVANAUGH: Page 5, after line 6, add the following new section and renumber all successive sections accordingly:

SEC. . Section 2(b)(2) is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 2(b)(2). The Bank in the exercise of its functions shall not guarantee, insure, or extend credit, or participate in any extension of credit:

"(A) in connection with the purchase or lease of any product by any country, agency, or national thereof, which the President or Congress determines would not be in the national interest; or

"(B) in connection with the purchase or lease of any product by any other foreign country, or agency or national thereof, if the product to be purchased or leased by such other country, agency or national is to the knowledge of the Bank, principally for use in, or sale or lease to a country which the President determines would not be in the national interest. Any determination made under this section shall be reported to the Congress not later than thirty days following the date of such determination; or

"(C) as otherwise provided in this section.".

Mr. CAVANAUGH (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Nebraska?

Mr. BAUMAN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, the gentleman has two amendments. Can he tell us which one this is?

Mr. CAVANAUGH. This is not the nuclear amendment.

Mr. BAUMAN. I thank the gentleman, and I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Nebraska?

There was no objection.

Mr. CAVANAUGH. Mr. Chairman, I am introducing an amendment to H.R. 12157, the Export-Import Reauthorization Act. My amendment will remove the antiquated prohibitions placed on the Export-Import Bank's extension of credit and allow the Bank to trade with every country in the world, except those expressly prohibited by the President or Congress.

In establishing this procedure, we would be open to a reevaluation of our foreign trade policy. This reevaluation has already begun. We have participated in a lengthy debate on the merits of the Tsongas amendment which prohibits future extensions of credit or loan guarantees to South Africa. The inclusion of this amendment in the Export-Import charter is totally consistent with the intent of my amendment.

In offering this amendment, I am not insisting, or even advocating, that we completely eliminate all trade barriers. I do believe that our huge trade deficits—about $30 billion a year—the continuing devaluation of the dollar, and our struggle against another recession, demand that we use every method possible to strengthen our export program. It is also true that the existing prohibitions on country eligibility in the Ex-Im charter were established almost two decades ago. Both our foreign policy and world economic conditions have changed greatly since that time. I feel it is imperative that we begin now a reevaluation of our trade policies.

It was pointed out this week during hearings of the Subcommittee on International Trade, Investment and Monetary Policy that our old ideas of withholding trade from countries as a punishment for actions which displease us might not have served any purpose, but to cause us to lose export markets. It has been shown that Japan and West Germany have been actively pursuing the very markets which are closed to us by the existing Ex-Im charter. We cannot allow our exporters to continue being outmaneuvered by these aggressive trading competitors.

This reevaluation was addressed by an amendment which was reported out of the Senate Banking Committee as the Stevenson amendment. Senator STEVENSON prohibits Exim extensions of credit to all countries except those expressly determined to be eligible by the President. The Stevenson amendment would establish costly, time-consuming, and ambiguous procedures. In a letter to the Senate Banking Committee concerning this amendment, Secretary of State Cyrus Vance stated this procedure would create serious foreign policy problems in the compilation of the list and would undermine the effectiveness of the Bank at a time when we do desperately need help expanding our exports.

My amendment, on the other hand, provides a workable procedure.

I urge your support of this amendment and your participation in a thorough discussion of our goals in determining a foreign trade policy.

We need to provide our Nation a new, flexible basis for determining which countries ought to be eligible to receive Bank-supported exports with active participation in criteria setting. This process will insure that any prohibitions are consistent with our national interests.

It must also be recognized that my amendment does not affect in any way the applicability of the Trade Act of 1974 in determining the eligibility of nonmarket countries for most-favored nations treatment or other credit programs. My amendment is limited solely to determining eligibility for Bank credit programs.

Mr. KELLY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAVANAUGH. I yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. KELLY. Mr. Chairman, as I understand the gentleman's amendment, it has as an intent the effort to try to enhance the position of the United States in its world trade and to enable us to better fight a depression or recession that might be looming on the horizon. I wonder then if the gentleman's amendment would also override the amendment that now exists in the bill with regard to South Africa?

Mr. CAVANAUGH. It would not.

Mr. KELLY. Then we would still not fight the depression as far as South Africa is concerned?

Mr. CAVANAUGH. What the amendment does is to change the basis upon which eligibility for credit extensions by the Export-Import Bank are to be determined. It would say they would be determined either by the President or the Congress. In the instance of South Africa the Congress has made that determination and I would not disturb any determination which the Congress or at least the House of Representatives has made in previous consideration of that question.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. CAVANAUGH was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. CAVANAUGH. Mr. Chairman, we would transform the basis of eligibility to one of national interest rather than arbitrary political distinctions which have proven hypocritical and inconsistent.

Mr. KELLY. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield further, the question I was trying to address is it would seem as though the real purpose of the Export-Import Bank is to try to promote our industry and help the economy of our country, and the Export-Import Bank is primarily not a foreign aid project but it is something effective.

Mr. CAVANAUGH. I agree absolutely.

Mr. KELLY. And this is a good thing for the United States. Now, since we are going to use this to fight a recession and we are going to use this to fight problems in our own economy, wouldn't we do that with respect to South Africa and every other country

Why would we be willing to deal with the Communists but not South Africa if the purpose is to really try to sell American goods?

Mr. CAVANAUGH. I think, as the gentleman realizes, and as I certainly must realize, that there are political realities that continue to be confronted. Our trade does not exist in a vacuum and the Export-Import Bank does not exist in a vacuum. I am trying to provide a more reasonable basis upon which that determination—and we ought to make the determination if we are going to extend the Export-Import Bank credit opportunities to the countries that we should extend them to, and could be the basis for, as the gentleman says, expansion of U.S. trade and trading opportunities.

That is the fundamental principle of my amendment, and it also incorporates a recognized fundamental that political realities must be considered.

We do not just simply prohibit trading with all Communist countries, because, under existing law we trade with some Communist countries and not others.

Mr. NEAL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to commend the gentleman from Nebraska (Mr. CAVANAUGH) for having worked so diligently on this problem. The gentleman has worked on it for months. This is a very constructive attempt to deal with our own national interests in a rational way.

The Stevenson amendment adopted by the Senate seems to be a much more cumbersome attempt to deal with the same problem.

Again I would like to commend the gentleman. I would also like to ask that the gentleman let us have this as a future position that we might be able to use in our negotiations with the Senate during the conference?

Mr. CAVANAUGH. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, let me say that I have discussed this with the chairman, the gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. NEAL), and I do believe that we share a common goal in the course of addressing the deficiencies of the Stevenson amendment and the very adverse consequences that I think the Stevenson amendment would have not only for the Export-Import Bank but for the implications it would have on U.S. trade policy, and I do not believe that we should set up all of the details of this process as elaborately as the Stevenson amendment does, because I believe that would be disastrous.

I have assured the chairman that my offering of the amendment is simply to raise the point for the House and not necessarily present this as the final or most appropriate solution. So, with the chairman's assurance, to seek elimination of the Stevenson amendment I will ask unanimous consent that I be allowed to withdraw my amendment.

Mr. HYDE. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, as I understand the amendment, then, we are going to stop any impediments by the Ex-Im credits in the Communist countries but that we will continue ostracizing South Africa, is that right?

Mr. CAVANAUGH. That would not be the understanding of the amendment.

Mr. HYDE. Perhaps the gentleman in the well could explain it.

Mr. CAVANAUGH. I have asked unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment.

Mr. HYDE. If the gentleman has asked to withdraw his amendment, then I beg the gentleman's pardon.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Nebraska (Mr. CAVANAUGH) that he may withdraw his amendment?

There was no objection.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. HARKIN

Mr. HARKIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HARKIN: Page 5, immediately after line 6, insert the following new section:

SEC. 8. (a) Section 2(b) of the Export-Import Bank Act of 1945, as amended by section 5 of this Act, is further amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"(g) No guarantee, insurance, aid, or credit participation shall be extended by the Export-Import Bank to any country the government of which engages in a consistent pattern of gross violations of internationally recognized human rights, including torture or cruel, inhuman, or degrading treatment or punishment, prolonged detention without charges, or other flagrant denial of the right to life, liberty, and the security of person unless such guarantee, insurance, aid, or credit participation will directly benefit the needy people of such country. The Secretary of State, in consultation with the Assistant Secretary of Human Rights and Humanitarian Affairs, shall determine whether the requirements of this subsection are being met. In making this determination, the Secretary shall consider the extent of cooperation of the government of the country concerned in permitting an unimpeded investigation of alleged violations of internationally recognized human rights by appropriate international organizations, including the International Committee of the Red Cross, or groups or persons acting under the authority of the United Nations or of the Organization of American States.".

(b) Section 2(b)(1)(B) of the Export-Import Bank Act of 1945 is amended by striking out at the end thereof ", and shall also take into account, in consultation with the Secretary of State," and all that follows through "country".

(c) Section 9 of the Export-Import Act of 1945 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(c) The report shall also contain a description of any case in which the Bank (1) did not extend any guarantee, insurance, or credit participation to any country on account of violations of human rights referred to in section 2(b)(9) of this Act, or (2) notwithstanding such violations, extended such guarantee, insurance, or credit participation on the basis of a determination that such guarantee, insurance, or credit participation will directly benefit the needy people of such country.".

Redesignate the succeeding section accordingly.

Mr. HARKIN (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with and that it be printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. BAUMAN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, does the gentleman have a copy of the amendment so that we may know what is in the reading of the amendment that is to be dispensed with?

Mr. HARKIN. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, it is my human rights amendment. A copy of it should be at the desk.

Mr. BAUMAN. This is the gentleman's annual human rights amendment?

Mr. HARKIN. It is my human rights amendment.

Mr. BAUMAN. Has it been changed from last year's language in view of the deplorable decline in human rights in the world?

Mr. HARKIN. No.

Mr. BAUMAN. There is no change in the language?

Mr. HARKIN. No, it is the same language.

Mr. BAUMAN. I believe we are all familiar with that, and I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

There was no objection.

Mr. HARKIN. Mr. Chairman, this is the sixth time in about 3 years, since September 1975, that I have taken the well of the House to offer this amendment. This is the last time, at least that I can see for this year, or this session, because this is the last act in the play, or it is the last avenue of freedom that we have left that is not covered by this human rights amendment. Every time that I have taken the well with the amendment, it has been supported by the House. We have had some problems with the Senate, but we have overcome those either in conference or on defeating the conference report, as happened on the IFI's last year. So I would just point out that similar basic human rights language now applies to our economic and food aid bill, our military assistance program, the Inter-American Development Bank, the African Development Fund, the World Bank or other IFI's—IDA, IFC, ADB, ADF, and Overseas Private Investment Corp. Also the House voted similar language on the International Monetary Fund, but the Senate has not acted on it yet, so there is just one avenue of U.S. involvement not covered, and that is the Eximbank. This bill authorizes $40 billion for 5 years, and such a large amount of American international funding I do not believe should operate outside of our stated human rights policy. I would be the first to state and recognize that all of these human rights amendments since the first one was signed by President Ford in December 1975 have not in the last 3 years transformed the world into a citadel of democracy and human rights. However, there are numerous examples of progress that have been made in many countries that have been attributable, I believe in large part, to these human rights amendments.

To those who argue they do not want human rights language in the Eximbank, I can say that there are already two human rights amendments that apply to the Eximbank. The first, of course, is the Jackson-Vanik amendment that was adopted several years ago, and it does not allow Exim financing in any country that does not have an open emigration policy.

The second human rights amendment was added in committee, and that was to deny Exim funds to South Africa because of the apartheid policy of that government. That was modified a little bit by the Evans amendment here on the floor, but, nevertheless, it is still a human rights policy directed toward one country.

I would submit that practices in many other countries, such as the tortures, assassinations, prolonged detention without trial—the kind of thing we have just witnessed in the Soviet Union with the sham of the Shcharansky trial where he got almost 13 years at hard labor—I believe every one of these could be considered every bit as much a matter of human rights violations as apartheid or the right to open emigration. That is why general human right language applying to all countries, the same as we have in other pieces of legislation, is needed in the Eximbank.

Several argue that the Eximbank is involved with trade and not with aid. If that is absolutly true, then we do not even need this bill, but the fact is that the Eximbank provides aid precisely to encourage trade, and this trade may indeed be going to companies which do business in countries that are involved in gross violations of human rights and, thus, bolsters the repressive government. Trade simply is not politically, socially, or economically neutral. In fact, there was an editorial in last Friday's Wall Street Journal—it was an editorial written by a former vice president of the Policy Analysis of the Eximbank—titled, "We Should Restrain U.S. Financing of Export Programs." This was in the Wall Street Journal, pointing out it is not just trade but it is aid in order to support trade.

Arguments will also be made, I am sure, that our trade will suffer greatly if this amendment is adopted. I would like to address that because I am not opposed to exporting our commodities from this country. Treasury Department figures showed that in fiscal year 1977 the involvement of the Eximbank added about $4 billion to our exports. Using that figure and taking into account those countries that are considered by the Department of State as gross violators of international recognized human rights, the maximum amount that would have been affected by this human rights restriction last year was only .67 percent—not 67 percent—of all U.S. exports.

I went to the Library of Congress and got a study done on that, and the Economics Division of the Congressional Research Service examined the Treasury Department's figures that I have mentioned, and they concluded that Eximbank may only have an additionality factor of $500 million. I will just quote from that study.

Furthermore, we felt that the estimates appeared to be higher than one might expect in a program of that type.

The Treasury Department study was not based on empirical quantitative data but, rather, rested on certain qualitative judgments, and the summary by the Congressional Research Service said, and again I quote:

The estimates indicate that the Eximbank direct loan program increased exports by about a half billion dollars.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. HARKIN was allowed to proceed for 5 additional minutes.)

Mr. HARKIN. That is where I get the figure of $500 million. If this is the case, then what we are dealing with is even a much smaller figure than 0.67 percent of all exports. There were exports last year of $120 billion and the Library of Congress indicates that the additionality factor of the Eximbank is much less than even $4 billion.

This figure 0.67 assumes that none of the funds going to human rights violators could be transferred to other countries.

That is another point I want to make. The Eximbank receives many more requests than they are able to honor; so I am saying, let us take the money that normally goes to human rights violators and let us take that money and give it to countries that put in for Eximbank financing that did not violate human rights.

Even after all this, it will be argued that the Eximbank is different than all the other things we have done. We have added this human rights amendment in the past, but somehow it is always said that this is different. Every agency argues this every time it comes up. First, the State Department says it is different. Then the World Bank says it is different and the IMF and the OPIC say they are different.

Both the House and the Senate have recently approved the same kind of language on a bill authorizing the extension of OPIC, the Overseas Private Investment Corporation, and much of the debate we heard on the floor centered around how good OPIC was for our exports. The House passed this human rights amendment on OPIC, the Senate passed it, and it was signed into law by the President.

The same language is in the OPIC bill. If OPIC can live with it, I am sure the Eximbank can also live with it quite well.

One last thing, the Eximbank authorizations are now going up to $12 billion from $6 billion last year; it is $40 billion for the next 5 years. Since the general expectation is for outlays of an additional $6 billion next year, I believe it is only reasonable to assume that the Eximbank receives more applications than they can fill. Therefore, selectivity must be a factor in the Bank's operations.

Moreover, in only one out of every four cases in which the Bank makes a preliminary commitment, does the board finally authorize the program, so there is obviously some form of discretion being utilized.

Now, here is where we run into the problem and here is where the human rights policy is suffering around the world from a lack of consistency. On the one hand, here is a list of the countries in which our representation on the IFI's voted "no" or abstained from loans on human rights grounds last year; the Eximbank turns around and gives the same countries the assurances and loans they want.

Argentina was denied; Central African Empire, Ethiopia, Uruguay, these are all on the list where we have opposed loans and IFI's; but in every one of those cases the Eximbank went right ahead and provided the financing of exports and imports, in clear violation of what the State Department had been saying was a gross violation of human rights; so I believe the amendment offered in good faith by my friend, the gentleman from North Carolina, last year on the bill, which is kind of an advisory thing on human rights, has really not held their feet to the fire. What we are seeing is a duplicitous situation, with this administration doing one thing on the IFI's, and something else on the Eximbank.

I think if we are really going to have an effective human rights policy and if we are going to ask the nations of the world to follow us in this regard, we at least have to have some modicum of consistency and must not just say, "Well, when it comes to Exim, we won't do it, but we will do it on everything else."

Mr. BAUMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARKIN. I yield to the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. BAUMAN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman has mentioned that he has offered this amendment on a number of occasions. I think I have voted each time it has been offered in favor of the amendment.

Can the gentleman give us any example or instance where one dollar of aid or loan guarantees have been denied to any country as a result of the adoption of this amendment?

Mr. HARKIN. Yes. I believe in the case of bilateral aid and, if aid as it pertained to the Inter-American Development Bank, there were some cases in which we have voted no or abstained.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa (Mr. HARKIN) has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. HARKIN was allowed to proceed for 3 additional minutes.)

Mr. HARKIN. Mr. Chairman, there have been cases where we held up a loan and the country withdrew. They then made some changes in their country and then came back, and the loan was approved. Such a situation, I know, happened in El Salvador.

I also believe there has been some indication the situation in Chile has improved in the last couple of years, either because of our threatened cutoff or because we voted no and abstained from the World Bank. Other countries have followed our lead in these matters. So I think there is some indication that progress has been made.

Mr. BAUMAN. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield further, the gentleman provides in this amendment, as in the other amendments, that the determination of the denial of human rights is vested in officials of the State Department.

I am wondering, with the recent redefinition of the term "political prisoners" offered by Ambassador Young, whether this amendment might rule the United States out from participation in the Bank. If Mr. Young is correct, and he is not, then the United States is violating human rights.

Mr. HARKIN. Mr. Chairman, I do not understand the question.

Mr. BAUMAN. Well, one of our top officials in foreign affairs has made the statement that this country suppresses thousands of political prisoners, and that absurd theory has not been repudiated by his resignation or even by the President.

I am wondering whether this amendment might hurt the United States, if this is imposed on the Eximbank by denying Americans who do apply for guarantees? Or am I being somewhat facetious under the circumstances?

Mr. HARKIN. Perhaps the gentleman is being just a bit facetious. He may have made a point, though, because if the United States is keeping political prisoners, perhaps we ought not to be given Eximbank guarantees.

But obviously, Mr. Chairman, I agree with the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. BAUMAN) that the remark made by the Ambassador was absolutely incorrect.

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARKIN. I yield to the gentlewoman from Ohio.

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding, and I wish to state that I associate myself with the gentleman's amendment.

As a member of the Subcommittee on International Trade, Investment, and Monetary Policy and also as a member of the full Committee on Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs, I supported the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. TSONGAS) concerning South Africa. I also supported the amendment offered by the gentlewoman from New Jersey (Mrs. FENWICK) concerning China, which I thought was very important, although unfortunately it was defeated.

I believe what the gentleman is doing is really providing an extension of the spirit of those amendments by offering a universal amendment applying universally to countries that violate human rights. I think it is time that those of us who are in public office quit being rhetorical about the situation. We have to be people of action.

I must say that I am at times somewhat disappointed when I do not see more action followed up by the administration, and I think the same thing holds true in Congress.

So while we have this language in the OPIC legislation, it seems only reasonable that when we have this valuable resource that extends to other countries and assists our people, we ought to have this important amendment in this legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa (Mr. HARKIN) has again expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. HARKIN was allowed to proceed for 1 additional minute.)

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield further, I just want to conclude by saying most of us saw the charade of the recent trials in the Soviet Union, and it seems to me that this amendment at this time is in the spirit of what so many of us were protesting in terms of those trials. The spirit of that feeling is the same as the spirit of the gentleman's amendment.

So, Mr. Chairman, if we feel very, very strongly about what went on just recently in Communist Russia, we ought to really quit being rhetorical and do something of action by supporting the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. HARKIN. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentlewoman for her remarks. She is absolutely correct. I do not think we could send a clearer signal to the world than by adopting this amendment at this time, especially after the charade of the Shcharansky trials in the Soviet Union.

Mr. HYDE. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I think the amendment, while it is well-intentioned, confuses trade with aid. I think we have a perfect right and a perfect duty to restrict those things that we give to countries as aid rather than those elements of trade that we carry out with countries.

But the sole and only purpose of the Export-Import Bank is to help this country export manufactured products, goods, and services. This country is in a very desperate situation in terms of a trade deficit, in terms of a woefully lagging export trade and policy, and the purpose of this Export-Import Bank is to alleviate that economically distressing situation and assist Americans get jobs and export products.

Now moving from the purely economic aspect of this to the human rights aspect, it would be marvelous if the shining example of this country could impel other countries to emulate us. And we can always hope. But one way of helping the human rights situation in the world is through communication. And one way to communicate is through trade with these countries. If they want our goods and our products—we make these items, we make them better and we make them cheaper—there must be something about the system of government in this country, the political and economic freedom, because the other countries want our goods and services.

If we are to fully implement in a nonhypocritical way the Harkin amendment, 70 to 100 of the countries of the world will be banned, they will be put on the blacklist, and we cannot trade with them. You and I know that hypocrisy walks hand in hand with the human rights arguments. We ostracize South Africa as a leper, but we tolerate religious apartheid behind the Iron Curtain. We tell Chile, "You are a bad country," the day we handed the Crown of St. Stephen back to Hungary, which today has 40,000 Soviet troops occupying that country.

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HYDE. I yield to the gentlewoman from Ohio.

Ms. OAKAR. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I am glad the gentleman mentioned the Crown of St. Stephen. As the Members know, I was very involved in that. That is exactly the spirit of this amendment. We should not be catering to those countries which violate human rights, and that is exactly why I opposed returning the Crown of St. Stephen. So I think we agree on that point.

I would just like the gentleman to carry over that same wonderful philosophy to this amendment.

Mr. HYDE. Mr. Chairman, I just want to say to the gentlewoman that it is the selective indignation that I resent, that rubs me the wrong way.

The gentleman from Iowa is making gestures.

Mr. HARKIN. Yes. I am saying, "Me too."

Mr. HYDE. I am glad the gentleman interpretated that. I thought the gentleman had an itch.

Mr. HARKIN. I have an itch to get my amendment adopted.

Mr. HYDE. The purpose of the Export-Import Bank is not to evangelize the world on human rights. There are other ways to do that. There are other means to do that. But if we are going to insist that we only deal with those countries that adhere to our standard—and I am not sure what our standard is, in light of the remarks of the Ambassador to the United Nations—it just seems to me that we ought to do it uniformly and evenhandedly. But we do not. We do not. The Export-Import Bank has refused to make three transactions recently, Chile, Uruguay, and Brazil, allies, friendly countries, but we will treat them as pariahs. We will continue to find every justification for dealing with Hungary, Romania, Poland, and other countries like that.

Mr. HARKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HYDE. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. HARKIN. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I want to say to the gentleman that that is precisely my point. They singled out certain countries. What I want to do, again, with my amendment is hold their feet to the fire and make sure they cannot just operate willy-nilly down there.

I had someone from the Department the other day in my office talking about Argentina. I said, "What about the other countries?" They said, "Well, there is no language in the bill." They just want to do this their own way. That is why I want to cover the waterfront on this.

Mr. HYDE. Then will not the gentleman concede that the Harkin amendment has been ineffectual in getting this evenhandedness in the World Bank and the other institutions in that the administrators have continued to be selective in its imposition?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. HYDE) has expired.

(On request of Mr. HARKIN and by unanimous consent, Mr. HYDE was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. HARKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. HYDE. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. HARKIN. Mr. Chairman, I am not going to take up the cudgel for the administration on all their human rights weaving in and out; that is true, but I do believe that efforts are being made, under the obstacles of that amendment, to make a more evenhanded approach.

Mr. Chairman, I just mentioned a list of countries, and I will go through the list again: Argentina, Central Africa, Chile, Ethiopia, Brazil, Uruguay, and so forth.

Mr. HYDE. I have not heard one Communist country mentioned.

Mr. HARKIN. I do not know whether Ethiopia is benign or what they are.

Mr. HYDE. That is my point.

Mr. HARKIN. The point, then, would be well taken. What we need, then, is to follow up on the World Bank so as to make sure that they do not just go after certain human rights violators and not others.

If we do not have the mechanism of this human rights amendment, we cannot even do that.

Mr. HYDE. I submit that this administration tends to sensitize with respect to offenses on the right and anesthetize with respect to offenses on the left.

Mr. KELLY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HYDE. I yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. KELLY. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I would like to inquire of the author of the amendment what his amendment does which is not now accomplished by the language in the existing act, which reads as follows:

> . . . the Board of Directors shall take into account any serious adverse effect of such loan or guarantee on the competitive position of the United States industry, the availability of materials which are in short supply in the United States, and employment in the United States, and shall also take into account, in consultation with the Secretary of State, the observance of and respect for human rights in the country to receive the exports supported by a loan or financial guarantee and the effect such exports . . .

Mr. Chairman, if we really have people who act in good faith, it would seem as though that language would cover the situation like a glove.

Mr. HARKIN. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield further, as I said, what my amendment does is to put a prohibitive type of language in there, which will make them justify what they do when they go ahead and provide Exim financing. The old amendment does not do that.

Mr. STANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HYDE. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. STANTON. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the gentleman's yielding. I certainly am going to get my own time later.

However, I want to make a point with respect to what the gentleman from Florida (Mr. KELLY) said about the present language in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. HYDE) has expired.

(On request of Mr. STANTON and by unanimous consent, Mr. HYDE was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes).

Mr. STANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. HYDE. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. STANTON. Mr. Chairman, I got a letter from the president of the Eximbank the other day in which he talked about a loan for Argentina which they turned down based on the human rights language that is in this bill right now.

Mr. Chairman, I think this language goes too far, but the gentleman from Florida is absolutely right. This matter is already covered in the legislation at the present time.

Mr. NEAL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, it is hard to know where to start. I imagine we have to start with the letter of the gentleman from Iowa (Mr. HARKIN).

It is simply wrong to imply, as the gentleman from Iowa implies in the letter, that the Bank does not operate under human rights language.

As the gentleman said a moment ago, the committee did adopt human rights language last year, which seems to me probably the best, most practical, most effective human rights language that we have added to any of the bills which the gentleman has mentioned.

I say that, because the Bank has the option of taking into account the practical effects of what it does; that is, if its refusal to grant a loan will have no practical effect, then it is not absolutely required to do it. Then it can deny the loan, so, obviously, no one would benefit from that. It would have no effect in that country. It would be a fruitless gesture.

Of course, it would have one effect, which would be that it would hurt our domestic economy. It would reduce jobs and profits in this country and further increase our trade deficit.

Mr. Chairman, I can demonstrate to the gentleman that the language has already worked. Because of the language that is in the bank bill, the Bank refused to finance the export of computers for storage of fingerprints to the state police of Brazil. They also refused to approve certain transactions with Chile and Uruguay, for example; and most recently refused financial involvement in Argentina, in cooperation with the State Department.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, my point is that this human rights language which is in the bill now works. It is good human rights language. The gentleman is not the author of it. He is the author of the language that is in the other bill, but I would argue that they are not working all that well.

With respect to the section in the aid bank bill, we only have one vote, so in considering the loan, we have one vote while we contribute about 25 percent of the money.

So, in considering the law, we vote against it and use our money to develop the project, and the people of that country are furious with us.

Mr. KELLY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEAL. I yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. KELLY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman if it does not support his position that Donald Stingel, one of the Directors of the Eximbank, recently in a letter to a Member of this Congress wrote and said:

> However, it is well known there are a number of those who, either in final action on Eximbank's Appropriations Bill or on our Authorization Bill, would put forth amendments seriously restricting our ability to finance products, equipment, or facilities in certain specific cases. Others would introduce further human rights or environmental restrictions, or even attempt to politicize the Bank, perhaps not recognizing fully that the United States already faces an uphill export fight against foreign competition which in most cases has the full and unqualified financial and other support of their governments.

He further says:

> What we need to improve the export posture of this Country in the face of a large deficit, and to prove to the U.S. exporters, who employ hundreds of thousands of people in export-oriented work, that we mean to support them in their efforts, is a "clean" Eximbank Bill accompanied by an unencumbered Appropriation Bill for the next Fiscal Year.

It would seem to me that either Mr. Stingel, who is an appointee of the present administration, is oblivious and insensitive to human rights, or is incapable of maintaining a strong human rights position, or else the Harkin amendment is just superfluous because this gentleman, a Director of the Bank, says the Harkin amendment is what we do not need.

Mr. NEAL. I will agree with the gentleman that we do not need the Harkin amendment. But beyond that, I would have to say that it is not only not needed, it is potentially very costly and very destructive to our country.

Let me make a couple of other points. An amendment was offered such as this in the Banking Committee this year. When it was last offered, we really had a chance to debate it thoroughly. In that committee, it was defeated by a vote of 32 to 3. Last year, when we adopted the Eximbank bill, this House under suspension of the rules adopted this human rights language, which we have in the bank bill, and it is working.

Let me make this point: The gentleman said that this is needed, because it does not conform to all these other institutions. None of these other institutions had human rights language at all, as I understand it. So, the gentleman offered language and got it approved by the House. I personally do not think it is working very well, but the point I am trying to make is that we do have human rights language in this bill, and that language is working.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired.

(By unanimous consent Mr. NEAL was allowed to proceed for 5 additional minutes.)

Mr. NEAL. The gentleman has indicated that he thinks that this Bank is an aid bank, but I would like to point out to him that this Bank makes money. It made over $50 million last year, as I understand it. It does not use taxpayers' money to do it. It is self-sufficient, and it generates jobs and profits in this country. I just think that if the gentleman is basing his argument on the need for this amendment, on the assumption that: No. 1, we do not have human rights language in the bill; and No. 2, that this is an aid institution, then the gentleman is just basing his entire argument on some false premises.

The gentleman says—and I do not know where this 0.67 percent comes from; I cannot figure it out, it seems like a figure pulled out of the air and unrelated to anything I can determine—but let us just presume for a moment that it is correct; we are talking about 0.67 percent of $120 billion. This is around $1 billion in trade that this would cost us. Is that what the gentleman wants to do? Does he want to cost us that billion dollars in trade?

Mr. HARKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEAL. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. HARKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEAL. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. HARKIN. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

First of all I do want to comment on the vote of the committee last year. I certainly do not know all the Members' reasons for voting but I think the gentleman does remember I did testify before his committee on this human rights amendment. At that time I agreed not to offer my human rights amendment, but to go ahead and let it go through with the human rights language of the gentleman from North Carolina and take a look and see what would happen between last October and this year and see if it worked well up until that time. I have never pushed this on the extension last year, not a bit. I never wrote on it or anything.

Mr. NEAL. Congressman BADILLO did with the support of the gentleman from Iowa, I would assume. But anyway it was done and after the testimony, and the gentleman from Iowa testified as did the gentleman from New York, Congressman BADILLO, on the arguments on the amendment, and the subcommittee rejected it overwhelmingly and the full committee rejected it by a vote of 30 to 5.

Mr. HARKIN. But anyway it was not brought up this time at all.

Mr. NEAL. That is absolutely correct. We have not had any hearings on this.

Mr. HARKIN. It was not brought up this year at all.

The second thing I want to address is:

Aid, not trade. The gentleman asked where I got the 0.67 percent. This is what the Treasury says.

Mr. NEAL. The Treasury says this is aid?

Mr. HARKIN. No; I was talking about where I got the 0.67 percent. The Treasury Department's own figure shows there is an additionality of aid that is generated by the Eximbank. We have $120 billion a year in exports. What Treasury says is out of that $120 billion, about 10 percent or $12 billion is even financed by the Eximbank, and the gentleman is saying that out of that less than one-third would not have gone through had it not been for Ex-Im financing. That is where we come up with the figure of 0.67 percent. I took the Ex-Im's own figures to the Library of Congress. They came back and they said Treasury Department did not rest it on quantitative data but on certain qualitative judgments. They said it is less than 0.67 percent. We know that it is not even 1 percent or $120 million. It is less than a million.

Mr. NEAL. But that is speculative also, is it not? But it is less than $1 million.

Mr. HARKIN. And the gentleman is talking about comparing that to gross violations of human rights that go on around the world? I hope we do not want to get ourselves into that position.

Mr. NEAL. I hope the gentleman knows I am not arguing for gross violations of human rights. I want us to act when such action will make some difference. The approach of the gentleman is such a nondiscriminating approach that it does not take into account what effect that action may have. He is perfectly satisfied that the action has no beneficial effect, it seems to me.

Mr. HARKIN. I will respond to that by saying the Eximbank gets many more applications than it ever is able to fulfill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. NEAL was allowed to proceed for 5 additional minutes.)

Mr. NEAL. Let me say to the gentleman on that point, that again is simply not true. Over the last 10 years the Bank has only on average, over that 10-year period, used about 70 percent of its authorization. The Bank is not able to use all its authorizations. That is simply a total misconception.

The Bank is out promoting exports from this country in a very competitive world market. There is extremely intense competition for many of our exports now and the Bank is seeking out loans to make. Not only have they operated at about 70 percent of their capacity over the last several years, but also we are increasing that capacity considerably in this year.

Again, the three basic facts the gentleman bases his argument on are simply incorrect.

Mr. HARKIN. The gentleman in the well is arguing there is so much demand at present for our Ex-Im financing. Then we can pick and choose whom we want. We do not have to finance those human rights violations.

Mr. NEAL. Oh, no. The point is in world trade we are in a very competitive area and we have to fight for every export we get. If we were to have this very unwise language, then we would almost hobble the Bank's efforts to aid our exports.

Mr. HANNAFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me on that point?

Mr. NEAL. I yield to the gentleman from California (Mr. HANNAFORD).

Mr. HANNAFORD. Mr. Chairman, as I understood the colloquy, the chairman was not making the point that there was intense competition but there was a lack of intense competition and that the bank was seeking how to make loans.

Mr. NEAL. That is correct, domestically.

Mr. HANNAFORD. Mr. Chairman, let me state that I certainly agree with the gentleman in the well on this legislation. There is no way that we can effectively compel any human rights behavior through the instrumentality of the Export-Import Bank. There is just no way.

The argument is quite similar to the one that was given previously to the earlier amendment we just voted on, and that is that if these other countries do not buy our products then they are going to buy the products from elsewhere, whether on the basis of human rights, or anything else.

I happen to have the DC–10 manufacturing plant in my district, and the point was made that they were using the Export-Import Bank to buy the DC–10's instead of the European 830's. We all know that none of those DC–10's are going to be used as instrumentalities of death and I see no basis whatever for denying the sale of those aircraft.

Further, Mr. Chairman, let me say that if we used a standard of moral judgment about every transaction that took place in the world, the commerce of the world would be killed.

The point is that the Export-Import Bank is an instrument of our Government whose policy is to sell the products of our farms, our factories, and our mines to the rest of the world. I believe it is extremely important that we not fetter them with such restrictions as are proposed. I think we should rather use such meaningful instruments as we have to try to encourage human rights around the world, not this one.

Mr. NEAL. The gentleman from California (Mr. HANNAFORD) is correct in his comments.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to make one other point in this regard and that is it is simply a total misconception by the gentleman from Iowa (Mr. HARKIN) that the Export-Import Bank directly allocates its resources on a country-by-country basis, or that, for instance, if a loan is not made to this country over there then that will free up the loans to be made in another country.

The fact is, we have more than adequate resources; the problem is with making the exports. The competition is in the world international trade area, not here in our country for the exports.

One other point, if I may be permitted to make it, is that we have said several times that we must argue that this is different and something else is different. I suggest we have to agree that the Export-Import Bank is different. It is different in that this is the only Government agency with certain real responsibilities of facilitating the export of U.S. products. That is its purpose and in that respect it is different. It is certainly not an aid bank; it is very, very different from that.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. NEAL was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. STANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEAL. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. STANTON. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding to me.

Mr. Chairman, a few moments ago we were talking about the subject of the availability of countries who want bank loans from the Export-Import Bank, and do they or do they not have enough customers. I think it would be interesting for the Committee to know that in countries all around the world there is no particular company or country that I know that classifies countries on the basis of human rights violations or violations of civil rights, as is present in the particular language used in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa (Mr. HARKIN) to the best of my knowledge, anyway. But I think it is interesting to note that Freedom House in New York lists some 78 countries that are in violation of political rights and 50 countries who are in violation of civil rights. In addition to that, there is Amnesty International that lists some 25 countries in which journalists are being held in those countries.

But, Mr. Chairman, what happens when you get into the language we now have, let alone the extreme language that the gentleman from Iowa (Mr. HARKIN) is offering at the present time?

If we took these countries and these institutions which are listed, they would have accounted for almost $3 billion in loans from the Export-Import Bank last year, and I think that before the vote is cast that we had better get a description of what gross human rights violations means. We already have language in the bill, as I say, and I am sure the gentleman from Iowa (Mr. HARKIN) is familiar with the language, but to go along and provide this additional language is certainly an overkill and I hope the language will be defeated.

Mr. NEAL. Mr. Chairman, I just want to make a couple more points. One is that we have an administration now totally dedicated to the cause of human rights around the world, and it just does not make any sense to cripple them with this kind of amendment. The Bank has human rights language. The amendment before us is unnecesary. All this amendment would do would be to lessen any kind of competitive opportunity we might have in world trade. It is a competitive area, and other countries would certainly be happy to move in and fill the void.

I urge that we defeat this amendment.

Mr. LONG of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa. One hundred and fifty years ago de Tocqueville, a French aristocrat, writing about democracy in America, after describing so many other aspects of America, said that one reason for America's greatness is that America is basically a good country, and when it stops being good, it will no longer be great.

The thing that endears the Harkin amendment to me is that basically it is telling the world that we insist on certain moral standards before we participate in subsidizing or otherwise helping to do business with those countries. We cannot tell the countries that they have got to run their systems in a certain way. We cannot intervene in those countries. We can say, we will not do business with you, or, we will not put money into your country. That is why I think the Harkin amendments are so important. I do not suppose there is anybody here who disagrees with that. What the opponents of Harkin are saying is that jobs and economics override the moral considerations.

Let me read here from the Wall Street Journal a statement which clearly, I think, puts the Export-Import Bank and its contributions to our exports balance of profit in perspective. When I get all through reading, I am going to tell the Members who wrote the article. I shall not read all of the article, but here is the important part of it:

> Clearly the Export Import Bank cannot improve the balance of payments and bolster the dollar in the short-run. Any exports stimulated through the Bank's programs—both monetarist and Keynesian economists believe the volume is not likely to be large, although for different reasons—will generally only be shipped after a lag and will generate the bulk of their balance-of-payment receipts only when the credits are repaid, often many years later. Thus, the positive effect on the trade account—if any—is largely offset by the debit on capital account.
> To the extent that the Bank's credits do not stimulate additional exports they will have an adverse effect on the short-run balance of payments by contributing to the capital outflow.

Here is what we have been doing. We have been exporting capital when we do not have enough capital in this country to fulfill about $2 trillion of capital needs.

> Export Import Bank credits consequently may actually accentuate the sharp swings in U.S. balance-of-payments performance and the value of the dollar by shifting receipts from periods of balance-of-payments stringency and a depreciating dollar to periods of balance-of-payments strength and a rising dollar.

Later on in the article:

> Those who benefit from the Bank and other export promotion programs sometimes justify their call for increased government support by citing the need to meet "unfair" officially supported foreign competition. But if other countries wish to inflate their governments' deficits in order to give away their exports, it's no justification for us to do the same.
>
> It is interesting to note that among the major countries, Germany and Switzerland provide the fewest officially supported export credits and have the least costly export promotion programs, yet these are countries with strong and appreciating currencies. The United Kingdom, on the other hand, has the most costly export promotion program but faces periodic balance-of-payments crises.

Now, the author of that article is Steven H. Goodman, former vice president, policy analysis, of the Export-Import Bank.

I submit there are enough questions—about whether the Export-Import Bank does good for our economy, does good for our balance of payments—to raise the question, should we be putting moral and human rights considerations aside on the grounds that business is more important?

Mr. NEAL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONG of Maryland. I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. NEAL. Mr. Chairman, I just want to make it clear to the gentleman, that is not the situation. We already have human rights language in the Bank that is working. It gives us both the carrot and the stick approach.

This is so inflexible that it would only give us the stick. I just cannot emphasize strongly enough that we have language in the Bank that was adopted by the committee and adopted by the House.

This language in the amendment would not work. It is totally unneeded and it would be very costly to this country.

Mr. LONG of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, it does not do any good to lock ten windows and leave one open. It does not do any good at all. A burglar can get in that one window.

The gentleman from Arkansas (Mr. HARKIN) is trying to close up the open window.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I realize we have debated this subject at great length, but let us sit back for a second look at the issue. Is it our purpose to posturize ourselves or is it our purpose to attempt to effectuate an improvement in human rights throughout the world?

Mr. Chairman, if our purpose is the former, then I suppose the amendment before us is the proper vehicle; if our purpose is the latter, then it seems to me that what we ought to do is to have the President, when he is meeting at Bonn at an economic summit conference, discuss these different issues with other nations so that we will have a free world position—a free world position that is effective in accomplishing our purpose.

We are not the Nation we were insofar as international trade is concerned. We are not the Nation that we were immediately following World War II, when a policy adoped by this country was for all intents and purposes the trading policy of the free world. Today our trading partners can probably supply everything we can supply, other than perhaps 1 percent of the items in international trade that is conducted in a year's time.

So, therefore, our unilateral posturizing is ineffectual.

The President the other day said we would not sell the Univac computer, and he gave two reasons. I was at the White House at that time. First, the President said the Univac computer had a strategic capability that far exceeded the need of the Tass News Agency, maybe 20 times the capacity, and so it was being done perhaps for a strategic reason. The other was the human rights reason, to show our displeasure. I respectfully suggest that, despite what has been said in the other body, both those reasons are wrong unless certain other determinations are made.

Some of the Members will recall that in 1969 the gentleman from Ohio, LUD ASHLEY, and I mounted a campaign to loosen up the Export Administration Act, because the National Security Council was denying an export license to almost everything on a strategic basis. We did that so the NSC could not deny export licenses on everything during that time. We said that in determining the strategic importance of an item, the NSC could not look only at the item, but must look at what is available elsewhere in the free world, because, once again, a unilateral decision on our part did not interdict the receipt of the item by the recipient country; it only denied our exporters the opportunity to engage in that commerce.

So unless the President has determined that that computer is not available elsewhere, or, even better, unless we have an agreement among our free world trading partners that they in effect will adopt a common policy with respect to a computer of that capability, then our decision is meaningless.

The same thing is true of human rights. If we do not have a summit conference on human rights so that all the trading partners insofar as Eximbank-type national financing is concerned say they will not furnish beneficial financing unless our common human rights policies are concurred in, we have done nothing.

I respectfully suggest there is one thing in this bill that is very good, and that is the part that says we have got to sit down with all the other nations in the free world and start talking about predatory financing. That is the kind of summit conference that will help eliminate the predatory financing that is going on. We need to have a summit conference on this subject, and we should have similar language in this bill saying that we have got to have the free world nations sit down and talk about human rights and come up with one common policy.

We need to have the nations of the free world sit down in a summit conference and make CoCom, the coordinating committee, which determines what strategic items shall be on the committee's list, develop a consistent policy, and have all the nations follow it up so that we will have a free world policy on strategic goods.

But, Mr. Chairman, we are not doing those things. We are acting unilaterally. Our rhetoric is wonderful, our posture is great, but we are totally ineffectual.

Mrs. FENWICK. Mr. Chairman, this debate has lasted a long time. I will be very brief.

There is something I would like to bring to the attention of my colleagues. I am sure that if we could solve the human rights situation in the world we would join in any lawful means at our command in order to do so. This legislation suggests itself as one of them. I do not wonder, as someone who has spoken so often on this subject, that we again might try to do something.

But, to begin with, there is something in the amendment that I object to. I think it is humiliating and unnecessary to list those countries which we have, so to speak, castigated. I think it would be better to do that privately. At the end of the amendment, it says:

> The report shall also contain a description of any case in which the Bank did not extend any guarantee . . .

I think that is really unfortunate. But that is not the whole point. More importantly, this amendment is not going to work. I would like to point out to those who attempted to join in this that neither West Germany nor Switzerland, who have been held up as great examples of how to operate without any help from government, has anything similar to the Harkin amendment. We are introducing an element which is not common to the banking practices of the world.

But suppose we could do something. Consider this: Just a month ago, Nicaragua got millions of dollars. I questioned the State Department as to how this could be. The editor of the opposition newspaper, Mr. Chamorro, had been murdered. So had his cousin—also named Chamorro. His son, a boy 16 years old, sought asylum in our Embassy. I asked, "How did you come to give Nicaragua this money?" It was done through the clause provided in this amendment. And here it is: "Unless it will directly benefit the needy people of such countries." And there you are. The writer of this amendment is right to include the clause. There must be a way to benefit the needy of any country. But if one could interpret a road, or whatever aid was given, as justifying money for Nicaragua certainly we could, in Brazil, help the people in the favelas of Rio, the terrible shantytowns, by selling equipment for a hydroelectric plant, to give people jobs and dignity. Almost anything could be done that way. A nuclear plant could be built so that people could have electricity instead of living with no light on their streets.

This is an amendment, in my opinion, that is useless and mischievous. It is not going to accomplish the end it purports to seek.

Mr. Chairman, I urge the defeat of the amendment.

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in support of the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, to coin a phrase, it is time to put our money where our mouth is. We are the richest country in the world. We are also the leading proponents of human rights. Morale and ethical principles should have no price tag. We should be leaders in action, not only in speech. This is a universal amendment. It would apply to Communist countries, as well as South Africa.

The sponsor of this amendment, the gentleman from Iowa (Mr. HARKIN), has indicated that according to the Treasury Department this would only decrease the amount of loans that the Export-Import Bank makes by 0.6 percent. This is a very, very small price to pay for our country's leadership in the field of human rights, and it is about time we supplemented our leadership and our words with action.

Mr. Chairman, I think it is disgraceful that we will not have the same universal language in this bill that we will have in the OPIC bill. We really ought to help the people who are suffering from these dictatorships and who are suffering in terms of human dignity. We ought to supply the language which tells their government, "Look, you have to adhere to human dignity and treat your people with respect and justice, or we are not going to assist you."

We all know this is not going to be a great burden, and the argument concerning the cost of jobs simply is not true, the Treasury report, and so forth.

Therefore, let us not hide behind this charade any more about human rights. We are either doers or we are not. I hope that we will be doers in this instance.

Mr. NEAL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentlewoman yield?

Ms. OAKAR. I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. NEAL. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentlewoman for yielding.

The gentlewoman said in her remarks that we are not going to aid countries which violate human rights.

Ms. OAKAR. I did not say that.

Mr. NEAL. Perhaps the gentlewoman said assist. Aid, assistance, mean the same thing. The fact of the matter is that this is not an aid or assistance institution.

Ms. OAKAR. No, I did not say that. I understand what the spirit of the law is very well. I am on the committee, and it is not an aid program. We understand that; but in a real sense it does assist these nations, does it not? Would the gentleman agree that it assists them?

Mr. NEAL. It assists us, that is who it assists, not them.

Ms. OAKAR. I do not know. A lot of countries have nuclear power plants, which is another whole issue that I am hopeful we will get to.

It is a very, very questionable action when your reports show how dangerous our own powerplants are.

Mr. NEAL. With respect to what the gentlewoman said about this meaning the loss of only a few jobs, I think the minimum estimate of lost jobs this would cost would be something like 60,000 jobs.

Ms. OAKAR. Where did the gentleman get that figure? The Treasury said it is only 0.6 percent.

Mr. NEAL. Of $120 billion.

Ms. OAKAR. Exactly, but they can shift it to other countries, and we all understand that there are countries waiting in line to participate in it.

That conclusion is the chairman's.

Mr. NEAL. That is absolutely incorrect, I say to the gentlewoman.

Mr. HARKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentlewoman yield?

Ms. OAKAR. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. HARKIN. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentlewoman for yielding.

I would respond to the chairman that if there are not countries waiting in line, then why do we have to increase this amount by 47 percent? Why is it that if they are not standing in line to get Eximbank money, that we have to increase this to $40 billion over the next 5 years?

Mr. NEAL. Mr. Chairman, if the gentlewoman will yield, we are hoping we will increase our trade worldwide. Unless we should become more aggressive in trade, the Bank would run out of money relatively soon, in the next year or so. Therefore, we are increasing their authority so that they can help us reduce this $31 billion trade deficit so as to do something about the value of the dollar and put people to work in this country.

Mr. HARKIN. That is fine. Let us increase trade with those countries which share with us a commitment in human rights, as the President said in his inaugural address. Then we can take up the slack of those 60,000 jobs by dealing with those countries and increasing our trade to those countries.

Mr. Chairman, I would just like to address myself to one point raised earlier. Members have raised this argument about the fact that businesses will be hurt.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentlewoman from Ohio (Ms. OAKAR) has again expired.

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to be allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Ohio?

Mrs. FENWICK. Mr. Chairman, I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is heard.

Mr. VOLKMER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. HARKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOLKMER. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. HARKIN. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman from Missouri (Mr. VOLKMER) for yielding.

I just want to make one last point. It is this: My good friend, the gentleman from California, raised the issue of airplane sales. I am very supportive of exporting our technology. I do not think anyone can say that I have not been. In fact, just yesterday I talked at great length with some representatives from an aircraft manufacturer located in the State of California. I talked with them about this amendment and what I sought to do with it.

He said, "Would you want us to cut our exports?"

I said, "No, not in any way. However," I said, "did you raise either with any company or country you were dealing with the issue of human rights?"

He said, "No."

I said, "That is my point. What I want to do is to provide a mechanism whereby a company in this country dealing with another company in another country that has this pattern of gross violations will have to raise the issue of human rights. They can say, 'I am sorry. I have to raise this issue because it is in the law. I am made to do this.'"

The other company in the other country will then put pressure on its government and say, "If you do not do something about human rights, we may lose some of this business."

That is not being done now, and I can understand why it is not being done now.

All I want, Mr. Chairman, is to have those businesses dealing abroad raise the issue of human rights, to be conscious of it, and to deal with it on the basis that, "No, we are not going to cut off exports; we are not going to cut anybody's throats or anything like that, but that the issue of human rights is a necessary element in all dealings between our country and any other country in the world."

Mr. Chairman, again I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. VOLKMER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to say something. I have heard here today, in listening to this debate it has been said, that we have talked long enough on human rights; we have heard enough this session on human rights. I am thankful that our forefathers—our forefathers—did not hear enough on human rights so that we do have our Bill of Rights. I believe that we should also try to persuade, if possible, other nations that their people are entitled to those same rights that the people of this country are entitled to, and no less for the people of those other countries.

Mr. KELLY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOLKMER. I yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. KELLY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to refer the gentleman to a recent communication to the Speaker of the House. It says:

> As you are aware, the firm commitment of the President to human rights throughout the world is unquestioned. The President joins me in opposing the proposed Harkin amendment and in urging passage of the extension of authority for the Eximbank.
>
> Signed, Cyrus Vance.

Mr. VOLKMER. Yes, I know of that letter.

Mr. KELLY. So, it would seem to me that the Harkin amendment is setting a standard for human rights that the rest of us can hardly afford.

Mr. VOLKMER. I disagree. I believe that we may have to put a little more backbone into the Eximbank.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa (Mr. HARKIN).

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. HARKIN) there were—ayes 14; noes 30.

RECORDED VOTE

Mr. HARKIN. Mr. Chairman, I demand a recorded vote.

A recorded vote was ordered.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—ayes 103, noes 286, answered "present" 1, not voting 42, as follows:

The Clerk announced the following pairs:

On this vote:

Mr. Vento for, with Mr. Jenrette against.

Mr. FUQUA changed his vote from "aye" to "no."

Messrs. SCHEUER, LENT, and RINALDO changed their votes from "no" to "aye."

So the amendment was rejected.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. BROWN OF MICHIGAN

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BROWN of Michigan: On page 5, after line 6, insert a new section as follows:

"SEC. 10. The Bank shall not guarantee, insure or extend credit or participate in the extension of credit in support of any export to purchasers in any country unless the United States Secretary of State certifies that the purchaser has endorsed the following principles; non-segregation of the races in all work facilities; equal and fair employment for all employees; equal pay for equal work for all employees; initiation and development of training programs to prepare minority employees for supervisory, administrative, clerical and technical jobs; increasing the number of minority employees in management and supervisory positions; improving the quality of life for employees in such areas as housing, transportation, schooling, recreation and health facilities; and, a willingness to engage in collective bargaining with labor unions."

Renumber the remaining section accordingly.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I do not anticipate that this amendment is going to be accepted by both sides. However, I respectfully suggest it should be.

This is the language that was agreed to and was supported by both the minority side and the majority side in connection with the Evans amendment. It relates to working conditions in firms, facilities, and industries that receive the benefit of Eximbank financing. It was offered before in connection with the Evans amendment with respect to South Africa which was overwhelmingly agreed to.

This amendment does not strike any of the language of the Evans amendment that relates to apartheid, but, rather, it extends the Evans amendment that was only applicable to South Africa to all the countries that are involved in any way with Eximbank financing.

It seems to me, as I indicated earlier, that we ought to have a more genuine and uniform agreement in the free world as to what we do on the issues of human rights and all the other things that are covered in the amendments that have been offered to the Eximbank bill. But absent the fact that we do not seem to be given that kind of agreement, we should at least have a uniform policy with respect to this country.

If we are going to insist upon certain working conditions and other things with respect to some countries, we ought to have those same conditions, requirements, and standards made applicable to all countries.

In short, this amendment does somewhat the same thing the Long amendment attempted to do in saying that we want other nations basically to attempt to conform to those kinds of protections we afford our own workers.

Mr. Chairman, I think the amendment should be supported. As I say, it has already been adopted in one section, with respect to section 2(b) of the Eximbank bill, and it should be made applicable to all countries.

Mr. DE LA GARZA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Certainly, I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. DE LA GARZA. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the gentleman's yielding.

Basically, I agree with the amendment. I am a little perplexed, though.

Could the gentleman give me a definition of who the "minority" would be, for example, in Argentina?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. I think it would be any group that is classified as a minority in Argentina.

Mr. NEAL. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, would the gentleman say the Nazi Party would be a minority if it did not happen to be the party in power?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I do not think the gentleman ever thought that the Nazi Party was a minority, even in this country. Both the gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. NEAL) and the gentleman from Texas (Mr. DE LA GARZA) are aware of what we mean by "minorities."

Mr. DE LA GARZA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Certainly, I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. DE LA GARZA. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman in his enthusiasm is trying to do what is right and proper.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. I am trying to do what is right and proper, and I say to the gentleman that what is right and proper is that we ought to be intellectually honest about these things. I do not think we should be promoting selective indignation and exercising selective morality. Let us make these standards applicable to all.

Mr. DE LA GARZA. I agree. The thing I would like to do, however, is, hopefully, to help the gentleman with his amendment, because I believe the gentleman confuses the word, "minority," as we use it here, and suggests that it would be applicable in all the countries of the world, and it is not.

If the gentleman could select a better wording, I would like to work with him on his amendment. I do not know who the "minority" would be in Chile. Perhaps it might be the Indian or perhaps it might be one of German ancestry.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, if I may recapture my time, I believe the Secretary of State can make that determination, and he can see whether or not the thrust of this language, the spirit, and the principle are being carried forward. The Secretary of State can certify and he can make all those nice little determinations about which the gentleman is raising questions.

Mr. DE LA GARZA. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield further, I do not imply that the Secretary of State does not have the judicial capability to do that, but I would assume that he would make the same mistake the gentleman did.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I would respectfully suggest to the gentleman that I think the rather technical argument that is being made by the gentleman is really being made, because perhaps the gentleman does not support the amendment, although I think he should. This amendment only extends those principles that we are making applicable to some nations, to all the nations.

Mr. NEAL. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, if I could have the attention of the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. BROWN), the author of the amendment, I would like to see if I could get a clear understanding of the purpose of this amendment.

It is my understanding now that the gentleman does not approve the language adopted by this House concerning South Africa, so he would like to extend the language we adopted concerning South Africa, at least part of it, all of that that does not refer to apartheid, to the rest of the countries of the world; is that correct?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. If the gentleman will yield, much to the contrary. My position is—and I am sorry the gentleman from Mr. Iowa (Mr. HARKIN) is not here because he could fully support my amendment—that we ought to make these principles uniform. If they are right, they should be uniform and they should apply to all nations.

Mr. NEAL. Mr. Chairman, could the gentleman tell me, is there some divine principle involved which says we should make our treatment of all nations exactly equal?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Is the gentleman a selective moralist? Does the gentleman wish to pick and choose and decide who we should give this treatment regarding employees to? We can only pick and choose? We do not have this commitment to make it applicable to all, but we only apply our great principles and our sense of responsibility and righteousness to nations in a selective way?

Mr. NEAL. We adhere to the language of the bill.

Mr. LEVITAS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEAL. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. LEVITAS. Is the gentleman from North Carolina really saying this: We may need to pass laws prohibiting parading elephants down the streets of a city which has a zoo, but there is no reason to prohibit parading elephants on the moon because there are no elephants on the moon; therefore, you devise legislation to deal with problems where you find them.

If we find a problem of the sort described by the gentleman, we should legislate against it.

Mr. NEAL. The gentleman makes a very good point and a lot of sense.

I am not really convinced that the gentleman from Michigan is offering the amendment in all seriousness. I hope he is not. It seems to me that it is a frivolous amendment, and I would urge its rejection.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEAL. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. I thank the gentleman for yielding. At the outset, I think urging fair and equal working conditions is hardly analogous to regulating elephants whether they be in the streets or on the Moon, as the gentleman from Georgia suggests. But, Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman the chairman of the subcommittee this question: What is wrong with the principle of the amendment? Tell me what is wrong. Basically, is the gentleman saying there should not be equal and fair employment among employees, there should not be nonsegregation of the races in all work facilities?

Mr. NEAL. I have read the amendment.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. The amendment calls for an effort to put a number of minority employees in management and in supervisory positions. It urges employers to work to improve the quality of life in housing, in schools, in recreation, in health facilities.

And, finally, is the gentleman against a willingness on the part of employers to engage in collective bargaining?

Mr. NEAL. Of course not.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. I would not think that anyone would be opposed to that position.

Mr. NEAL. I just say that I do not think we can impose our standards on the rest of the world.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. The gentleman just did that. He endorsed and spoke in behalf of the Evans amendment a while back.

Mr. NEAL. That is quite correct.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. That is the same language.

Mr. NEAL. That is part of the same language; and of course, as the gentleman knows, the Evans amendment was an attempt to modify an amendment adopted earlier by the full Committee on Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs. It was an improvement. I thought it was an improvement, and a majority thought it was an improvement.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. The gentleman's amendment, to the extent that it has application to a particular country, was covered in the first two subparagraphs, not the final one. The final one was added on.

Those conditions, it seems to me, should be enforced and should be applied equally and universally around the world, not just to one nation.

Mr. NEAL. Mr. Chairman, I must respectfully disagree with the gentleman and hope that we will defeat the amendment. It would cost this country probably billions of dollars in jobs and profits and would be very dangerous to our country.

Mr. STANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEAL. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. STANTON. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I think we ought to make it clear to the members of the committee exactly what this amendment does.

We had an argument in our committee on the subject of South Africa, on the question of whether or not we were going to have total prohibition against lending in South Africa or what we were going to do with regard to South Africa. The majority of our committee voted for the amendment of the gentleman from Delaware.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. NEAL) has expired.

(On request of Mr. STANTON and by unanimous consent, Mr. NEAL was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes).

Mr. STANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. NEAL. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. STANTON. As I was saying, Mr. Chairman, the entire committee came up with a compromise. The gentleman from Delaware (Mr. EVANS) came up with this language which, we thought, solved the South African question.

Let me explain what the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. BROWN) would do. The gentleman wants us to say to 6,000 companies and all the countries in the world that Exim deals with that they should deal with the Eximbank under the same language as in the Evans amendment. The gentleman from Michigan (Mr. BROWN) says that we can take the language out in conference if we want to.

Mr. Chairman, I am still angry with South Africa, but the Evans amendment was a compromise. One can, of course, win the battle and lose the war. There is absolutely no sense to putting this language in. It will affect all of the 6,000 companies to the extent that the Secretary of State would have to tell the president of the Eximbank how to vote on every decision he would have to make.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I urge defeat of this amendment, and I call for a vote at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. BROWN).

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I demand a recorded vote, and pending that, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The CHAIRMAN. Evidently a quorum is not present.

The Chair announces that pursuant to clause 2, rule XXIII, he will vacate proceedings under the call when a quorum of the Committee appears.

Members will record their presence by electronic device.

The call was taken by electronic device.

QUORUM CALL VACATED

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore (Mr. FARY). One hundred Members have appeared. A quorum of the Committee of the Whole is present. Pursuant to rule XXIII, clause 2, further proceedings under the call shall be considered as vacated.

The Committee will resume its business.

RECORDED VOTE

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The pending business is the demand of the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. BROWN) for a recorded vote.

A recorded vote was ordered.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—yeas 90, nays 288, not voting 54, as follows:

Mr. WAGGONNER and Mr. NOWAK changed their vote from "aye" to "no."

Messrs. RICHMOND, BONIOR, RUPPE, VOLKMER, McDONALD, BUCHANAN, CRANE, and KEMP changed their vote from "no" to "aye."

So the amendment was rejected.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. CAVANAUGH

Mr. CAVANAUGH. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CAVANAUGH: Page 5, after line 6, add the following new section and renumber all successive sections accordingly:

SEC. 10. Section 2(b)(3) of the Export-Import Bank Act of 1945 is further amended by inserting at the end thereof the following:

"; and

"(C) in the case of any transaction involving the sale of a nuclear reactor, an evaluation based upon an analysis prepared by the Nuclear Regulatory Commission (i) describing the nuclear regulatory organization and practices of the recipient country, and (ii) indicating the extent to which the Health and Safety standards adopted and implemented by the recipient country are consistent with those established by the Nuclear Regulatory Commission, and, where applicable, with International Atomic Energy Agency's standards and recommendations.".

POINT OF ORDER

Mr. BAUMAN. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. BAUMAN. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the language of the amendment on the ground that it violates rule XVI, clause 7, of the rules of the House and is not germane to the subject matter before us.

The bill before us deals with amendments to the Export-Import Bank Act, and this pending amendment, although it goes to a section of the act and does pertain to the export of nuclear technology, does not confine itself to that.

If the Chair will address himself to section 2(b)(3) of the Export-Import Bank Act of 1945, the Chair will find that the only requirements imposed there for reporting are those on the president of the Bank to give Congress a complete analysis of the proposed loans to be made. The section does not in fact impose any duties on anyone else or any other agency.

Section 2(b)(4) also imposes duties on the Secretary of State, as well as the Board of Directors of the Bank.

The gentleman's amendment, however, goes beyond anything in the present act and requires a scientific analysis by the Nuclear Regulatory Commission, which is not heretofore mentioned in the act, describing completely both the aspects of the organization and the practices of the recipient country, and even beyond that, the health and safety standards applied within that country.

I am informed by the Nuclear Regulatory Commission that it has no jurisdiction under existing law to address the question of nuclear exports in this matter. Neither the Atomic Energy Act of 1954 nor the Nuclear Nonproliferation Act of 1978 requires the Nuclear Regulatory Commission to review the health and safety standards of the recipient nations of nuclear exports. It has neither the staff nor the funding previously authorized to carry out these duties which are newly imposed by this language.

So, Mr. Chairman, this amendment is beyond the scope of the legislation now before the committee and is outside the jurisdiction of the Committee on Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs. I would submit it is not germane to the bill before us.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Nebraska (Mr. CAVANAUGH) wish to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. CAVANAUGH. I do, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Chairman, the arguments of the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. BAUMAN) do not primarily go to the issue of germaneness here. He vastly expands his argument to the question of the capability of the agency, and those should be substantive arguments based on requirements set out in my amendment. The issue here is whether or not this Congress can, through this legislation, require reports to it on a specific transaction involving the sale of nuclear facilities and whether it can require interagency cooperation in order to achieve that. The entire history of the legislation is replete with interagency cooperation provisions reflecting all aspects of the Federal Government.

The Small Business Administration is mandated by this legislation to cooperate with Ex-Im, as is the Commodity Credit Corporation, and more specifically, with regard to sections 2(b)(3) and 2(b)(4) to which this amendment is particularly germane, the Secretary of State already has analogous responsibilities mandated by Ex-Im legislation conferring particular responsibilities on the Secretary of State and in fact, requiring the Secretary of State to similarly, as this amendment provides, examine cooperation with the International Atomic Energy Agency.

So this amendment and legislation is wholly analogous and germane to the section being amended and to the history of the Eximbank legislation authorization.

Mr. BAUMAN. Mr. Chairman, may I be heard further on the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. BAUMAN).

Mr. BAUMAN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Nebraska (Mr. CAVANAUGH) conveniently ignores my major point. Under the rule of germaneness, the amendment must be germane to the proposition before us.

The gentleman cites as his authority that the present act, the Export-Import Bank Act, in 2 sections requires certain reporting regarding the export of nuclear materials or the financing of them by the Board of the Bank and by the Secretary of State.

The gentleman's amendment goes far beyond that and imposes, for the first time, on a completely different governmental entity, the Nuclear Regulatory Commission, certain judgments to be made, as I have described, as to what the recipient country is doing regarding nuclear matters for health and safety, and to describe completely that country's nuclear capabilities and organization. It even goes so far as to require the NRC to apply the International Atomic Energy Agency's standards, which are not under their jurisdiction, adding still a fourth agency.

Nothing in the present law supports that extension of the power of the Export-Import Bank to make these judgments or to require them from another agency. Therefore, I feel that it is not germane, and the gentleman has not addressed the fact that there is no statutory law which allows the NRC to engage in these practices, nor is there anything in the law that this bill seeks to amend that covers the matters the amendment addresses.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Nebraska (Mr. CAVANAUGH) wish to be heard further on the point of order?

Mr. CAVANAUGH. I do, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized.

Mr. CAVANAUGH. Mr. Chairman, first of all, this amendment does not, as the gentleman from Maryland has stated, require the imposition of IAEA standards or NRC standards on this transaction. It simply requires that the Export-Import Bank provide the Congress with an evaluation based upon an analysis performed by the NRC, and in no way expands the authority of Exim to the imposition of foreign standards or, indeed, of any standards, but simply a compilation of information which is peculiarly within the expertise of the NRC, and it would be impossible for the Export-Import Bank to accomplish its appropriate legislative mandate or evaluation to the Congress preliminary to an extension of credit for the sale of nuclear facilities.

I would urge the chairman that this amendment, therefore, is wholly germane to the existing legislation before us.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Missouri (Mr. VOLKMER) seek recognition on the point of order?

Mr. VOLKMER. Yes, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized.

Mr. VOLKMER. Mr. Chairman, in speaking on the point of order, very briefly, a careful reading of the amendment shows that the amendment itself does not in any way impose on the NRC any additional duties. Clearly this Congress could provide that the Export-Import Bank would not export any nuclear energy or nuclear reactor information and technology. And if the Export-Import Bank is unable to provide this information which is called for in this amendment, my reading of it is they prohibit the exportation of it and the subsidy of it. A careful reading will show it does not impose on the NRC any additional duty.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule on the point of order.

The amendment is drafted as a further condition to be imposed on the Bank before it may approve certain transactions.

From page 20 of the report it is evident that the Eximbank is already required by the bill and by the section of law being amended to consult with and seek the cooperation of diverse Government resources and agencies, including the Small Business Administration, the Commodity Credit Corporation, the Department of State, and the President himself.

For example, on page 20 the report indicates that the Commodity Credit Corporation is called upon to perform new functions in cooperation with the Eximbank.

In addition, section 2(b)(4) of the act already requires that the Bank be in receipt of information relating to compliance with the International Atomic Energy Agency standards.

The Chair will also turn to chapter 28, section 23.1 of Deschler's Procedure, which reads as follows:

To a bill authorizing the procurement of military weapons for the fiscal year, an amendment prohibiting procurement from a particular facility pending the submission of a report by the Comptroller General relating to the feasibility of deactivating that facility was held to be germane. 116 CONG. REC. 14481, 91st Cong. 2d Sess., May 6, 1970.

The Chair also refers to chapter 28, section 24.21 of Deschler's Procedure, which reads as follows:

To a section of a bill reported from the Committee on International Relations authorizing appropriations for humanitarian and evacuation assistance to war refugees in South Vietnam, an amendment making that authorization contingent upon a report to Congress on the costs of a portion of the evacuation program, but not requiring the implementation of any new program (within the jurisdiction of another committee) was held germane as a related contingency. 121 CONG. REC., 94th Cong. 1st Sess., Apr. 23, 1975 [H.R. 6096, the Vietnam Humanitarian and Evacuation Assistance Act].

Therefore, the Chair rules the amendment is germane as a restriction on the authority of the Eximbank.

Accordingly the Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. BAUMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. CAVANAUGH. I yield to the gentleman from Maryland.

PARLIAMENTARY INQUIRY

Mr. BAUMAN. Mr. Chairman, I have a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. BAUMAN. Mr. Chairman, I just wanted to inquire of the Chair whether or not it is parliamentarily possible to make a point of order against the ruling of the Chair for not being germane to the point of order that was made.

The CHAIRMAN. The germaneness rule applies only to amendments. Is the gentleman from Maryland appealing from the ruling of the Chair?

Mr. BAUMAN. No, Mr. Chairman, I am just making an inquiry.

Mr. CAVANAUGH. Mr. Chairman, this amendment will provide access by the Eximbank and the Congress to the expertise of the Nuclear Regulatory Commission in evaluating the safety and feasibility of any extension of Ex-Im financing for exports of nuclear reactor facilities.

My amendment does not require that the NRC become involved in the internal affairs of the foreign government prior to the export authorization. It only asks that the NRC make available the knowledge which is in the NRC's peculiar expertise.

Mr. Chairman, the importance of this amendment cannot be overstated if we are going to increase our exports and the reliability of those exports.

If Eximbank credits are to be repaid, we must determine as well as possible that nuclear reactors erected in foreign countries will be safe and operational.

The loan of more than $600 million by the Eximbank to the Philippines provides a striking example of the need to provide the Eximbank with the expertise required to evaluate the safety of nuclear reactor projects prior to the time they make the commitment for the funding.

Mr. Chairman, the Eximbank has already extended $71 million for this reactor, which may never be completed, because of health and safety hazards, and because of the inadequacy of prior preparation and health and safety review.

It is apparent that the Eximbank now attempts to provide safety review of proposed nuclear projetcs, but does not possess the unique expertise necessary to analyzing these massive funding commitments.

An Ex-Im report to Congress on a nuclear reactor in South Korea contains a paragraph on the safety of the proposed project. This is the first time that the Eximbank has so provided Congress with such information. It is apparent from that report that the basis and foundation of the analysis is wholly inadequate to justify a sound conviction by the Congress or even by Eximbank, the financer, of the security and feasibility of that project or of any other project.

The committee during its markup of this legislation decided not to accept my amendment pending an NRC staff study, which has now been completed. The results of that staff study are inconclusive and indecisive on this particular question. I think that there is considerable division of opinion within the NRC itself, and I have recently had conversation with two of the commissioners of NRC who have indicated broad sympathy with this type of legislation and a clear understanding of its necessity in order for Exim to properly and appropriately carry out its responsibilities.

I, therefore, urge support of this amendment, and encourage the Members to understand that this is an authorization for 5 years. We may not in the near future have the opportunity to address that very serious problem. I urge its support.

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAVANAUGH. I yield to the gentlewoman from Ohio.

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman have any idea as to the amount of money the Eximbank releases for the building of nuclear plants throughout the world?

Mr. CAVANAUGH. I would have to say that I do not have the aggregate figure of existing and contemplated commitments. I can tell the gentlewoman with reference to some specific projects in order that she can appreciate the importance of this amendment. The Philippine project, in which Exim has committed itself to direct loans or loan guarantees, is in excess of $600 million.

Ms. OAKAR. That was just one project?

Mr. CAVANAUGH. Yes. In the case of the South Korean project, most recently submitted to the Congress, the request is for loan commitments and loan guarantees in excess of $800 million for one single project. It would be contemplated that there could be between 6 and 12 additional projects within the next decade to be financed.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has expired.

(At the request of Ms. OAKAR and by unanimous consent, Mr. CAVANAUGH was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Chairman, I would just like to rise in enthusiastic support of this amendment. It is the minimum we should do in terms of protecting those individuals who engage in this kind of activity. The problem, however, really goes beyond that.

Mr. CAVANAUGH. The point the gentlewoman is making that it is a minimum is absolutely correct. This is the absolute minimum. This is perhaps the fifth redraft of this amendment, after continuous consultation with the State Department, Ex-Im, and NRC. There are two fundamental principles, which the amendment addresses. First, an evaluation as to whether a regulatory agency exists, and what its capabilities are; and second, what is the nature and extent of the health and safety standards they have adopted.

Ms. OAKAR. Let me just say that, relating to our own nuclear powerplants, the Comptroller General of the United States put out a report to Congress on September 9, 1977, in which they talk about the hazards and the real questions about what we are doing in our own country, and we have not related to answering these questions. It is of tremendous national interest in bringing these plants in our own country, and here we are engaging in this kind of activity abroad, and not even having minimal standards for protection.

It is such an unknown factor that I would just like to make sure, for the record, that they are aware of this particular report to Congress put out by the Comptroller General of the United States. It is extremely important, and I really want to commend the gentleman.

I really want to commend the gentleman. I hope we support his amendment in this committee. Many of us in the subcommittee supported the amendment and I really feel had we not packed up at that point it would have been passed.

Mr. CAVANAUGH. I thank the gentlewoman for her support.

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAVANAUGH. I yield to the gentleman from Arizona.

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Chairman, I commend the gentleman from Nebraska for his amendment. I want to record myself as in support of his amendment.

It is important that if possible we be able to export our nuclear expertise, but we have to be very careful about it and make sure we are not contributing to dangers in other parts of the world. All this amendment says is that the one agency that has the expertise with respect to the health and safety of these plants take a look at the plans and give their advice to the Eximbank. The amendment does not require the Bank to take the opinion of the NRC. The amendment simply wants to make sure the agency takes a look at the plants.

Mr. CAVANAUGH. That is exactly what this amendment does. This is in no way a licensure or an imposition on a foreign country. All this attempts to do—and everyone is in universal agreement I believe with this—we know the Eximbank does not possess the expertise to make that kind of evaluation and the NRC does, and prior to committing $600 million or $800 million, we want to make sure the Eximbank asks for and receives the opinion of the NRC, that agency of the Government, with the expertise in the area as to the capabilities and standards of the recipient country.

Mr. ANDERSON of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I certainly hope, earnestly hope, that the Members of this House are not going to be stampeded this afternoon into accepting an amendment that I think could have potentially very, very damaging consequences for this country. We are facing this year a deficit in our balance of payments of more than $26 billion.

There are two areas to which we must look if we would try to alter that unfavorable balance of trade. One as we all know is in the field of agriculture, where because of the marvelous efficiency of our farmers we enjoy a comparative economic advantage that no other country in the world enjoys.

The other area in which we can increase our exports and try to increase our exports is in the area of high technology exports. Clearly nuclear technology exports fall within that particular rubric.

There are three very good reasons why the gentleman's amendment should be rejected by the committee.

First of all, it was rejected by the full committee, by the Banking Committee by a vote of 31 to 12. It has been rejected by our own U. S. State Department as an amendment that would potentially do serious damage to our nonproliferation policy. Under the bill sponsored so ably, and for which I voted along with most of the Members of this House, by the gentleman from New York (Mr. BINGHAM), we have a nuclear nonproliferation policy set forth in a Nuclear Export Act controlling the export of nuclear technology.

The State Department in a letter which was sent to the gentleman from Nebraska on May 10 expressed concern that his proposal may well be viewed by other countries as an attempt to impose U.S. health and safety standards unilaterally and would thereby be considered an infringement on their sovereign responsibility. Other countries will not look kindly on nor treat lightly this effort in other words by the United States to unilaterally impose our conditions, our notions as to what health and safety standards should be in these other countries.

Mr. CAVANAUGH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON of Illinois. I mentioned the gentleman's name and I must yield.

Mr. CAVANAUGH. I thank the gentleman from Illinois for yielding.

The gentleman is correct in quoting the letter of May 10.

On June 1, I received an additional letter in answer to 10 questions which I sent to the State Department on April 25. In reply to my question No. 7 this is what I have received from the Department of State.

I asked this question:

Does the Department of State feel that safety and feasibility evaluations performed by the NRC on behalf of Ex-Im prior to the committing of Ex-Im Bank financing for a project would imperil the United States as a reliable supplier of nuclear material and equipment for peaceful uses to countries which share our nonproliferation objectives?

The next question goes on to say:

Does the Department of State believe that availing Ex-Im of the expertise of the Nuclear Regulatory Commission in making such safety and feasibility evaluations would impair the United States as a reliable supplier of nuclear material and equipment for peaceful uses? If the Department of State does so believe how would this impairment come about?

The answer of the Department of State was:

The Department does not hold the view that the performance of evaluations by Exim Bank or by any agent, such as the NRC on behalf of Exim Bank, necessary to arrive at a judgment on whether a project should be financed would necessarily adversely affect the U.S. role as a reliable supplier or any other U.S. foreign policy objective.

Mr. ANDERSON of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, the fact of the matter is that I have heard from those who are engaged in the nuclear export business and the nuclear export business is in real trouble in this country today. We simply are losing out to the French, to the British, to the West Germans, and other countries because we cannot convince them that we are reliable suppliers of nuclear technology. I do not care whether the State Department can answer the gentleman's question or not, as far as the nuclear industry is concerned, we simply are not meeting the competition already, and if we add to it the additional uncertainty that must be associated through these proposals with the untimely issuance of such licenses, that will be inserted into the market if we were to adopt this amendment then I can only predict that our exports in this respect are going to go down, down and down in this area because we do not have the capability, we do not have the qualifications to compete with other nations of the world.

Mr. STANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON of Illinois. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. STANTON. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. ANDERSON) yielding me this time.

Not only do I want to associate myself with the remarks made by the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. ANDERSON) but I want to reemphasize what the gentleman has said. First of all, I want to tell the committee that there is some question on this, and there was when it was presented to us in the original subcommittee. Let me say this, we are a banking committee, we are a finance committee, we are involved with the export and the import of goods abroad, but we are not experts on nuclear power. This is a matter that is a very complicated matter, but one thing we are not, and that is we are not a nuclear regulatory agency and we are not connected with nuclear activities.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

(On request of Mr. STANTON, and by unanimous consent, Mr. ANDERSON of Illinois was allowed to proceed for 3 additional minutes.)

Mr. STANTON. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield still further, let me repeat, we do not have the expertise that is needed on such matters as this. I do admire the gentleman from Nebraska (Mr. CAVANAUGH), who has exhibited his expertise in matters relating to nuclear issues, but do not expect the rest of the committee to be experts. Let me further add that we have a committee on energy, we have experts on energy, and we have experts on nuclear matter, and they are the ones who should be coming up and telling the Committee on Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs whether we are doing the correct thing by this or not.

I will be glad to repeat what the gentleman has said that there is a National Nuclear Regulatory Commission who have made studies in this regard, studies that have been going on for some time. They have looked at the Cavanaugh amendment and they are opposed to it. The State Department, so I am told, is opposed to the Cavanaugh amendment. It would bring about the necessity for substitution of our own safety regulations and of extraterritorial applications of U.S. health standards abroad, and I do not know what all would be required. All I know that as a member of the Banking and Currency Subcommittee I suggest that we let the State Department handle it, but not the Committee on Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs.

Mr. ANDERSON of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman from Ohio for his comments.

Mr. Chairman, at the very least we ought to suspend action on the proposal of the gentleman from Nebraska (Mr. CAVANAUGH) until the Committee on International Relations, the committee which has primarily jurisdiction over our Nation's international affairs, control and jurisdiction over the nuclear nonproliferation policy, and the committee of jurisdiction over the Nuclear Regulatory Commission examine this proposal. This involves a drastic rewriting of the policies of the NRC.

Mr. STANTON. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield still further, I think the gentleman from Nebraska (Mr. CAVANAUGH) ought to withdraw his amendment so as to permit our colleagues who are experts on nuclear matters advise the committee on this matter so that we can act on it intelligently, without further bringing the Committee on Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs into the subject of nuclear activities. The next thing you know we will be on an energy bill and then instead of another hour we will be here for probably another month.

Mr. BAUMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON of Illinois. I yield to the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. BAUMAN. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding to me.

Mr. Chairman, I am surprised to see the gentleman from Arizona (Mr. UDALL) who is chairman of the subcommittee on which I am the ranking minority member, the subcommittee that has jurisdiction over the NRC. I might add that formerly the gentleman's joint committee had jurisdiction over these matters, the gentleman is now cavalierly waiving that jurisdiction by his acceptance of the proposed amendment.

Let me add further that we have not held hearings on this matter. The committee staff has not completed its studies sufficiently to give us its conclusions on this particular issue concerning the amendment whatsoever. No decision has been reached indicating that we should go in the direction the amendment suggests. It is entirely too premature and, at best, this is no place to be regulating a fundamental change in our nuclear policy.

Mr. ANDERSON of Illinois. I share the gentleman's surprise and disappointment that the chairman of the full committee would take the position that he did.

Mr. NEAL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. STANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEAL. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. STANTON. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I just wondered if the Chairman would consider this. I had thought it was rather unfair because some of us opposed to the amendment have not had a chance to say what we want to, but I have been told that some people have airplanes to catch around 4:30 o'clock and 5 o'clock. I just wonder if the Chairman would not ask to see if we could limit this debate on this very important amendment to maybe 15 minutes, or something like that.

Mr. NEAL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that we limit debate on this amendment to 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

Mr. KOSTMAYER. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is heard.

Mr. NEAL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that we limit debate on this amendment to 30 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

Mr. KOSTMAYER. Mr. Chairman, I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is heard.

Mr. NEAL. Mr. Chairman, it is my understanding that the Nuclear Regulatory Commission must issue an export license for all of our nuclear exports already, and in talking with the author of the amendment I learned that his primary concern was not the health and safety and environmental concerns that some have been speaking to here, but the question of whether or not we are going to get repaid on these loans. In the letter he sent around he raised the question of who is going to repay the loan on that nuclear reactor built in the Philippines if it should not work out. All right, we have never had a default on one of these loans. The main reason, as I understand it, is that we on all of these nuclear exports get the full faith and credit of the government importing the product, and certainly they have so much more to lose in terms of other advantageous relationships with us that they are certainly not going to endanger that whole relationship just so that they do not have to pay for one nuclear reactor, assuming that it does not work out. The fact of the matter is that we have a 100 percent, as I understand it, collection record on these types of projects.

The point I am trying to make is that if that is the major concern of the gentleman, that we are repaid in a timely fashion, then the amendment is totally unnecessary.

Mr. CAVANAUGH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEAL. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. CAVANAUGH. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I know I have discussed this particular point with the chairman, but the chairman understands that U.S. exporters have become much more aggressive, and I think appropriately so, as I said in my opening remarks. This amendment is in no way intended to constrict but rather to expand future opportunities for nuclear exports, but we have become much more aggressive in terms of making those exports available to less developed countries, countries without a strong, firm technological base of their own, and ones which may not be capable yet of absorbing this technology. The fact that the point in time at which the lender, Eximbank, enters the transaction is at the very origin of the proposed transaction and they have no expertise in the Bank to make the necessary evaluations, but that expertise does exists in NRC. The reason I would make the expertise of the NRC available to the Eximbank is to allow Exim to use the NRC in it evaluation of the feasibility of the proposed project.

When the chairman contends that Exim should not be concerned about the repayment for the project because they have the full faith and credit of the recipient country, that is the purpose of this amendment. I think the NRC is much more expert in providing these fundamental evaluations of the capability of the country to absorb and utilize this very sophisticated and costly technology than is Eximbank, and why not avail Exim of this expertise, and protect the integrity of the investment? Why not assure that a loan is going to be repaid because the plant will become operational and because it will be economically feasible for the country to repay?

Mr. NEAL. The gentleman asks why not. There are a number of very good reasons not to do it, some of which have been discussed here, the main one being that it only weakens us in world trade for no benefit. The Department of State says that this will weaken our attempts to limit proliferation of nuclear problems around the world, because if we do not make the loans, the plant will be built anyway. Someone else will build it, and they may not require that the Nuclear Regulatory Commission approve the export license. I guess they would have no ability to require it.

Mr. CAVANAUGH. That is not what the State Department said to me in its letter of June 1, 1978.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. NEAL was allowed to proceed for 5 additional minutes.)

Mr. NEAL. Mr. Chairman, let me point out to the gentleman: The gentleman has, as I understand, the general support of one of the members of the Nuclear Regulatory Commission, Mr. Victor Gilinsky. I have a copy of a letter Mr. Gilinsky wrote to Mr. CAVANAUGH on June 1. In that letter he says:

It is not practical for the NRC staff to conduct safety reviews in connection with Ex-Im loans for nuclear exports.

That is the gentleman's supporter on the Nuclear Regulatory Commission.

I ask the gentleman, Who asked for this? Who wants this? Did the Bank ask for this? Did the State Department ask for it? Who wants it, can the gentleman tell me?

Mr. CAVANAUGH. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield further, I think the public wants it. I think the public and this Congress should want it, who support and authorize the Eximbank to provide the financing for these facilities up to the tune of $800 million, that the public ought to be assured that when a banker is going out to make a loan that he is making it for a viable, realistic, secure project. That is all that this amendment is directed to.

Mr. NEAL. There is no problem with that. We have a 100-percent repayment record. We have the full faith and credit of these other governments behind these loans. We do not need to improve on that. The gentleman has a solution; we do not have a problem.

Let me make one other point. I would like to make several, but, first, the year-long study that we have been waiting for, for which we are all waiting anxiously to understand, says that "the potential benefits" did not outweigh the adverse political impact "it would have to recipient countries."

That is, most countries do not appreciate us coming in and telling them how to run their internal affairs, setting their environmental standards, their work standards, their energy standards, their transportation standards, and so on, I guess any more than we would not like it if some other country came in and told us how to run our internal affairs.

Mr. CAVANAUGH. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield further, this is the greatest distortion ever perpetrated on this amendment.

First of all, this amendment does not impose NRC standards or IAEA standards on a recipient country in any fashion. What the amendment does do is ask those countries to whom the Eximbank is going to lend $600 million or $700 million, what kind of nuclear regulatory agency they have, and what their standards are, and how those standards compare to those of the NRC or the IAEA where applicable. That is a reasonable thing for both the lender to ask and the Congress who has responsibility for the Eximbank. The NRC is the only agency of Government capable of providing a reasonably sound answer to the questions.

Mr. NEAL. Mr. Chairman, let me ask the gentleman one more question. Why then was it rejected by this year-long study?

Mr. CAVANAUGH. It was not rejected by the year-long study. In conversation with Mr. Bradford from the Commission yesterday, I quoted him the industry language to which the gentleman is referring, and if the gentleman has it available, I would appreciate having it.

I do not have it available, but the language was that the Cavanaugh amendment was rejected by the year-long study of the NRC.

Commissioner Bradford said, "That is absolutely wrong."

I said, "May I quote you?"

And he said, "Please quote me. I did not reject it."

First, NRC options 6 and 7 are not the Cavanaugh amendment. They do not encompass the scope or intent of the Cavanaugh amendment. They go far beyond it. The only option considered even remotely analogous to my amendment was not a specified option, but it says on page 50 of the report:

It has also been suggested that NRC might participate unofficially in such export analyses now regularly performed by other U.S. agencies (such as Exim Bank). Although such unofficial assistance is not well defined, presumably it might include lending NRC assistance to provide independent, expert advice in such analyses. The staff has no objection to such expert assistance, providing: (1) analyses would not bind the NRC to findings and conclusions developed by other agencies; (2) sufficient NRC experts are available; and (3) the reviews are part of a presently existing program of the other agency to make overall project and feasibility assessments.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has again expired.

(At the request of Mr. CAVANAUGH, and by unanimous consent, Mr. NEAL was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. NEAL. Mr. Chairman, I would just like to say to the gentleman from Nebraska (Mr. CAVANAUGH) that for many reasons mentioned here this amendment would cripple our exports. We are running big trade deficits now, and we need to export more.

I really would have to say that the gentleman accomplishes nothing by this, because we do not have a bad payment history on nuclear exports. I think the amendment is unneeded.

Mr. CAVANAUGH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEAL. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. CAVANAUGH. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for his comment.

I can only say that all the arguments put forward are either distortions of the basic argument and its purpose or distortions of the facts as they exist, and I think that is very unfortunate.

Mr. NEAL. We made the statement that we have been repaid on our nuclear loans. Is that a distortion?

Mr. CAVANAUGH. No.

Mr. NEAL. Would this amendment not harm our exports?

Mr. CAVANAUGH. There are projects currently financed that are in jeopardy, and I cite, for instance, the project in the Philippines.

Mr. NEAL. How do we know that? We have the full faith and credit of the Government.

Mr. CAVANAUGH. But the project itself is in grave jeopardy, and there is no assurance the Government is going to want to pay for a project that does not come to completion.

Mr. MOORHEAD of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska.

This is substantially the same amendment as was rejected by the Banking Committee during markup by a vote of 31 to 12.

Such an amendment is opposed by the State Department on the grounds that the responsibility for the health and safety arrangements for a nuclear facility rests with the sovereign government in whose territory the facility is to operate. Any effort to impose U.S. standards would clearly be viewed as an infringement upon those sovereign responsibilities. The most likely result would be to reduce the U.S. role as a nuclear supplier, doing serious damage to our nonproliferation policy.

This is not to mention the practical impossibility of investigating and perhaps monitoring the activities of domestic health and safety agencies of a foreign government which is not disposed to be cooperative.

As long as the United States is not the only supplier of nuclear reactors, it cannot arbitrarily impose its own safety standards upon the world.

I think it is important to note that reactors exported from the United States are designed and built to the same standards as those built for use within the United States. Thus our safety standards are already incorporated into foreign plants using American-made equipment. Additional health and safety analysis is available and is used by developing nations from commercial consulting organizations, and by way of bilateral arrangements between such countries and the Nuclear Regulatory Commission for cooperation and assistance to them in developing and implementing their safety programs.

The United States also supports the efforts of the International Atomic Energy Agency to advance safety through the development and promulgation of international safety codes and guidelines. I submit that these efforts are the appropriate means of advancing world health and safety standards.

I also understand that the staff of the Nuclear Regulatory Commission has completed an extensive study which reaches conclusions similar to mine.

The United States cannot set itself up as the arbiter of health and safety standards for the world and expect the world to merely acquiesce. The dramatic drop in U.S. nuclear export sales in the last few years, while French and German industries have garnered upward of $12 billion worth of nuclear export orders dramatically illustrates the potential results of such U.S. action.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, as the original author of the Nonproliferation Act of 1978, I would like to say with all due respect to my honored colleague, the gentleman from Illinois, that I do not see anything inconsistent whatsoever in that act and in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska (Mr. CAVANAUGH).

It seems to me, as a matter of fact, that they move to some extent in the same direction. If the State Department has expressed the opinion that this amendment would hurt our nonproliferation objectives, I simply cannot agree with that conclusion.

I would think that the Eximbank itself would want the kind of information provided for in the Cavanaugh amendment. All we are talking about here is information, both for the Bank and for the Congress. The information would be in the form of an evaluation by the people who are best qualified to make it, namely the NRC.

I would not think the Bank would want the responsibility of passing on the types of questions that are raised here.

I think under this amendment the NRC would to a certain extent get involved in questions that it has not been involved in in the past. However, it seems to me we should all want to see that our nuclear reactors, if they are going overseas, are not only designed in a safe manner—and I agree with the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. MOORHEAD) that the design would be the same—but that the maintenance and operation would be safe.

The worst things that could happen to the nuclear export industry, or the nuclear industry as a whole, would be for some disaster to occur in a developing country because a plant is not being properly operated or properly safeguarded.

So I would think that those who want to see the exports proceed—and I do—under proper conditions would also want to have this kind of protection and this kind of information come to the Bank and to the Congress.

I really cannot understand the position of the Bank. I understand it is somewhat equivocal.

I would like to yield to my friend, the gentleman from Nebraska (Mr. CAVANAUGH), to tell us what the position of the president of the Bank is on this problem.

Mr. CAVANAUGH. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I am honored the gentleman supports this amendment. I would consider the gentleman the author and the father of the Nonproliferation Act. I think clearly his statement in no way conflicts with that act. It should carry great weight with the membership. But I am similarly confounded by the position of the Export-Import Bank. Yesterday afternoon I discussed the matter with the chairman of the Bank. I have continuously pressed the representatives of the Bank as to what the basis of their objection was, why they would not want to avail themselves of this expertise, and I have never received a satisfactory answer to that inquiry. Yesterday the President's concern was whether the NRC would object. There is a division in NRC, among the directors of NRC, and within the staff of NRC as to what the scope or involvement should be. There is a clear capability in the NRC. If there is not, we should certainly do away with NRC.

Today I informed the chairman of that fact and today his concern is the State Department. He has never expressed a concern peculiar to Export-Import, why Export-Import would object to having this very needed availability of expertise.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for his comments.

Let me just say that I am certainly not aware, nor have I ever been advised by the State Department, of its opposition to this amendment, and certainly not in the form in which it is presently worded.

The gentleman has modified the amendment and modified it, until very little is left except, as I have indicated, a requirement for information based upon evaluation by the most expert agency, and that information I would think the Bank would want and I would think the Congress would want.

Mr. NEAL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. NEAL. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

The Bank does seek this kind of information.

Mr. BINGHAM. But is the Bank as well qualified as the NRC to evaluate the information?

Mr. NEAL. I just have to say that officials in the administration oppose this amendment because it is premature. They think it threatens potential damage to our exports, and raises an unknown factor in cost and time delays. Further, they say this amendment would be seen as an attempt to dictate our will, and potentially could cause political damage in our relations with other countries. For these and for some of the other reasons, Mr. Chairman, it is simply premature.

I would think the gentleman would want to hold some hearings on it. I am not unalterably opposed to the concept. As I told the gentleman, we share the same goals. I agree with the gentleman that it would be a disaster if we had an explosion in some country because of sloppy procedures here.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York (Mr. BINGHAM) has expired.

(On request of Mr. NEAL and by unanimous consent, Mr. BINGHAM was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I do not see how, looking at this amendment, it could possibly be said, and I cannot imagine anybody in the State Department saying, on the basis of this language, that this is going to be interpreted as an attempt by the United States to impose unilaterally its standards on other countries.

As I have indicated, this is a matter of getting evaluation and information. If the Export-Import Bank does get such information and evaluation, does determine whether the project makes sense, whether it is going to be a safe project, I am glad to hear them gentlemen say that, but I would think NRC would be better qualified to make that evaluation than the Bank itself.

Mr. NEAL. I would think this would be of special interest to the gentleman: The State Department has said that they oppose this, in a letter to the Committee on Banking, on May 10, and again on June 1.

Mr. BINGHAM. Is that in respect to the language of the present amendment?

Mr. NEAL. I believe it is. Let me give the gentleman the exact quote. I think the present language is very similar.

* * * could do serious damage to our nonproliferation policy.

Is not that of some concern?

Mr. BINGHAM. I understand that they said that with regard to a prior version.

I would like to yield to my friend the gentleman from Nebraska (Mr. CAVANAUGH), to clarify that point.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York (Mr. BINGHAM) has expired.

(On request of Mr. CAVANAUGH and by unanimous consent, Mr. BINGHAM was allowed to proceed for 3 additional minutes.)

Mr. CAVANAUGH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. CAVANAUGH. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

There is no more expert Member of this body on the standards of the Nuclear Nonproliferation Act.

Does the gentleman see anything offensive in this amendment to the goal, the aspirations, and the implementation of that act?

Mr. BINGHAM. I certainly cannot.

Mr. CAVANAUGH. I think that that is adequate address to that question.

As I previously said, Mr. Chairman, I did not feel that the goal of this amendment, when I set it out in questions rather than in amendment form, in any way imperils the reliability of U.S. industry as an exporter.

I think the bottom line here, as the gentleman from Illinois stated when he responded to me when he said that he does not care what the State Department position is, is that it is the industry's position. What the industry's position is is that they want no standards or evaluation performed by Eximbank prior to the commitment of the funds because then the project is committed before any inspection agency of this Government has ever evaluated its feasibility, its desirability, or its future reliability.

Mr. Chairman, that is what this amendment is all about. Let us put the cash on the barrelhead regardless of the consequences.

Again, Mr. Chairman, that is what this amendment is all about.

Mr. ANDERSON of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. ANDERSON of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether the gentleman from Nebraska (Mr. CAVANAUGH) is even remotely aware of the fact that for many years we have had in existence an Advisory Committee on Reactor Safeguards and that there is not a reactor manufactured in this country today, whether it is to be operated within the United States or exported abroad, that does not have to comply with the most rigorous safety standards established by that body?

We have on that board the distinguished gentleman from Washington (Mr. McCormack), who can attest to what I just said.

The idea that is somehow sought to be created that we have companies in this country which are just going to go out and wantonly sell equipment dangerous to human life, which is going to explode, is a myth and ought to be exposed as such.

Mr. BINGHAM. I am sure the gentleman is not saying that the care with which a reactor is operated and the degree of protection afforded during the operation of the reactor, which is under the control of the country where it is located, is of no importance. Any reactor, no matter how safely built, can be unsafely operated.

I am sure the gentleman will agree with that.

Mr. ANDERSON of Illinois. If the gentleman will yield further, he will recall, I think, earlier when the gentleman from Nebraska was discussing his amendment he said that part of the purpose of his amendment was to get a report to Congress on the question of whether or not the economy of the particular country was mature enough to absorb this kind of technology.

I would suggest that the gentleman's amendment goes far beyond merely going into a question of that nature.

Mr. KOSTMAYER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in support of the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, as the objector to the limitation on time, let me say that I do not seek to prolong this debate needlessly. Rather, I think it is an important debate and should be conducted thoroughly.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment of my friend, the gentleman from Nebraska (Mr. Cavanaugh). I think it is important to remember a number of things which this amendment does not do.

First, it does not require the Eximbank to follow the recommendations of the NRC. Rather, it states that the NRC will provide an evaluation, but not a mandatory one. Secondly, it does not inject the United States into the internal affairs of other countries. It does not impose the moral, political, or philosophical views of own country on other countries. It is not a licensing procedure. We are not exporting the standards of the United States to other countries.

There are a number of things it does do, however. It does require the Nuclear Regulatory Commission to review the question of safety when the sale of a nuclear reactor is proposed.

Mr. Chairman, this amendment was rejected by the committee. It was rejected apparently because there were those on the committee who felt the NRC did not have the capability to carry it out. Since that time the NRC has indicated they do have that capability.

Mr. BAUMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KOSTMAYER. I yield to the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. BAUMAN. Mr. Chairman, I just think the gentleman ought to check more closely before he makes a statement like the one he just made.

I am informed by representatives of the staff of the NRC that they do not have either the funds, the staff, or the capability to carry out the extensive investigation regarding nuclear activities in foreign lands which this language would require, and no committee of Congress has ever authorized it.

Mr. KOSTMAYER. It is my understanding that there is an equal division of opinion with respect to that.

Mr. CAVANAUGH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KOSTMAYER. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. CAVANAUGH. Mr. Chairman, I can only say to the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. Bauman) that if the staff of the NRC has so advised him that this language would invite inspections in foreign countries, they have deliberately, maliciously, and intentionally misinformed the gentleman.

Mr. BAUMAN. If the gentleman will yield, Mr. Chairman, I did not say that.

Mr. CAVANAUGH. I have been in continuous contact with that staff. They know that this amendment in no way requires what the gentleman is talking about.

Mr. BAUMAN. If the gentleman will yield, Mr. Chairman, I did not say that. I said they did not have the funds, the staff, or the capability at this point to carry out the studies the amendment would mandate.

If the gentleman wants to proceed in regular legislative order, come before the proper committees and propose this amendment, maybe it will be adopted and funded.

Mr. CAVANAUGH. This in no way imposes those responsibilities on the staff. The gentleman is incorrectly advised, and I would say he was incorrectly advised by NRC.

Mr. NEAL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KOSTMAYER. I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. NEAL. Mr. Chairman, on this point, in this review that has been quoted, the same proposal discussed what they call a limited technical review, which I believe will be similar to what the gentleman from Nebraska is proposing. When they talk about that, this is what they say:

> Implementation of this alternative would create substantial impact on NRC staff requirements. Increased manpower would be required for reporting technical reviews. The staff estimates a requirement of no more than 10 man years for export reviews.

Going to the bottom of the page, this assumes that for the first period of use roughly 10 man-years review, and then two to three years to complete a review. It takes into account likely export trends over the next few years.

The other point it makes is that on the other hand, there may be disadvantages to such reviews. The additional scrutiny of nuclear reactor exports and the attendant administrative burden would be viewed by importing countries as intruding into their internal affairs, and imposing new unilateral conditions for receiving U.S. nuclear exports, especially when the results of the reviews become public. The published reports would tend to put officials of the recipient countries under pressure to act, which would be resented. Such reviews could give the false impression that NRC was assuming responsibility for future security safety.

Mr. CAVANAUGH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KOSTMAYER. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. CAVANAUGH. The chairman is reading an option presented by the NRC that is not at all relevant to my amendment here. The language that he is reading from the report does not relate to the amendment I have addressed here.

We are not calling for reviews or structural analyses. We only ask two things, if the chairman would re-read my amendment. One, to describe the regulatory organization that exists within the country. How could we expect to lend six or eight hundred million dollars without determining that there is a regulatory agency that exists within the country?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

(At the request of Mr. Cavanaugh and by unanimous consent, Mr. Kostmayer was allowed to proceed for 3 additional minutes.)

Mr. CAVANAUGH. That is all it asks, to tell the Congress, does one exist, does such an agency exist and to tell the level of sophistication of such agency. That is knowledge NRC has concerning all regulatory agencies existing anywhere in the world. The problem is, we might have a company that goes out and tries to sell to a country that does not have an agency.

Secondly, if that agency is existing, what rules and regulations has it adopted, and how do they conform or not conform with the NRC rules and the IAEA rules? That is a clear, simple reporting requirement. All they have to do is look at their own rules and look at the rules of the IAEA, and tell us how the adopting country conforms. That is all it does.

There are no 10 man-years, there are about 5 hours, assuming NRC does know where all the agencies are and know what their rules are and where the other rules of IAEA can be found, and then will tell us how the recipient country conforms or does not conform. The NRC staff study states that NRC does have this information now.

My amendment never commented on the option you cite. Commissioner Bradford said, in my phone conversation with him regarding the statement that my amendment was rejected by NRC, he said, "Absolutely wrong. Quote me, please quote me."

And those are the facts.

Mr. KOSTMAYER. Mr. Chairman, if I might make a final point, I think this amendment actually would protect the industry.

Let me read briefly from the RECORD of July 26 from remarks entered by the gentleman from Nebraska (Mr. CAVANAUGH) as follows:

> An example of this scenario has already occurred. The loan of more than $600 million by Ex-Im to the Philippines has already resulted in an Ex-Im outlay of $52,660,000. The Philippines reactor was begun, but work was halted when the site was found to be in the vicinity of five active volcanoes. If the plant never becomes operational it is unlikely the Philippines will repay Ex-Im.

If we can prevent the commencement of construction of such reactors, I think that would be preferable to countries simply not paying for them upon the discovery that they were unsafe.

I think the amendment is modest and sensible.

The gentleman from North Carolina has said we do not have the right to impose certain standards on others. I think we have a right to impose standards of safety on others and on ourselves. It seems to me to be an imminently practical amendment. I urge my colleagues to adopt it.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I want to commend the gentleman from Nebraska. I know his amendment is offered with all good intentions. However, I think it is a mistaken approach. It could have an extremely damaging impact. It should be rejected.

After communicating with the State Department and the NRC, the gentleman from Nebraska will state, as he has stated, that he has changed the wording on several occasions. This is all the more reason why we should not be adopting that amendment at the moment. We are dealing with a half dozen variations or so of it. We do not know even what the final reactions of the various agencies are.

The gentleman from Nebraska has repeated on several occasions that the NRC has not rejected the amendment. Of course that is true. The NRC has not taken any formal action on this amendment. Just as the NRC would never take any formal action on any amendment before this House. Such an act would be unthinkable, and to protest that NRC has not done so is meaningless.

In conversations with the staff of the NRC I have been told forcibly that there is not:

> Money for carrying out the purposes of this amendment in the budget; that the NRC is not staffed up for such responsibilities, that it is not practical for the NRC to try to deal with the problems which this responsibility would create, particularly with respect to standards in other countries involving site characteristics, seismic standards, types of cooling, and so on.

The amendment reads in part:

> * * * Health and Safety standards adopted and implemented. * * *

I emphasize "safety * * * standards * * * implemented. * * *"

What are we going to do if the NRC is required to explore the seismic characteristics of a proposed site for a plant in another country before the sale can be accomplished, or even before an order could be taken? One could easily construe the amendment to say that the NRC would have to do seismic exploration at a site, and for any alternate site, for a particular plant.

This is why the State Department has over and over again said that:

> We do not want this. It would constitute intruding into the affairs of other countries.

And the nations trying to buy nuclear plants will not allow such an intrusion. They will simply go to another nation to buy their nuclear plants.

It is important for us to understand that the United States does not have a monopoly on nuclear technology any more than we have a monopoly on wisdom. Why should we think that our standards are superior to somebody else's? There is no justification for such myopia. Some of us seem to sit here thinking that we are better than other nations, and we don't have higher standards.

If other nations have different standards, it may be a minute difference in size between two large numbers. The difference may be, as for instance, between the numbers "one million" and "one million and one." What gives us the right to say that our one million and one is better than their one million, or vice versa? What gives us the right to say that if a foreign nation does not conform to our one million and one that our vendors cannot sell to them? They will say to us: "Go fly a kite. We'll buy from somebody else."

This would be no idle threat. According to recent figures, there are 112 nuclear powerplants operating in the free world outside the United States. Of those, 22 were manufactured in the United States the other 90 were manufactured in some other country.

If anyone thinks that the United States has some sort of monopoly, he is kidding himself. If we put these kinds of restrictions on loans, there will not be loans; and there will not be exports. This country will be weakened, not only with respect to our trade balance, but also with respect to the fact that our manufacturing industry, on which we must depend in the future for much of our own energy, will be in a precarious position. That is what this amendment would do. It is not just a simple amendment that requires the NRC just to check in on another country. That is simply not true. It would require extensive intrusion by the NRC into the private business of other sovereign nations.

Mr. Chairman, it is for these reasons that the State Department opposes this amendment. I trust the Members will understand this, and reject the amendment overwhelmingly.

Mr. WEISS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, in case there is any confusion I would like to read the amendment. The amendment requires that there be:

> * * * in the case of any transaction involving the sale of a nuclear reactor, an evaluation based upon an analysis prepared by the Nuclear Regulatory Commission (i) describing the nuclear regulatory organization and practices of the recipient country, and (ii) indicating the extent to which the Health and Safety standards adopted and implemented by the recipient country are consistent with those established by the Nuclear Regulatory Commission, and, where applicable, with International Atomic Energy's standards and recommendations.

Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that that language is so simple and so clear that it takes an act of will and effort to distort it and to make something else of it.

What it says, is that you take our rules and regulations and the recipient country's and you compare them and then you tell the Export-Import Bank how they agree or differ. That is all it says.

Mr. CAVANAUGH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEISS. Of course I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. CAVANAUGH. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman from New York (Mr. WEISS) for yielding to me because he is saying specifically what my amendment proposes. The gentleman is absolutely correct. I think it does take a very strong desire to read anything else into my amendment or to arrive at any other conclusion.

I thank the gentleman for making that very clear.

Mr. WEISS. Mr. Chairman, I had occasion to listen earlier in the debate to the distinguished gentleman from New York (Mr. BINGHAM) wherein he said, and I think quite correctly, that the Export-Import Bank should want, should be pleading to have the Nuclear Regulatory Commission make this kind of independent reporting to it. They can then go ahead and do what they want, but at least they have the Nuclear Regulatory Commission citing the law on whether or not the rules and regulations are consistent or inconsistent.

Mr. CAVANAUGH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. WEISS. I yield further to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. CAVANAUGH. Mr. Chairman, again, I could not agree more with the point the gentleman from New York (Mr. WEISS) is making. I think it is a source of great sadness and despair for many of us who support this administration, or who are attempting to, to see that they have not supported this very simple, fundamental, good-business-practice amendment to the Export-Import Bank. The Export-Import Bank should be ashamed of itself, as should the State Department, for not recognizing the fundamental, essential responsibility involved in implementing this type of amendment and to avail themselves of the expertise of the Nuclear Regulatory Commission.

I thank the gentleman for making that clear.

Mr. WEISS. Mr. Chairman, I am pleased to do so. In closing, I want to extend my appreciation, and I believe I speak also on behalf of a great many of the other Members, to the gentleman from Nebraska (Mr. CAVANAUGH) for offering this very effective, very clear, very precise, and very necessary amendment.

I might say that an objective observer, if one had been watching and listening to this debate, and then reading of the language of the proposed amendment, would have to wonder why there is so much opposition to this simple, modest amendment. What in the world is going on?

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEISS. I yield to the gentlewoman from Ohio.

Ms. OAKAR. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Obviously there is a need for the amendment. Obviously, according to our Comptroller General report on nuclear energy, we ought to be doing the same thing in our own country in terms of providing various checks, because no one in this body, I am sure, would want nuclear waste products in their districts. That is the great dilemma. The point is there is a need. They tried to build, or are in the process of building, a nuclear plant—if one can believe it—next to five volcanoes in the Philippines.

Mr. WEISS. If the gentlewoman would yield back to me for just 1 second, in California they tried to build one on the San Andreas fault. They finally had some second thoughts about it because somebody up there decided to rumble them just a bit with a small earth tremor. At that point the decision was made to build it elsewhere.

Ms. OAKAR. If the gentleman will yield further, it will be on our conscience as Americans if we do not pass this amendment, which is a minimal safeguard. It is so minimal that I can hardly believe people would not support it because we really ought not to be engaging in providing these kinds of loans to begin with.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska (Mr. CAVANAUGH).

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. CAVANAUGH. Mr. Chairman, I demand a recorded vote, and pending that I make a point of order that a quorum is not present.

The CHAIRMAN. Evidently a quorum is not present. The Chair announces that pursuant to clause 2, rule XXIII, he will vacate proceedings under the call when a quorum of the committee appears.

Members will record their presence by electronic device.

The call was taken by electronic device.

QUORUM CALL VACATED

The CHAIRMAN. One hundred Members have appeared. A quorum of the Committee of the Whole is present. Pursuant to rule XXIII, clause 2, further proceedings under the call shall be considered as vacated.

The Committee will resume its business.

RECORDED VOTE

The CHAIRMAN. The pending business is the demand of the gentleman from Nebraska (Mr. CAVANAUGH) for a recorded vote.

A recorded vote was ordered.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—ayes 106, noes 266, not voting 60, as follows:

Mrs. SPELLMAN, Mr. KREBS, and Mrs. SMITH of Nebraska changed their vote from "no" to "aye."

Mr. GRASSLEY, Mrs. HECKLER, Mr. MATTOX, and Mrs. FENWICK changed their vote from "aye" to "no."

So the amendment was rejected.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

● Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of Mr. HARKIN's amendment, and commend the gentleman for his continuing efforts and persistence on this vital issue.

As a member of the Subcommittee on International Trade, I have listened to the debates on the wisdom of using our financial instrumentalities in the conduct of foreign policy. Members of that subcommittee and the full Committee on Banking have advanced the notion that the membership of that committee is best served to avoid the question of foreign policy. I, Mr. Chairman, do not share this view.

In the committee's markup, I strongly supported the efforts of the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. TSONGAS) to prohibit Exim activity in South Africa. I was opposed to the efforts of the gentleman from Oregon (Mr. AUCOIN) with regard to Exim activity in the People's Republic of China. I view my support of the Harkin amendment as an extension of these two stances, and more importantly as a commitment to the protection of basic human rights for the people of all nations.

I realize that there will be some adverse effect on our exporting enterprises by virtue of this human rights language.

I would submit that the effects will be minimal. However, the effects this language on the standing of America in the international community and among our own people has an incalculable value.

Mr. Chairman, I urge my colleagues to reemphasize our commitment to the basic human rights and needs of all people by using all of our governmental agencies. I see no reason to exclude the Eximbank from this initiative, and I urge the adoption of the Harkin amendment.●

The CHAIRMAN. There being no further amendments, under the rule, the Committee rises.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker pro tempore (Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI) having assumed the chair, Mr. MINETA, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H.R. 12157) to amend and extend the Export-Import Bank Act of 1945, pursuant to House Resolution 1168, he reported the bill back to the House with sundry amendments adopted by the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the rule, the previous question is ordered.

Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them en gros.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

MOTION TO RECOMMIT OFFERED BY MR. KELLY

Mr. KELLY. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is the gentleman opposed to the bill?

Mr. KELLY. I am, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the motion to recommit.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. KELLY moves to recommit the bill, H.R. 12157, to the Committee on Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the previous question is ordered on the motion to recommit.

There was no objection.

The motion to recommit was rejected.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. STANTON. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—yeas 314, nays 47, not voting 71, as follows:

So the bill was passed.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. NEAL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days within which to revise and extend their remarks, and to include extraneous matter, on the bill just passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. BOLLING). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION FOR COMMITTEE ON APPROPRIATIONS TO FILE PRIVILEGED REPORT ON DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE APPROPRIATIONS BILL, 1979

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Appropriations may have until midnight tonight to file a privileged report on the bill making appropriations for the Department of Defense for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1979, and for other purposes.

Mr. EDWARDS of Alabama reserved all points of order on the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM

(Mr. WRIGHT asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of my seeking this time is to announce our plans generally for the coming week and then to make one unanimous-consent request embodying two requests.

We have done very well in the last 10 days in accomplishing those portions of the program that we had set forth, and for that I want to thank and congratulate the entire membership.

We must continue to do well throughout the remainder of this session of Congress if we are to complete those things absolutely necessary for the conclusion of our business.

At the last accounting there were some 64 expiring authorizations. In addition to that, of course, all of the appropriations must be undertaken. We believe that it is essential for this Congress to complete action on a comprehensive energy program, quite probably on some tax reform or reduction proposal, and of course we must adopt a second budget resolution. All of those things add up to about 75 pieces of "must" legislation.

We have so few working days remaining that we are going to have to continue to maintain a very busy pace in order to achieve our objectives. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, it is our purpose to begin a little earlier on 2 days next week, and to continue a little longer on other days in order to act upon three of the major bills of this session.

Next week we expect to take up and to conclude the foreign aid authorizations bill, the foreign aid appropriations bill, and the military appropriations bill.

For that purpose, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the House shall convene at 10 o'clock on Tuesday next and at 9 o'clock on Friday next.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. RHODES. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I would like to call the attention of the House to the fact that we have some 115 bills which have been reported from the committee, we have some 26 which are in conference, and we have another 125 that are under the category of "likely to be reported"—which adds up to some 266 bills which are in various stages of proceeding through the legislative process.

I am pleased that the majority leader has announced that there are only 75 pieces of "must" legislation. And of course I have no way of knowing how many of those are in this particular number which I have mentioned. I presume that they all are. If this is the situation, then there must be some 190 pieces of legislation or proposed legislation which are either in committee, or out of committee, or in conference, which are not pieces of "must" legislation.

It would be my hope—the gentleman from Texas and I have talked about that, but I have not yet had a chance to talk to the Speaker about it—that we could look at the list of bills which make up this number which I have just put in the record and strike from that list the bills which we feel under no circumstances are likely to become law because the other body would not act on them or because it would not be necessary that they be enacted in this particular session of Congress. We are coming down to the time when, if we are going to do the things we have to do, we cannot do the things which many people perhaps would like to have us do. We will have to put some things over until the next Congress.

So may I ask my good friend, the gentleman from Texas (Mr. WRIGHT), No. 1, if it would be possible for us to make some sort of an arrangement whereby at a date certain in the not-too-distant future the legislative committees would quit work, the Committee on Rules would quit work, and the leadership—I would certainly be happy to join in this effort—would announce to the Members of the House that certain bills will be expected to be adopted before we adjourn sine die, and no more, realizing of course that some flexibility would be necessary and it would be necessary for the Speaker and the majority leader, hopefully in consultation with the minority, to perhaps from time to time, and only on definite selected occasions, bring in legislation which is not on that list.

Is it possible for us to arrive at such a state of affairs?

Mr. WRIGHT. In response to the gentleman's question, it not only is possible, I think it is imperative.

Obviously, not all of those 190 bills to which the gentleman makes reference will be able to be considered, let alone enacted, during the remaining days of this session.

The distinguished minority leader has made a suggestion which already has been contemplated and on which action has been initiated, in fact, by the Speaker. The Speaker, according to my information, is at this moment going over a list which he hopes to be able to present to the Steering and Policy Committee; and based upon that list of "must" legislation, I believe the Speaker intends to make a request at a relatively early date of the Committee on Rules for the establishment of a cutoff date, with the exception of vitally important legislation or emergencies which we cannot now foresee. We would expect that there might be a shutoff date for authorizing committees.

When that list is finalized or even put in raw form which is understandable, I can assure the distinguished minority leader that we would have no objection whatsoever to sharing that list with him since he bears, along with us, the joint responsibility of trying to accomplish those things necessary to the enactment of legislation.

Mr. RHODES. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from Texas (Mr. WRIGHT), my distinguished friend, and assure him that I will cooperate. I think we must all cooperate if we are going to take the time off which I think we all need in August and then adjourn this House, hopefully, not later than the first day of October.

I realize that there may be some reason to anticipate some slippage in the adjournment date. I hope that there will not be too much.

I might ask the gentleman from Texas, Is it still the intention of the leadership, of the majority, to observe the days for work at home which we have projected for August and also the adjournment target of October 1?

Mr. WRIGHT. I assure my friend, the distinguished minority leader, that it definitely is the plan and intention of the leadership to observe the August home district work period which has been previously announced.

It is our present anticipation and our expectation that we will be able to conclude this session by October 7. I should think it unlikely that we would finish on the first day of October; but at the conclusion of the first week of October, we intend to be able to finish. This will permit Members of both parties, of course, to return to their constituencies and report to them on the activities of this Congress.

Mr. RHODES. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. BOLLING). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. ROUSSELOT. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, can the gentleman tell us, if we are going to come in on Friday at 9 o'clock a week from tomorrow, that the leadership will make every effort to be sure that committees are not meeting so that there is a conflict and the potential markup of bills that will not ever reach the floor anyway?

Mr. WRIGHT. If the gentleman will yield, it is my impression that fewer committees meet on Fridays than on almost any other day. We took that fact into account in proposing the unanimous consent request. We wanted to disrupt or disturb committees to the least extent possible. I should think that if we were to come in at 9 o'clock on next Friday, a week from tomorrow, committees might well be advised not to plan sessions unless it were absolutely necessary to meet some deadline, of which I am unaware.

We will do very well, indeed, if next week we can complete these targets we have set forth, completing total debate and action on all amendments and bills, on the foreign aid authorization, the foreign aid appropriation bill, and the Defense Department appropriation bill. Those are three of the biggest and most controversial bills of the session.

For that reason we hope to come in early on Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday at 10 o'clock and at 9 o'clock on Friday. On Monday, Tuesday, and Thursday we will perhaps go later, perhaps until 7 o'clock. I believe we can complete those bills, and I think it is vitally important for the rest of the session and for meeting these other targets that we do complete those bills next week.

Mr. ROUSSELOT. I cannot argue with anything the gentleman said about what he is trying to do here on the floor. My question relates to the problem which we have, where we constantly get requests in here for committees to meet, different requests being made for marking up some great, critical bill. The problem is, we get five or six of these requests per day, and if the leadership can help us by encouraging these committees to announce that they have completed their work so that this critical legislation we have on the floor will be given the attention of the entire membership, we will not have to shuttle back and forth between here and committee meetings.

Mr. WRIGHT. The gentleman makes a good point, unquestionably, and to the extent the persuasion of this Member is efficacious, it will be applied.

Mr. ROUSSELOT. I thank the gentleman, and I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to ask two questions, if I may, of the distinguished majority leader. First, with respect to Fridays, many of us had hoped that it would be possible for us to have Fridays at home. I judge from what the distinguished majority leader has said that it is not contemplated, at least between now and the August 18 adjournment, that we will have any free Fridays. Is that correct?

Mr. WRIGHT. I believe that would be correct, if the gentleman would yield. The gentleman from Florida recognizes the exigencies of the situation, the necessities of scheduling. I just believe it would be altogether unrealistic for any Member to anticipate that there would not be, between now and August 18, any free Fridays.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker, my second question is, those of us who live in the eastern part of the United States would be very much favored if we knew that there would not be a vote on suspensions on Mondays until, say, 3 o'clock in the afternoon. For example, if I am to be here by 1:30 or something like that, to be sure that I can vote on suspensions—and as the distinguished gentleman knows, sometimes there will be five or six votes, so that one's record of absenteeism shows up very badly if we miss them—in order to do that, I have to leave home on either an 8 o'clock plane or an 8:45 plane to be sure to be here on time.

If I could leave on a 12:10 plane, which gets me here at 2 o'clock or a little after, I would have the whole morning at home. To those of us who live in the eastern half of the United States and to others who live in the Middle West, no doubt that would be a favor. It would not make an awful lot of difference as far as time in the House was concerned if, say, votes would start at 3 o'clock. I just wondered if that was a possibility.

Mr. WRIGHT. Well, if the gentleman would yield further, I think it unlikely that we could promise him that for next Monday. We have been attempting to hold down the number of suspensions scheduled for Mondays when we come into session at noon.

One of the reasons for coming into session at noon on Monday and for not asking for an earlier convening on that day is to try to accommodate the very necessity which the gentleman from Florida mentions; but the only way to assure that we would have late votes on those suspensions would be to load the calendar with a lot of suspensions, and thus promote lengthy debate on those suspensions. That, of course, would not serve the purposes we are attempting to serve, which is to complete these three major bills next week.

So, I think under the circumstances I should not encourage the gentleman from Florida to expect that we could do that on next Monday. But, we can certainly try to help if possible on subsequent Mondays.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman, and I withdraw my reservation of objection.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Texas, the majority leader, if he has any assurance that much of the legislation we have already passed will be acted upon by the other body. I say that because many of my colleagues on this side of the aisle and on his side of the aisle have expressed that belief, that much of this legislation will not be acted upon because of the business and filibusters and other delaying activities in that body. Could the gentleman give us any assurance on that?

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Michigan knows of course that the majority leader of the House cannot give absolute assurance as to anything the other body might do or fail to do. But I think the gentleman would be reassured to know that on Tuesday of last week the leadership of the House met with the Senate leadership and went over the entire list of legislation to which the distinguished minority leader earlier made reference. We talked about every bill. It was a 2-hour session. And we got the best advice and best judgment we could elicit from the majority leader and majority whip of the U.S. Senate.

So we think we have a pretty good feel for those matters that they expect to be able to address, and we have isolated some matters which we feel they cannot address by reason of the possibility of filibuster and difficulty of imposing cloture.

It will be the effort of the majority leader of the House to schedule primarily those bills on which we expect that the other body will be able to act. While we cannot forecast that with absolute certainty, we will do the best that we can. There may be exceptions. There may be votes on some bills that never will be acted upon in the other body, but to the best of our ability we will try to avoid wasting the time of the Members of the House on legislation which we have every reason to know will not be acted upon by the other body.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Further reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman knows that the Speaker has total control over what items are brought to this floor. Does the Speaker intend to follow that which the gentleman has said and not permit anything to be scheduled that he does not have some reasonable assurance will receive action in the other body?

Mr. WRIGHT. I cannot honestly say to the gentleman that no bill will be scheduled on which we have not received absolute assurance.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. That is not what I asked the gentleman.

Mr. WRIGHT. I would say to the gentleman that to the extent of our ability to do so we are going to try to work with the leadership in the other body and to devote the remaining time to those matters which at least have some reasonable opportunity to be considered. Both bodies have lists of bills which they consider musts. We are trying to accommodate the other body and they are making an earnest attempt to accommodate us.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. I thank the gentleman.

I will not belabor it more, Mr. Speaker, by further reserving the right to object, and I will not ask the gentleman to respond, but I think it might be well for the leadership to indicate to committee chairmen there is no reason to take up further legislation which it is not expected will not be acted upon by the other body, and we could dispose of the business of the House in a much more expeditious way.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I assure the gentleman that is exactly what we intend to do.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

Mr. BAUMAN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I just wanted to ask the majority leader, in view of the fact that he is asking permission to come in at 10 o'clock on Tuesday and 9 o'clock on Friday, can he give us a more definite commitment as to the time each night next week when we might expect to adjourn? I have not heard any reference made to that.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield, it would be our plan to adjourn by 7 o'clock on Monday, to adjourn by 7 o'clock on Tuesday, to go later Wednesday, to adjourn by 7 o'clock on Thursday, and not later that 3 o'clock on Friday. If we are able to come in at 9 o'clock and complete the business under consideration, we might be able to adjourn earlier than 3 o'clock on Friday.

Mr. BAUMAN. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman.

I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

REQUEST FOR PERMISSION TO FILE CONFERENCE REPORT ON H.R. 2777, NATIONAL CONSUMER COOPERATIVE BANK ACT

Mr. BRADEMAS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the managers may have until midnight tonight to file a report of the conference committee on the bill (H.R. 2777) to provide for consumers a further means of minimizing the impact of inflation and economic depression by narrowing the price spread between costs to the producer and the consumer of needed goods, services, facilities, and commodities through the development and funding of specialized credit sources for, and technical assistance to, self-help, not-for-profit cooperatives, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. BAUMAN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is heard.

PERMISSION FOR SUBCOMMITTEE ON OVERSIGHT AND INVESTIGATIONS OF THE COMMITTEE ON INTERSTATE AND FOREIGN COMMERCE TO SIT ON FRIDAY, JULY 28, 1978, DURING 5-MINUTE RULE

Mr. RAHALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Subcommittee on Oversight and Investigations of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce be permitted to sit on Friday, July 28, during the 5-minute rule.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from West Virginia?

There was no objection.

TURKISH ARMS EMBARGO

(Mr. BRADEMAS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. BRADEMAS. Mr. Speaker, I take this time to insert in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the first four of a series of letters that are being sent to Members of the House, setting forth the reasons that it would be most unwise and against the national interest of the United States for the House of Representatives to vote to repeal the Turkish arms embargo. These letters are signed by 21 Members of the House, from both sides of the aisle; namely, the gentleman from Florida (Mr. FASCELL); the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. DERWINSKI); the gentleman from New York (Mr. ROSENTHAL); the gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. ROSE); the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. MITCHELL); the gentleman from California (Mr. MINETA); the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. TSONGAS); the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. FRASER); the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. BLANCHARD); the gentlewoman from Maryland (Ms. MIKULSKI); the gentleman from New York (Mr. BIAGGI); the gentleman from Georgia (Mr. FOWLER); the gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. FLORIO); the gentleman from New Hampshire (Mr. D'AMOURS); the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. RUSSO); the gentleman from New York (Mr. RANGEL); the gentleman from New York (Mr. GILMAN); the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. O'BRIEN); the gentleman from California (Mr. JOHN L. BURTON); the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. EDGAR); and the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. BRADEMAS).

Mr. Speaker, I hope very much that Members of the House will read these letters with great care and that they will, when they cast their votes next week on this issue, agree with the position of the signatories of the letters to which I have referred.

The texts of the letters follow:

THE EMBARGO AND THE LAW

DEAR COLLEAGUE: You will soon have an opportunity to cast a vote in favor of a foreign policy based on principle and in accord with the rule of law.

The Carter Administration's proposal to remove the limited arms embargo now in effect against Turkey is, in our view, an ill-conceived move that violates fundamental legal, moral and security principles of U.S. foreign policy. We ask your help in defeating this effort, and we hope to set forth, in this and subsequent letters, the considerations which have led us to our position on this important matter.

The Turkish arms embargo is required as a matter of law.

It is important to remember that the arms embargo was voted by Congress only after Turkey, in clear violation of American laws and bilateral agreements already in effect, used American weapons for offensive purposes in its second—August, 1974—invasion and occupation of Cyprus.

Unlike Turkey's Cyprus action of the previous month, which was mounted in response to a coup instigated on the island by the Greek junta, this August invasion took place at a time when hostilities had ended, the junta had fallen, a ceasefire was in effect and the interested parties were engaged in peace talks at Geneva. It was at that moment that Turkey employed 40,000 troops, armed with American weapons, to occupy forty percent of Cyprus, and it was in response to this second, clearly offensive, operation, that Congress acted.

Provisions of both the Foreign Assistance Act and the Foreign Military Sales Act required that further military aid to Turkey be terminated. The embargo was voted, therefore, not to enact new law but rather to insure that existing laws were enforced.

Secretary of State Vance has conceded in his recent testimony before the House International Relations Committee that the Turkish occupation of Cyprus was carried out in violation of American laws and bilateral agreements. He has conceded, further, that the imposition of the embargo was the appropriate response to those violations.

Precisely the same considerations which justified imposition of the embargo now require its continued support.

Nearly four years after its invasion of Cyprus, Turkey still occupies forty percent of the island. Nearly 30,000 troops of that occupying army, still equipped with American weapons, remain there. And Turkey has taken no actions to improve the situation substantially.

The continued presence of these Turkish troops on Cyprus, therefore, constitutes nothing less than a continuing violation of American laws. So long as the violations continue, the embargo must remain in force.

It should be noted that the embargo provision itself permits President Carter to end the embargo in a moment, if he is willing to certify to Congress that Turkey is now in compliance with the Foreign Assistance Act, the Foreign Military Sales Act, and its bilateral agreements with the United States, and that substantial progress has been made toward an agreement regarding military forces on Cyprus. We would welcome actions by Turkey substantive enough to permit President Carter to make such certifications to Congress; clearly, however, Turkey has taken no such actions.

In his policy statements on this very issue during his campaign for the Presidency, Jimmy Carter declared that "The United States must pursue a foreign policy based in principle and in accord with the rule of law." We ask that you join us in supporting those sentiments by voting to maintain the arms embargo against Turkey.

Sincerely,

UNDERMINING THE EMBARGO

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D.C., July 1978.

DEAR COLLEAGUE: In imposing an embargo on American military aid to Turkey after Turkey's August, 1974, invasion and occupation of Cyprus, Congress had in mind two basic considerations:

The first was the need to enforce American law, which required that further military assistance to Turkey be terminated after American-supplied weapons were used by Turkey for offensive purposes on Cyprus.

The second consideration, and the focus of this letter, was the expectation that the Administration would use the embargo to convince Turkey of the need to take substantive actions to promote a just settlement on Cyprus.

Regrettably, the Administration has failed to do so.

Instead, this Administration, like the one which preceded it, has acted in a manner which has undermined the effectiveness of the embargo and has signaled Turkey that it need not take the embargo seriously.

The following brief summary of Carter Administration actions and statements concerning Cyprus—many of which have received little or no publicity in this country—makes this conclusion obvious. The summary also makes clear that the Administration's request that the embargo be lifted "because it hasn't worked" stands logic on its head: the embargo has not worked because the Administration has been unwilling or unable to make it work.

We think it essential, therefore, that the following facts be kept in mind in considering the Administration's justification for attempting to lift the embargo:

The Administration's first request for arms for Turkey, submitted by the State Department in March of 1977, sought a level of military assistance many times the level supplied by the previous Administration. This request, you may recall, engendered strong opposition and was ultimately substantially reduced. Turkey nonetheless received a forty percent increase in military sales (from $125 to $175 million) from 1977 to 1978 although it had taken no positive action whatsoever on Cyprus. The hope that this significant increase would induce such positive action on the part of Turkey proved empty.

The Department of Defense resorted to a little-known agency—the NATO Maintenance and Supply Agency (NAMSA)—located in Luxembourg, to supply Turkey with nearly $30 million of weapons beyond the restrictions in America law limiting the amount of military sales. Despite the vigorous protests of several Members, including the Chairman of the Subcommittee on Europe of the House International Relations Committee, who termed the action "a violation of the spirit, if not the letter, of the law", this circumvention of the military sales limitation continues.

The United States Mission to the United Nations, in an effort to avoid "offending" Turkey, voted with a very small minority last fall to weaken a General Assembly resolution which simply called for action toward a settlement on Cyprus.

The State Department submitted last February a report on human rights in Turkey and in Cyprus which was a deliberate whitewash of Turkish practices in both those countries. A State Department spokesman was quoted at the time as saying that the Department did not want to report anything which might make it more difficult to get Congress to approve lifting the embargo.

The United States Ambassador to Turkey declared in news interviews in Ankara, during the time when the Administration still claimed to support the embargo, that "the embargo doesn't serve any American interest," that "without changing the law which prohibits United States arms to aggressor countries) I would like to find some way around it," and that "my only hope is that . . . it (the embargo) will be removed." High-ranking U.S. military officers made similar statements in the past eighteen months and thereby encouraged Turkish intransigence with regard to a just settlement on Cyprus. Obviously, the arms limitation could not be effective when the Turkish government heard high American officials publicly contradict the Administration's own policy on this issue.

The Secretary of State assured Members of Congress several months ago that before the Administration made any decision on whether to reverse its field and ask for a lifting of the embargo, the Administration would carefully study the actions and proposals expected from Turkey to insure that they represented substantive progress toward a Cyprus settlement. But the Administration soon backed down and—before Turkey had taken any action, indeed, before the Turkish proposals had even been submitted, let alone examined—asked for the lifting of the embargo anyway.

Not surprisingly, with all incentive to take actions on a Cyprus settlement having been eliminated, Turkey took no actions at all. Moreover, its proposals were so poor as to be regarded throughout the diplomatic community as virtually meaningless.

This sorry record shows clearly why the embargo "hasn't worked": these—and other—actions of the Administration have undermined it. The Administration has failed abysmally to convince Turkey that greater flexibility on Cyprus is essential to the resumption of a full military relationship with the United States. As a remedy for its own failure, the Administration now asks Congress to abandon principle and to ignore the clear requirements of American law. This we must not do.

We ask you, therefore, to join us in demonstrating that Congress, a co-equal branch of our government, believes in enforcing our laws by supporting the effective use of the arms embargo against Turkey.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D.C., July 1978.

THE EMBARGO AND NATIONAL SECURITY

DEAR COLLEAGUE: In its attempt to lift the Turkish arms embargo, the Carter Administration has avoided discussing the requirements of American law and has focused instead on what it claims are overriding national security considerations.

The Administration's strategy is understandable. For to focus on the law, and on Turkey's continuing violation of the law through its continuing occupation of Cyprus, would make ending the embargo at this time unthinkable.

As a result, the Administration speaks of Turkey's importance to NATO and of the need to do whatever is necessary to preserve U.S. relations with Turkey.

We yield to no one in our support for NATO. Yet it is clear to us that, even on "national security" grounds, the Administration's current tilt toward Turkey is shortsighted and extremely dangerous to vital American security interests abroad.

We know that both Turkey and Greece are necessary for the security of NATO's southeastern flank; the Administration has conceded as much in its recent testimony before the House International Relations Committee. It is not, therefore, a question of choosing one country over the other—we must do all we can to insure that both participate fully in NATO.

As matters now stand, Turkey is a full member of NATO, while Greece has partially withdrawn from NATO as a result of U.S. mishandling of the Turkish invasions of Cyprus in 1974.

The Greek government has made it clear that it wishes to return to a full role in NATO, but that it cannot do so unless the embargo is maintained as a way to encourage a just settlement on Cyprus.

The Turkish government, meanwhile, has made it equally clear that it will remain in NATO regardless of the outcome of the embargo vote in Congress.

Therefore, a vote to continue the embargo is the only way to bring about the full participation of both Turkey and Greece in NATO. Statements made by the leaders of the two countries on their recent visits to Washington make this conclusion obvious.

Mr. Karamanlis told Members of Congress, that despite Administration claims to the contrary, a lifting of the embargo would be a major political issue in Greece, would further damage U.S.-Greek relations and would make the reintegration of Greece into NATO far more difficult. Mr. Karamanlis also revealed that a vote to lift the embargo—and the American abandonment of Greece such a vote would imply—could topple his pro-Western government, with untold consequences for American security interests in that vital region of the world.

Mr. Ecevit, for his part, set forth Turkey's position quite plainly:

"We do not intend to leave NATO in any case, because we believe that the front in which we have a stake is based on a rather delicate balance, and Turkey has a responsibility to maintain that balance." (The Today Show, Interview held May 30, 1978)

And again:

BARBARA WALTERS. "Mr. Prime Minister, suppose the arms embargo is not lifted. Would you pull Turkey out of NATO?"

Mr. ECEVIT. "No, I have always said explicitly that we would still want to remain in NATO." (ABC Evening News, Interview held June 1, 1978)

Mr. Ecevit's statements should not be surprising. Mr. Ecevit knows that continued participation in NATO is to Turkey's benefit. He knows, too, that the embargo has not been as harmful to Turkey as some have claimed—Turkey has received more than $600 million in American military equipment for NATO purposes since the embargo began. And he knows, finally, that Turkey has been permitted since 1975 to purchase additional American-made equipment in unlimited amounts through U.S. commercial channels.

Yet, despite this, Administration officials have suggested that voting an end to the embargo is the only way to keep Turkey in NATO. In light of Mr. Ecevit's statements on this issue, these Administration claims are difficult to accept. We have, in fact, only two choices:

We can assume that Mr. Ecevit is telling the truth when he says that Turkey remains committed to NATO—in which case the Administration's arguments are groundless and Congress need not fear voting to maintain the embargo.

Or we can assume that he is not telling the truth—in which case the credibility of any of his commitments respecting Turkish flexibility on Cyprus or Turkey's reliability as an ally are themselves open to serious question, and Congress has no reason to lift the embargo.

The Administration simply cannot have it both ways, disputing Mr. Ecevit on this major concern and yet vouching for his reliability in all other respects.

We believe the statements of both Mr. Ecevit and Mr. Karamanlis on this issue: Turkey will remain in NATO regardless of the embargo vote, while Greece will only be able to rejoin NATO if the embargo is maintained. The need to have both Turkey and Greece play full roles in NATO leads to only one conclusion: that the embargo must be maintained.

We ask you, therefore, in the name of America's security interests abroad to cast your vote in support of the Turkish arms embargo.

THE EMBARGO AND TURKISH INTRANSIGENCE

DEAR COLLEAGUE: We will soon be called upon to vote again on the Turkish arms embargo. Because this issue first came before Congress nearly four years ago, many important details tend to be forgotten. In addition, many Members have joined the House since this issue was first considered in the wake of Turkey's August, 1974 invasion and occupation of forty percent of Cyprus.

The Administration suggests, in its effort to lift the embargo, that the failure to achieve a Cyprus settlement is due, not to continued Turkish intransigence, but to Congressional inflexibility. If Congress would only ease the pressure on Turkey, we are told, Turkey would respond by taking the substantive actions necessary to promote a Cyprus settlement.

The Administration's argument ignores the clear historical record.

Congress has taken action after action in the past four years to "ease the pressure on Turkey" in response to similar Administration pleas. Yet Turkey has failed to make a single substantive response to these Congressional concessions. It seems, in fact, that Congressional flexibility on this issue has merely encouraged further Turkish resistance.

We ask you to consider the following facts:

Congressional action—September 1974: Congress delays embargo two months at Kissinger's request to use his influence on Turkey.

Turkish action: No response.

Congressional action—December 1974: Congress delays embargo two more months at Kissinger's request to use his influence on Turkey.

Turkish action: No response.

Congressional action—October 1975: Congress relaxes embargo to allow: (a) $185 million in arms ordered before embargo to be released to Turkey; (b) unlimited commercial arms sales to Turkey; (c) future FMS sales to Turkey.

Turkish action: No response.

Congressional action—1974–1976: Nine meetings with President Ford and/or Secretary Kissinger initiated by embargo supporters to show ways Congress would move immediately if Turkey indicated it wanted to solve Cyprus.

Turkish action: No response.

Congressional actions—April 1976: Congress authorizes $125 million in FMS to Turkey for FY 1976.

Turkish action: No response.

Congressional action—May 1976: Congress adds $125 million in FMS to Turkey for FY 1977.

Turkish action: No response.

Congressional action—April 1977: Congress increases FMS to Turkey for FY 1978 to $175 million, a forty percent boost.

Turkish action. No response.

When the Administration claims that Congress is responsible for preventing progress on Cyprus, remember the past record of substantive actions taken by Congress.

When will Turkey act?

PERSONAL EXPLANATION ON SUPPLEMENTAL VIEWS

(Mrs. FENWICK asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mrs. FENWICK. Mr. Speaker, due to a printing error, my "supplemental views" on the Financial Institutions Regulatory Act of 1978 appear as the last paragraph of Mr. McKINNEY's views (p. 237, H. Rept. 95–1383). In fact, I joined the minority views of Representatives STANTON, BROWN, WYLIE, ROUSSELOT, HANSEN, HYDE, GRASSLEY, LEACH, EVANS, and GREEN, but with the following reservation:

The only question that might be raised concerning the minority views involves variable rate mortgages. Although I favor the concept of reverse annuity mortgages, I have grave reservations about variable rate mortgages and cannot subscribe to the endorsement accorded them in the minority views.

GAO ON NUCLEAR FUEL REPROCESSING

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from California (Mr. GOLDWATER) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. Speaker, on July 20, 1978, the General Accounting Office (GAO) released a report entitled: "An Evaluation of Federal Support of the Barnwell Reprocessing Plant and The Department of Energy's Spent Fuel Storage Policy." This report makes it clear that the GAO supports continuation of ongoing research and development efforts at Barnwell.

The reason I bring this report to my colleagues' attention is that it adds one more authoritative voice to the growing concern over the administration's policy on nuclear fuel reprocessing. A large number of eminent scientists, international leaders, and Members of both Houses of this Congress, as well as I, have pointed out repeatedly that the U.S. policy deferring reprocessing and the breeder reactor is bankrupt—it will not accomplish the lofty international nonproliferation goals for which it was established, and it will seriously damage our own hopes for providing needed future energy supplies.

The GAO report ties this problem in with the continuing inability to obtain a climate amenable to completion of the U.S.'s sole commercial reprocessing plant, that at Barnwell, S.C. As most Members of Congress know, the owners of the Barnwell plant were strongly encouraged by the Federal Government to construct that facility. The GAO gives a good summary of this encouragement and notes the rapid turnabout in Federal policy that came with President Carter's April 7, 1977, policy statement which indefinitely deferred commercial reprocessing in the United States. The GAO makes the following statement on the policy of the Carter administration on reprocessing:

These policies reflect a major change in the Federal attitude toward Barnwell. While the Government did not provide any direct financial support to Allied-General, it created—through its policies and programs on nuclear power—an atmosphere favorable to reprocessing. The former Atomic Energy Commission, for example, offered verbal encouragement to Allied-General, provided it access to reprocessing technology, and sold it land on which to build the reprocessing complex. Likewise, NRC, while imposing strict requirements had not previously given Allied-General reasons to believe that reprocessing and recycling activities could not eventually meet safety and environmental licensing criteria.

Thus, the Carter policy left Barnwell in a very uncertain position. Congress responded by appropriating $13 million in fiscal year 1978 to orient Barnwell toward a research and development mode, until optional uses could be explored. Optional uses do exist and the GAO report contains an excellent discussion of what those uses are.

Much to my disappointment, the administration has again opposed doing research and development work at Barnwell. The GAO is critical of this opposition and states that it: "fails to recognize two important considerations. First, does the Federal Government have any responsibility to the developers of Barnwell, considering the encouragement given to start a commercial reprocessing industry? Second, will the other nuclear developing countries follow the U.S. lead on proliferation and stop or defer their reprocessing programs? Early indications are that—even with a total U.S. commitment—other countries view the development of breeder technologies and reprocessing as vital to their economic stability, and may not be willing or able to follow the U.S. lead. For instance, Japan, France, West Germany, the United Kingdom, and the Soviet Union all have ongoing breeder reactor development programs as well as planned or operating reprocessing facilities. They have not, as of yet, indicated a desire to discontinue these programs."

Mr. Speaker, I believe our choice is clear. The United States must maintain the option to reprocess spent nuclear fuel, and continued research and development at the Barnwell plant is a necessary step in keeping the option open. The GAO recognizes this, and has concluded that "the Congress should continue to fund short-term research studies at Barnwell until the completion of the international study on alternative fuel cycle technologies. This will keep the facilities and key people available in the event the United States decides, as a result of the study, that some method of reprocessing is consistent with its nonproliferation objectives.

GAO believes, however, that it is important that the Department not wait on congressional initiatives to plan work at Barnwell and make it compatible with existing programs.

I urge my colleagues to obtain a copy of this excellent report. I am happy to say that the GAO position conforms very closely with that which I believe is the overwhelming sentiment in the Congress. The GAO is to be complimented on a job well done.●

ALICE RIVLIN'S PROFESSIONAL OPINION ON THE LACK OF ACCURACY IN ECONOMIC MODEL FORECASTING OF THE EFFECTS OF TAX CUTS UNDERCUTS THE CONCLUSIONS OF GIAIMO BUDGET COMMITTEE REPORT ON THE KEMP-ROTH TAX RATE REDUCTON ACT

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from New York (Mr. KEMP) is recognized for 10 minute.

● Mr. KEMP. Mr. Speaker, Members of Congress were sent at the beginning of the week a report of the House Budget Committee purporting to show disastrous consequences to tax revenues, deficits, the Federal debt and the economy, if the Kemp-Roth Tax Rate Reduction Act became law. That report was released by the committee's chairman Mr. GIAIMO.

The Tax Rate Reduction Act is designed to restore incentive to working, saving, investing, and risk taking by restoring the reward for such economic activity by lowering the tax rates. Specifically, the measure would reduce individual income taxes by approximately 33-percent, across-the-board over the next three years; reduce the combined corporate normal and corporate surtax rates from 48 percent to 45 percent in that same time frame; and increase the corporate surtax exemption from $50,000 to $100,000, thereby aiding smaller businesses.

The Giaimo report rests on three analyses done of the Kemp-Roth bill by econometric models, all Keynesian models. The conclusions reached by the committee were based on these analyses. The accuracy of those models and their conclusions were offered as the last word on this subject.

There are so many things wrong, conceptually and technically, with that study and the conclusions drawn from it, that it will be the subject of separate remarks.

But there is one thing which stands in such contrast to that report that it has to be mentioned today.

Now, it would be one thing, if it were just a difference of opinion between my colleague, Mr. GIAIMO, and me, or a difference in other peoples' attitudes about the accuracy of forecasting with these models, but this is very different. It is that the Director of the Congressional Budget Office, Alice Rivlin, stated in a letter last month that the CBO is unable to provide estimates of the long-run impact of tax cuts, that given the present state of the art in economics, estimates of long-run impacts of tax cuts on variables such as savings, productivity, and work incentives cannot be made with any degree of confidence.

In a letter to the ranking minority member of the Committee on Ways and Means, Mr. CONABLE, dated June 2, and on CBO letterhead, Director Rivlin says, and I quote:

> We are also unable to provide estimates of the long-run impact to tax cuts. * * * Given the present state of the art in economics, estimates of long-run impacts of tax cuts on variables such as savings, productivity, and work incentives cannot be made with any degree of confidence.

Yet it is those variables of savings, productivity and work incentives which will govern the rate at which the tax base will expand and bring in the additional revenues to offset the static revenue loss projection and not create higher deficits, higher debt, or run the risk of inflation. This point is crucial to ascertaining what will really happen if Roth-Kemp is passed. But that seems to have escaped our colleague (Mr. GIAIMO) in relying on the three Keynesian models, DRI, Wharton and Chase, raising fundamental questions of whether the report was offered as an economic document or as a political tract.

Mrs. Rivlin's letter follows in its entirety:

CONGRESSIONAL BUDGET OFFICE,
Washington, D.C., June 2, 1978.

Hon. BARBER B. CONABLE, JR.,
Ranking Minority Member, Committee on Ways and Means, U.S. House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

DEAR BARBER: Thank you for your recent letter requesting that CBO compare the economic impact of the First Concurrent Resolution with the Roth-Kemp Tax Reduction Act (H.R. 8333). At this time, we are able to provide only a small portion of the estimates you have requested. We can make estimates of the short-run incremental economic impact of the personal tax reductions contained in the Roth-Kemp bill. Those estimates are shown in the table in this letter. We cannot, however, provide estimates of the impact of rate cuts in corporate income taxes because of the greater uncertainty about the economic effects of such cuts. As we explained in our recent report, The Economic Outlook (February 1978), it is very difficult to arrive at consensus estimates of the magnitude of real effects of business tax cuts and, in the case of prices, even of the direction of the effect (pp. 31–35 and Appendix A).

We are also unable to provide estimates of the long-run impact of tax cuts. As you realize, there are those who believe that the incentive effects of tax cuts will generate enough income to pay for themselves. It is CBO's view, however, that most tax cuts are not likely to pay for themselves in the first few years after implementation, and we have no basis for assuming that they pay for themselves in a longer period. Given the present state of the art in economics, estimates of long-run impacts of tax cuts on variables such as savings, productivity, and work incentives cannot be made with any degree of confidence.

Impact of Roth-Kemp proposal for a reduction in personal income taxes in 1979

[1] Costs are given on a National Income Accounting (NIA) basis.
[2] Direct cost less reflows due to effect of stimulus on nominal income.

CBO does expect to be able to provide an estimate of the incremental effect on economic activity of the increase in spending above current policy that is incorporated in the First Concurrent Resolution. A precise estimate of the incremental effects of the tax cuts in the First Concurrent Resolution (compared with current policy) is not possible, partly because the composition of these tax cuts is not yet known.

We are preparing a new economic forecast that takes into consideration recent economic developments as well as the effect of the First Concurrent Resolution. This forecast will be available in mid-July, prior to the markup of the Second Resolution. In preparing this forecast, CBO will consult with Congressional staff in order to make assumptions about the composition of the tax cut and will then estimate the overall effect of the First Concurrent Resolution. We will forward this material, including the effect of the expenditure increase, to you as soon as it is available. At that time, we will also reestimate the short-run effect of the Roth-Kemp bill, taking into consideration our latest view of the state of the economy.

CBO is currently planning to undertake an in-depth study of the issue of the incentive effects of large tax cuts and the impact of reductions in business taxes. This will enable us to address these issues in greater detail in the future.

If we can be of further assistance, please let us know.

Sincerely,

ALICE M. RIVLIN,
Director.

The debate, obviously, does not end here. If my colleagues want to see what is really wrong with the Giaimo report and the analyses on which it was based, I invite them to read "The Breakdown of the Keynesian Model," in the RECORD of July 26, at pages H7397–H7400. This precisely thought-through, carefully articulated article devastates the Giaimo report by showing that the conclusions were drawn from erroneous premises, that the economic rationale incorporated in the econometric models used by CBO in preparing its report are illogical, that neither people nor the economy behave or respond the way they infer, state, declare that they do. That article has profound implications, not just for the Kemp-Roth bill debate but also for policymaking in the Congress and the administration. We have, in short, been shown through that article why past economic policy has not worked the way it was predicted it would work, and we have been given a way out of the problem.●

DEPARTMENT OF EDUCATION

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. FORD) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. FORD of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I am today introducing legislation to create a Department of Education. Proposals to create a Department of Education have received strong and broad support from leaders in education and in the Congress as well as from President Carter.

Two primary reasons have been advanced for the creation of a Department of Education. First, education issues are submerged in the huge Department of Health, Education, and Welfare. Despite the rapid growth in the Federal commitment to education, the Education Division accounts for only 6.3 percent of HEW's budget. In light of the importance of education in our national life and the priority the President places on it, education should have it own seat in the Cabinet. This would be an important step in gaining for education the visibility, stature, and budgetary commitment that it merits.

Second, education programs are currently scattered across the Federal landscape. A recent survey identified more than 400 separate education programs lodged in 35 Federal agencies besides the U.S. Office of Education. There is an obvious need to coordinate and consolidate this maze of education programs. Decreasing this fragmentation would improve the efficiency and effectiveness of the Federal Government and markedly reduce the burden of redtape and regulations. Particularly from the point of view of the individual student, the parent, the local educational agency and the institution of higher education, a Department of Education would make more comprehensible and manageable the array of Federal education programs.

Both of these objectives for a Department of Education point to the same basic organizing principle that ought to guide the formulation of such a department. It is clear to me that in order to achieve a high priority for education and in order to effectively reduced the fragmentation of Federal education efforts, a new Department of Education must be comprehensive.

On June 29, 1978, Chairman BROOKS of the Government Operations Committee introduced H.R. 13343, the Department of Education Organization Act, and hearings before Chairman BROOKS' subcommittee have begun. H.R. 13343 is an admirable start toward a comprehensive Department of Education. It would include the following in the new Department:

The current Education Division of the Department of Health, Education and Welfare;

The functions of the Office for Civil Rights relating to education;

The child nutrition programs from the Agriculture Department,

The Indian education programs from the Interior Department;

Schools for overseas dependents from the Defense Department;

Science education programs from the National Science Foundation;

The student loan and grant programs for law enforcement personnel from the Justice Department; and

The college housing program from the Department of Housing and Urban Development.

In formulating the bill, which I am today introducing, I took H.R. 13343 as a starting point and made a number of modifications in it. Assuming that those who are interested in this issue are familiar with H.R. 13343, let me spend the balance of my statement explaining how my bill differs from H.R. 13343.

VETERANS EDUCATION PROGRAMS

The bill transfers to the new Department the veterans' education programs authorized by chapters 32, 34, 35, and 36 of title 38 of the United States Code and administered by the Veterans' Administration. In fiscal year 1978, these programs provided slightly more than $3 billion in educational benefits to 1.6 million veterans, military personnel, and dependents, widow and orphans of military personnel. These benefits are used primarily at institutions of postsecondary education. Clearly an education program of this magnitude ought to be included in any Department of Education worthy of the name. My conversations with student-veterans and educators and the oversight hearings on the veterans education programs held by the Subcommittee on Postsecondary Education last year have all convinced me that implementation of education programs by the Veterans' Administration can at best be characterized as insensitive. Veterans' Administration regulations concerning contact hours, attendance, standards of progress and eligibility of schools and programs have demonstrated a gross lack of understanding of the needs of the student-veteran and of the nature of postsecondary education and institutions. I believe that the student-veteran and the others eligible for assistance under these programs would be better served by the programs if they were in a Department of Education, and I believe that student-veterans in particular would applaud such a transfer.

REHABILITATION AND EDUCATION OF THE HANDICAPPED

The bill transfers to the Department the programs authorized by the Rehabilitation Act of 1973 and creates an office to administer functions relating to rehabilitation and education of the handicapped. An additional principal officer at level V of the executive schedule is authorized. These changes are justified because of the special needs the handicapped and the high Federal priority for assuring equal educational opportunity to the handicapped. The Senate Committee on Government Affairs has already made comparable changes in its Department of Education bill, S. 991.

MIGRANT EDUCATION

The bill transfers two programs for the improvement of education and training opportunities for migrant youth from the Department of Labor, the high school equivalency program (HEP) and the college assistance migrant program (CAMP). The office for functions relating to education of Indians, Alaskan Natives and Aleuts and the comprehensive plan for the education of Indians, Alaskan Natives and Aleuts (section 303(c)) are broadened to include migrants. I would envision that the office to administer functions relating to the education of Indians, Alaskan Natives, Aleuts and migrants would be organized in two divisions or bureaus since the special educational needs of migrants are distinct from those of Indians, Alaskan Natives, and Aleuts. The transfer of HEP and CAMP from the Department of Labor and the recognition of migrant education in a principal office of the new Department should provide the basis for a comprehensive Federal assistance program for migrant education.

NATIONAL COUNCIL ON EDUCATION RESEARCH, DEVELOPMENT AND DISSEMINATION

The bill establishes within the principal office for research and improvement functions a National Council on Education Research, Development and Dissemination. This Council is patterned after the current National Council on Educational Research in the National Institute of Education. The NIE Council has played a salutory role in providing the Director of NIE with policy guidance based on the broad and detached perspective of scholars and practitioners in the field. An autonomous board also serves as a buffer against political constraints being applied in the setting of research and evaluation priorities. I anticipate that the new 15-member Presidentially appointed Council would play the same role for the entire office administering functions relating to research, development and dissemination in the Department of Education.

NONPUBLIC EDUCATION

The bill broadens the functions of the principal operating officers of the Department to include a special responsibility for involving the nonpublic educational sector in the formulation and implementation of departmental policy. The Office of Education is currently acting more aggressively to insure that nonpublic elementary and secondary schools are receiving the full benefits of Federal programs to which they are entitled. This is a very significant priority which I believe it is important to sustain and emphasize in a new Department of Education.

The bill does not include section 102 (9) of the statement of purpose of H.R. 13343. This part of the statement of purpose in H.R. 13343 asserts that the Department will be responsible for "assessing the potential contribution of institutions of higher education to the attainment of national goals, bringing the problems of such institutions to the attention of appropriate departments and agencies, and recommending measures that foster the continuing vitality of such institutions." This part of the statement of purpose goes too far, I believe, in asserting a special Federal responsibility for institutions of higher education. Such a special Federal responsibility for these institutions contradicts longstanding Federal policy that the primary responsibility for the health of higher education institutions rests with State and local governments or the private sector, as noted in the findings (section 101(3)). To establish a special Federal responsibility for institutions of higher education runs contrary to the high priority that Federal policy has placed on student aid rather than institutional aid in postsecondary education. There is also no self-evident reasons to assert a special Federal responsibility for institutions of higher education as compared to all other educational institutions. Finally, the term "higher education" generally refers to traditional nonprofit colleges and universities, and establishing a special responsibility for these institutions would imply less Federal concern for other institutions encompassed in the term "postsecondary education."

The bill does not include the Intergovernmental Advisory Council on Education—section 212 of H.R. 13343. This council is loaded with so many responsibilities and so many categories of members that its real function as pure window dressing is apparent. It appears to be a security blanket for anyone who is uneasy about the representation of their particular interest in the new department. If the Secretary of the new Department is not sensitive to the substantive issues and political forces in education, an advisory council will not remedy such a basic lack of intelligent leadership.

Mr. Speaker, I hope that in its future hearings and deliberations that the Committee on Government Operations will give serious consideration to the ideas contained in the Department of Education bill which I am introducing.●

PANAMA CANAL: JOHN F. STEVENS, SUPREME CIVIL ENGINEER

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. FLOOD) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, as stated by me in various addresses in and out of the Congress, the Panama Canal has been one of my life-long and greatest interests. It originated in early youth when that great American leader, former President Theodore Roosevelt, used to visit my grandfather's home in Hazleton, Pa., often described some of his problems in launching the great project, and became my youthful ideal.

During the last 2 years, there has been much publicity concerning the interoceanic canal problem but very little concerning the fundamentals of Panama Canal history and the leaders responsible for that great achievement.

In an engineering sense there were three great leaders:

Adolphe Godin de Lepinay, the forgotten precursor of the Canal;

John F. Stevens, its basic architect, who organized the forces for construction and brought the project to the point where success was assured; and

George W. Goethals, under whose direction the canal was opened to traffic. Above all the leaders during its construction by the United States, was President Roosevelt, without whose courageous decisions the opening of the canal would have been delayed many years.

It was, therefore, with the greatest interest that I read a most illuminating article by Adolph J. Ackerman on "John F. Stevens—Supreme Civil Engineer" in which the parts played by the leaders were brought into perspective.

For those seeking more complete information on the acquisition by the United States of the Canal Zone and the construction of the Panama Canal, I would recommend the following by Capt. Miles P. DuVal, Jr., U.S. Navy, retired: "Cadiz to Cathay: The Story of the Long Diplomatic Struggle for the Panama Canal." Stanford University Press, 1947; and "And The Mountains Will Move: The Story of the Building of the Panama Canal." Stanford University Press, 1947.

More recent editions of these books have been published by the Greenwood Press of Westport, Conn. Cadiz to Cathay was published in a Spanish edition in 1973 by the University of Panama Press.

To make author Ackerman's excellent article on John F. Stevens available to all Members of the Congress and the Nation at large, I quote it as part of my remarks:

[From the Wisconsin Engineer, March 1977]

JOHN F. STEVENS—SUPREME CIVIL ENGINEER

(By Adolph J. Ackerman)

The name John F. Stevens stands permanently enshrined in American history, first as the chief engineer and, finally, as Chairman and Chief Engineer of the Isthmaian Canal Commission during the critical planning and design stage of the Panama Canal from 1905 to 1907. His achievement can be appreciated more fully after recalling the tragic failure in the 1880's when the eminent French pioneer, Ferdinand de Lesseps, fresh from his triumph in building the Suez Canal, undertook to build a similar sea-level canal across the Isthmus of Panama—but this was an entirely different problem.[1]

In 1930–32, while living in the Panama Canal Zone, I had an opportunity to study the history of the engineering planning of this greatest of civil engineering ventures of its day. It was an impressive experience to find that there were three fundamental factors in this vast project which served as the foundation for its successful execution:

1. The brilliant engineering evaluation of the topography, geology, and hydrology developed in 1859 by the French engineer, Adolphe Godin de Lépinay; [2] this led to his conception of two manmade lakes by damming the Chagres and Rio Grande Rivers to form the Gatun and Miraflores lakes, joining these lakes with the Culebra cut across the continental divide and thus creating a long stretch of navigable water across the isthmus, and with locks at each end (in three steps) connecting this long stretch to the Atlantic and Pacific oceans.

2. A great President of the United States, Theodore Roosevelt, under whose leadership and determination the financial resources of the United States were directed towards bringing the U.S. ports on the east and west coasts closer together.

3. John F. Stevens, America's greatest civil engineer who was placed in charge of the Panama Canal project by President Roosevelt at a very critical time. Stevens' principal achievements which assured the ultimate success of the Panama Canal project consisted of (a) his recognition of the great merits in the Lépinay plan; (b) winning the approval of the President and of the U.S. Congress for building the lock-type canal; (c) his strong support of Dr. William C. Gorgas to combat the devastating peril of Yellow Fever; and (d) acquiring the machinery and organizing the personnel for the unprecedented task of excavating the huge Culebra Cut.

Winning the approval of the President and the Congress was a remarkable achievement, especially when we consider the obstacles he had to overcome: a 13-member Board of Consulting Engineers on the Panama Canal, appointed by President Roosevelt in June 1905, had presented its report in January 1906; [3] a majority of 8 had recomemnded a sea-level canal, and the minority recommended a lock-type canal. John F. Stevens, then Chief Engineer of the Isthmian Canal Commission, wrote an analysis and recommendation for adopting the Minority Report and this was approved by the Commission. It was also supported by the Secretary of War, William Howard Taft, and the President recommended the lock-type canal to Congress. It was at this crucial moment in the history of the Panama Canal that John F. Stevens applied his resources of exceptional engineering judgment, experience, integrity, initiative and perseverance to win adoption of the right plan at the right time In this unique moment in engineering history Stevens proved that where there is respect for responsible dissent "one man with the TRUTH is a majority."

STEVENS' CONCEPT OF "RESPONSIBILITY"

An earlier story [4] has identified the personalized performance and responsibilities of John F. Stevens as the Chief Engineer for the Panama Canal, along with the personal characteristics and qualifications that make a great engineer. This is further brought out in the circumstances under which Stevens was called upon to take over the work from his predecessor, John F. Wallace. Years later, in his notable address as President of the American Society of Civil Engineers in 1927, Stevens referred to Wallace in generous terms: [5]

"Mr. Wallace was a man whom I had known for years, and esteemed, not only as a warm personal friend, but also for his great ability as an engineer . . . His action in resigning, under the conditions and the handicaps of the old Commission, was perfectly justifiable . . . Mr. Wallace was not an aggressive man, and there are times and conditions when fighting becomes a righteous duty. The situation which had developed at the date of his resignation was such as demanded a one-man control, control by a man who was heedless of his technical reputation; and one only bent upon smashing away through all obstacles, a kind of political 'roughneck,' who did not possess too deep a veneration for the vagaries of constituted authority."

In this notable statement Stevens has clearly identified his concept of "responsibility" of a Chief Engineer as a unique characteristic: it can only reside and inhere in a single individual. To this Admiral H. G. Rickover, U.S.N., has added:

"If responsibility is rightfully yours, no evasion, or ignorance or passing the blame can shift the burden to someone else . . . Service ceases to be professional if it has in any way been dictated by the client or employer. The role of the professional man in society is to lend his special knowledge, his well-trained intellect, and his dispassionate habit of visualizing problems in terms of fundamental principles to whatever specific task is entrusted to him. Professional independence is not a special privilege but rather an inner necessity for the true professional man, and a safeguard for his employers and the general public. Without it he negates everything that makes him a professional person and he becomes at best a routine technician or hired hand, at worst, a hack." [6]

This is the most important message for the engineering profession, and John F. Stevens stands as one of the greatest symbols of "the responsible engineer" and merits his great place in Isthmian history as the basic planner of the Panama Canal.

RESPONSIBILITY FOR CONSTRUCTION

After Stevens had completed the fundamental plan and design for the canal project he turned to the huge task of planning the construction operations. This called for examining the capabilities of prospective contractors, mobilizing the requisite manpower, purchasing the machinery and materials, and embarking on the expenditures of huge sums of government money. As Stevens later noted: "To create an organization fitted to undertake the tremendous work, and to fill its ranks with the proper material, was a task of heroic proportions." [7]

However, in his capacity as a civilian engineer, Stevens encountered serious obstacles, increasing political interferences and "red tape" restrictions. It soon became apparent that on this Canal project it was physically not feasible to carry out the continuity of functions normally associated with the Chief Engineer, and Stevens chose to resign in 1907 after a tenure of 18 months and after he had made all the great decisions and brought the project to the stage where its successful execution was assured.

The complexity of the logistics and the remote tropical location made this huge construction venture a task for military engineers. President Roosevelt immediately turned to the Chief of Engineers of the U.S. Army who recommended Colonel George Washington Goethals as the "fittest man" from the Corps of Engineers for appointment as Chairman and Chief Engineer of the Isthmian Canal Commission.

It should be noted here that the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers comprises a unique and vital resource of engineering leadership and manpower to protect and defend our national security both in peacetime and in modern warfare. This Corps traditionally is maintained in active status on the building of dams and navigation locks on America's rivers, and it was on this work that Colonel Goethals' capabilities had been amply demonstrated. Goethals fully understood governmental routines and he could promptly mobilize a staff of highly competent Army Engineers and demand from them organizational unity and loyal obedience to his orders. Furthermore, the Corps of Engineers, as represented by Colonel Goethals, was assured of the confidence and support of the President, the Congress and of the American people.

During the succeeding 7 years, from 1907 to 1914, under the tropical sun and in the mud of the rainy seasons, Colonel Goethals maintained a persistent struggle and directed some 30,000 workers to bring the construction of the Panama Canal to a successful conclusion.[8] John F. Stevens summarized this achievement in these words:

"The work of Maj.-Gen. George W. Goethals, U.S.A. (Retired), M. Am. Soc. C.E., former Chief Engineer, and of his associates on the Zone, cannot be given too high credit. The details of the canal and of its accessories have been wrought out and completed marvelously well. . . . The character of the work, as regards materials and execution, is superb. No mistake was made in entrusting the work to their hands . . . and I take this occasion to pay a high and well deserved compliment to Gen. Goethals and his associates."[9]

The Panama Canal was created by two great Chief Engineers: John F. Stevens as Chief Engineer of Design and George W. Goethals as Chief Engineer of Construction.

TODAY'S CHALLENGE TO ALL ENGINEERS

In these days of worldwide turmoil and chaos, John F. Stevens and Gen. George W. Goethals stand forth as ideals and as inspirations for all engineers. In these terms they will continue to render their greatest service to our nation and to our profession for all future time. Today's challenge confronting all engineers has been identified by another great engineer, Herbert Hoover:

"Our greatest danger is not from invasion by foreign armies. Our dangers are that we may commit suicide from within by complaisance with evil. Or by public tolerance of scandalous behavior. Or by cynical acceptance of dishonor. These evils have defeated nations many times in human history. The redemption of mankind by America will depend upon our ability to cope with these evils here at home."[10]

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from New York (Mr. OTTINGER) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. OTTINGER. Mr. Speaker, on Rollcall No. 606 this morning, on a procedural motion to waive the adjournment date, I was unavoidably detained at a meeting with the President at the White House. Had I been present, I would have voted "aye." ●

THE NATIONAL WILDLIFE REFUGE SYSTEM ENTERS ITS 75th AND MOST IMPORTANT YEAR

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from California (Mr. LEGGETT) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. LEGGETT. Mr. Speaker, on March 14, 1903, Pelican Island, a 3-acre island off the east coast of Florida whose population of brown pelicans was drastically declining as a result of human actions, became the first wildlife refuge when President Theodore Roosevelt signed an Executive order establishing it as a bird sanctuary. Out of this first bold attempt to conserve wildlife was born our National Wildlife Refuge System. Today, 75 years later, the National Wildlife Refuge System contains 386 separate units and 32.5 million acres of land. These units, present in almost every State, represent nearly every ecosystem found in the United States. It is, without question, the greatest network of lands managed for the benefit of wildlife in the world.

Refuge units are found in the prairie pothole region of the north-central States which is an impressively productive waterfowl breeding area, the marshes and swamps of the South which are the wintering grounds for wood ducks and contain perhaps the largest mallard duck populations in the Western Hemisphere, the coastal and estuarine fish and salt water coastal marshes, the desert lands and mountain ranges of the western game regions as well as the rocky coastline of the Northeastern States.

Theodore Roosevelt's action conserving Pelican Island was soon complemented as other lands were set aside in an attempt to save our natural resources. In 1918 the Migratory Bird Treaty Act came into being thus protecting birds migrating between Canada and the United States. This act made no provisions for specific refuges; however, it aided in the protection of birds during their nesting and wintering periods. Although the depression and the dustbowl greatly reduced funds available for the conservation of wildlife, the Migratory Bird Conservation Act of 1929 instituted authority for the appropriation of land to be used as refuges for migrating birds. This act was strengthened when in 1934 the Migratory Bird Hunting Stamp Act provided funds for the acquisition of refuges. In 1956 the concept of providing refuges was broadened not only for migratory birds but also for the protection of all wildlife when the Fish and Wildlife Act of 1956 was passed. Finally, in 1966 the vast number of refuges set up under these various acts, as well as the refuges acquired under the Endangered Species Conservation Act of 1966, officially became the National Wildlife Refuge System. Despite this impressive record dating back to 1903, 1978 may very well turn out to be the most important year in the 75-year history of the system. This year we have an unparalleled opportunity to increase the size of the refuge system by a factor of three in one piece of legislation. I am of course referring to H.R. 39, the Alaska National Interest Lands Conservation Act. To fully understand the relationship of H.R. 39 to the refuge system it is necessary to understand the operation of the refuge system itself.

Although the main objective of the National Wildlife Refuge System is to conserve so as to insure the "health, preservation and enhancement of fish and wildlife and their habitats as well as the ecological system of which they form a constituent element" of human activity in these areas is not discouraged. Many forms of human activity are permitted within refuges when they can be carried out in a manner compatible with the purposes of the refuge.

There is no question that the ecosystems which this program encompasses warrants a diverse management program. In other words, all human activities do not halt in these areas. In fact, when these activities are not inconsistent with the goals of a specific program they are encouraged. The lands set aside as wildlife refuges are not declared off limits to the public; rather they are available for public enjoyment—as they should be. Last year, Americans made 30 million visits to our national wildlife refuges.

Although the public activities are understandably curtailed in refuges inhabited by endangered or threatened species, such as the Aransas refuge in Texas which supports the whooping crane, in most refuges a variety of visitor-oriented activities occur. These activities include hunting, fishing, photography, observation, and trapping. In many refuges such nonwildlife related public activities as picnicking, camping, boating, and swimming are permitted. Hunting is permitted on at least 184 refuges located in 44 States while fishing is permitted on 171 national wildlife refuges. Fur trapping is allowed in refuges in 22 States. These activities are structured and supervised to aid in the enhancement of each refuge. They have helped to maintain a healthy abundance of both game and nongame species on wildlife refuges.

The term wildlife refuge does not mean "do not enter." Rather refuges are and should be enjoyed by the public. Wildlife refuge system lands are not only enjoyed by individual recreationists, but are utilized by private industry as well. Farming, grazing, and timber activities occur on many refuges where a determination is made that these activities can be carried out in a manner compatible with the purpose of the refuge. Although the land is not sold, leased, or rented to private industry for these purposes, companies may utilize the land on a "permittee" arrangement. In 1974 over 160,000 acres were cultivated and 656,000 acres were subject to forest management program. Another 1,267,883 acres were subject to grazing in 1974. In some instances, wildlife refuges even support oil and gas development. Oil and gas resources are extracted from 16 separate refuges. The Delta Refuge in Louisiana produced over 1,700,000 barrels of oil and 19 billion cubic feet of gas in 1974. The Kenai National Moose Range in Alaska produced 6.2 million barrels of oil and 270 billion cubic feet of gas last year. However, the expansion of these business opportunities will occur only if they do not inflict any damage on the wildlife of these refuges.

The Alaska National Interest Lands Conservation Act of 1978 represents the most important addition to the National Wildlife Refuge System in its 75-year history. The Alaska Lands Act, as passed by the House, would more than triple the size of the refuge system. The House bill would add 77 million acres to the existing refuge system. Under H.R. 39, for the first time the United States Fish and Wildlife Service will be managing multimillion acre refuges encompassing entire watersheds and ecosystems. Many refuges will also contain numerous Native villages as well as lands belonging to village and regional corporations.

The Alaska Lands Act represents the last stage of a 20-year effort to conserve Alaskan wildlife. This effort began with the passage of the Alaska Statehood Act and the Alaska Native Claims Settlement Act which set aside 105 million acres of land for the State and 44 million acres for the Natives of Alaska.

The vast acreage set aside under the Alaska National Interest Lands Act is obviously important because of the number of acres involved, but it is important for other reasons as well. The wilderness and the wildlife which Alaska sustains of the last ramnant of the once vast American frontier—a frontier which less than 200 years ago was the United States itself.

The wildlife which the various refuges sustain is as diverse as the refuges themselves. Endangered species such as bald eagles, and peregrine falcons can be found on several of the proposed refuges while populations of sea lions, harbor and hair seals, walruses, sea otters, and polar bears are found on others. The proposed Alaska Peninsula National Wildlife Refuge supports such varied wildlife as brown bears, caribou, moose, salmon, grayling trout, and walrus. During certain times of the year this refuge contains the entire world population of the black brant and emperor geese. The proposed Copper River National Wildlife Refuge in another part of the State supports the world's entire population of dusky Canadian geese while the river and its tributaries account for almost 90 percent of the Prince William Sound harvest of king salmon. Perhaps the most impressive of the Alaskan refuges is the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge. This refuge contains three diverse ecosystems: tundra, mountains, and tiaga forest. These ecosystems support over 140 species of birds, 44 species of mammals including polar bears, musk-oxen, Dall sheep, moose, grizzly bear, wolf, and 11 species of fish.

The outstanding feature of this refuge however, is the annual migration of the world's last great barren-ground caribou herd. The porcupine caribou herd, which is reminiscent of the great herd, of American bison, includes over 120,000 animals. It ranges over a 10,000 square mile area—migrating through the Brooks Range, wintering in Canada, and calving on the Arctic coastal plain east of Prudhoe Bay. H.R. 39 proposes to designate wilderness in much of the range of the porcupine herd. This designation will insure that at least one portion of the American Arctic will remain in a pristine condition for future Americans to use and enjoy.

The National Wildlife Refuge System plays an essential role in the preservation of our wildlife. This program represents conscious effort of the American people to insure the continuation of our irreplaceable wildlife resource. While the objective of the national parks system is to provide natural environment for the enjoyment and education of the public, the National Wildlife System is primarily concerned with the conservation of wildlife. The continued support of and interest in our national wildlife refuge program should insure the perpetuation of our wildlife resources for the enjoyment of future generations of the Americans in years to come.●

SOME THOUGHTS ON SALT II

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from California (Mr. CHARLES H. WILSON) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. CHARLES H. WILSON of California. Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday, July 25, this Nation's highest ranking military official, Air Force Gen. David C. Jones, new chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, expressed his reservations about any agreement with the Soviet Union that did not allow the United States to make its land missiles less vulnerable.

I share the General's reservations and have been publicly speaking out against a document which, in my opinion, would only increase the vulnerability of our ICBM force not enhance its survivability. I am speaking specifically about the proposed SALT II agreement with the Soviet Union.

At his first formal press conference, General Jones said the United States must make its land-based missiles mobile to keep them from being destroyed by the thousands of Soviet nuclear weapons aimed at them. He and many others in the defense community are alarmed at the large number of Soviet reentry vehicles that possess increased accuracy.

SALT II will not, unfortunately, give us the mobile option for several years. According to the proposed protocol, the more survivable MX mobile system will be stalled by the agreement in research and development for at least 3 years, and that could even be longer, if at all, given the current mindset of our arms control negotiators, most specifically Mr. Paul Warnke and his friends in the arms control lobby. The lack of Presidential commitment for the MX—and other systems—make its future doubtful if nonexistent.

Ironically, provisions which our own negotiators insisted on being incorporated in SALT II now are preventing the deployment of the MX missile in the multiple aim point or MAP mode. Even after Secretary Vance and Mr. Warnke went to Geneva with their hats in hand, the Russians refused to make an exception for the "shell game" deployment of the MX. This incredible development, which permits the Russians to control U.S. national security decisions is only one example of the adverse effects of SALT. A New York Times article of July 24, 1978, reports this very disturbing development.

The Soviets, on the other hand, are not only developing more accurate missiles with very high throw weights, they have now tested both the SS–16 and the SS–20 in the mobile mode. While the mobile SS–20, as far as we know, is not now deployed, it is believed that it can with a single warhead reach the United States.

These facts and my own observations from the two negotiating sessions I attend in Geneva, leave me extremely concerned over the future of this country's strategic and nuclear forces. If SALT II were signed and ratified by the U.S. Senate, it is my firm opinion that we would be placed in a position of inferiority to the Soviets.

For the review of my colleagues in the Congress I am placing in the RECORD the statement I made upon my return from the negotiating sessions held in Geneva last December and a speech I delivered to the American Security Council along with the Times article.

While expressing my own views, they also state some highly disturbing facts that should be openly debated.

SALT II: THE HIGH STAKES GAME WE ARE LOSING

(By Representative CHARLES H. WILSON of California)

The Strategic Arms Limitation Talks (SALT II) which are taking place in Geneva, Switzerland between the United States and the Soviet Union are of vital importance to the American people. Having recently attended the SALT II proceedings as a Congressional delegate, I want to take this opportunity to share my observations and concerns about the possible results of a SALT II agreement as it is now structured.

As a member of the House Armed Services Committee for the last 15 years, no one is more aware of the need to control strategic nuclear armaments. As an observer of a great deal of the world's history over several decades, I am also aware of the dangers inherent in unilateral disarmament. Unilateral disarmament and military weakness led directly to World War II and to the war in Korea in spite of the peaceful assurances and treaties involved.

In our desire to control strategic weapons, we should always be aware that our own weakness is a source of strength for a potential enemy. We must take every precaution to assure that our strategic forces will be sufficient to meet our possible future needs. SALT II gives me no such assurance.

During the past 30 years, the national security of the United States and the security of our allies have rested upon the power of our strategic nuclear weapons to deter potential aggressors. While treaties with our NATO allies and Japan have served as excellent statements of principles and helped to facilitate diplomatic matters, the real basis of peace in these areas has not been the treaties but the existence of U.S. deterrent power and the perception of potential aggressors that this power would be used if necessary.

There have been several changes in the United States strategy of deterrence over the years. During the 1950's when nuclear weapons and their delivery systems were relatively unsophisticated, we followed a policy of "massive retaliation" against any potential nuclear aggressor. During that time we enjoyed an unchallenged superiority in strategic nuclear weapons. As the Soviets increased the number of weapons and delivery systems in their arsenal, we responded with a policy of "mutual assured destruction." This policy recognized a Soviet ability to strike first, but gave notice that the United States would maintain the power to destroy any aggressor country even after absorbing a first strike. For this purpose the nuclear deterrent "triad" of manned bombers, intercontinental ballastic missiles (ICBMs) and submarine based sea-launched ballistic missiles (SLBMs) was developed. The triad, based upon the idea that any single leg can inflict unacceptable destruction on an attacker after the absorption of a first strike, has served us well for more than twenty years.

There have been other more recent innovations in United States strategic planning, notably the so-called "counterforce" doctrine which holds that the President should have the flexibility to make limited strikes at Soviet military and industrial targets, short of a full nuclear exchange. Most recently we have heard terms such as "minimum deterrent" and "rough equivalence" used to describe our strategic requirements. These latter terms, like the "counterforce" idea, were apparently adopted in order to rationalize the fact that the Soviets have pulled even and are pulling ahead of the United States in nuclear strategic forces. Unfortunately, these terms are used to furnish a measure of false reassurance to the American people and as a basis to defer or terminate sorely needed defense programs.

Whether the Soviets were able to pull even and move ahead in strategic power because of the very liberal (to them) terms of the 1972 SALT I agreement, or through a combination of those liberal terms and Soviet cheating as alleged by former Secretary of Defense Melvin R. Laird, is not the most important question to be debated today. The fact is that SALT I did not constrain any Soviet strategic weapon program and that the Soviets used SALT I to catch up and pull ahead. The question is, will SALT II legalize and perpetuate an imbalance of strategic nuclear power in the favor of the Soviet Union? Everything I have learned about SALT II indicates that the answer to that question is yes.

SALT II negotiations with the Soviets are taking place in somewhat of a vacuum. Most members of the U.S. delegation in Geneva do not tend to consider the implications of SALT II in terms of deterrence or in connection with recent changes in our national security policy. Neither do they appear to consider SALT II in connection with national security decisions which have not yet been made and which the civilian side of our defense establishment tends to push further into the future. If the objective of SALT II is to maintain a balance in strategic forces and a credible future U.S. nuclear deterrent, then that objective has already been bargained away. This has occurred simply because we have failed to negotiate on the basis of total strategic power in terms of throw weight, numbers of warheads, explosive power (yield) and weapon accuracy, and because the Soviet Backfire bomber is not even under discussion. For these reasons, and contrary to the orchestrated publicity of the Carter Administration, SALT II constrains the United States very much and the Soviet Union very little.

I am distressed by the fact that the concessions on behalf of the United States in the SALT II discussions have been predicated on our future possession of deterrent weapon systems about which the Administration and some segments of the Congress have no firm direction. Ironically, we are told that these weapons will constitute our nuclear deterrent after 1985. For example, the Administration has presented no firm plans to proceed with production or deployment of the MX or the cruise missile. We have no plans for a follow-on bomber. Cruise missile carriers, which are of doubtful value, are only in a preliminary study stage. According to recent press accounts, which could only have originated in the Office of the Secretary of Defense or OMB, the Trident submarine and missile program is in doubt. In view of the Carter Administration's zeal toward the goal of a comprehensive test ban, the future of our strategic nuclear weapons stockpile is also in doubt. The combined effect of SALT II and a comprehensive test ban can, by 1985, easily leave us in a position where we are not only inferior in numbers of weapons but also where even the weapons which we will have will be unreliable.

THE PHILOSOPHY OF SOVIET NEGOTIATIONS

The Soviet negotiators in Geneva are tough and experienced pragmatists. They recognize that the U.S. manned bomber force is on the decline as a result of the President's unilateral decision to kill the B–1 bomber. They realize that the U.S. Minuteman force is becoming highly vulnerable while an increasing percentage of their own land-based strategic missile force is becoming more secure against a first strike or counterblow. The Soviets now have about 35 percent of their missiles capable of hitting the United States in submarines, while our Trident missile is only in the testing stage. They have already deployed a 600 kilometer air- and sea-launched cruise missile—the U.S. has not. They have tested a 6,000 mile SLBM—the U.S. has not.

The Soviet negotiators do not speak in terms of deterrence. Deterrence has never been a part of their doctrine. They expect to win any war against the West. While the Soviets offer no apologies for their growing strategic and conventional forces, neither do they offer clues to the intended use of these forces. This uncertainty is the crucial ingredient in both SALT II and a nuclear test ban.

Lest we forget the traditional pragmatism of the Soviets with respect to military matters and become naively overconfident and trusting, we should consider other possible Soviet motivations toward this particular SALT treaty. First, neither the treaty nor the protocol would enhance the survivability of the U.S. Minuteman missile force, while the more survivable MX system will be stalled by the agreement in research and development for at least three years. United States cruise missile technology transfer and deployment will be severely limited. Limitations on testing and deployment of "new systems" will freeze U.S. ICBM and SLBM range, accuracy and explosive power at present levels. The Backfire bomber, at the insistence of the Russians, is not even under discussion in SALT, nor are the hundreds of medium range land- and sea-launched missiles targeted upon NATO.

Given the statements of the President, and the selection of policy makers and negotiators with a disarmament (at times unilateral) mind-set, such as Paul Warnke, the Soviets perceive that a treaty as now shaped is to their great advantage. It would seem to have several advantages to them:

It would freeze U.S. technology while permitting the Soviets to move ahead. (SALT I permitted them to pull even.)

It would undercut Congressional support for defense programs, including research and development on strategic systems. (Systems delayed by the treaty or protocol will probably be delayed in the appropriations process.)

It would result in world propaganda favorable to the Soviets, while raising serious questions about our national will.

The treatment of cruise missile technology transfer will drive a wedge between the U.S. and our NATO Allies.

VERIFICATION

One of the most troubling features of the SALT II accord, as now structured, is an almost total lack of any reliable means to verify Soviet compliance in crucial areas. The Soviet Union is a closed society with a controlled press, where the movements of persons are carefully controlled. There are no Congressional Committees to review military programs; harsh punishments are meted out for the unauthorized disclosure of security information. The fact that the opposite is true in the United States is enough to assure our 100 percent compliance with a SALT treaty or protocol, while the Soviets, under their secrecy system, would be relatively free to cheat. The same serious flaw would exist in the case of a comprehensive test ban treaty.

The U.S. national means of verification will only to a limited extent permit us to verify total numbers of ICBMs or SLBMs, which missiles are "heavy" missiles, which are MIRVed, or how many warheads (MIRVs) are carried per missile. Neither will the national means of verification disclose which systems have been upgraded with new guidance systems or other components, the range or type of warhead of a cruise missile, or the adaptability of a particular BACKFIRE bomber to deliver short-range or long-range cruise missiles.

Without this information, there can be no reliable verification of the series of interlocking ceilings contained in SALT II which are designed to control the active Soviet inventory of strategic weapons.

THE "NUMBERS GAME" AND SEMANTICS

Those who may wish to view the current state of the SALT treaty as an enhancement of U.S. security through a more secure and credible deterrent force should be disappointed. Those who may wish to view it as stabilizing the arms race or as any real constraint upon the raw strategic power of the Soviets should also be disappointed. The treaty merely deals with gross numbers of launchers and delivery systems (missiles, aircraft) and, as it now stands, the strategic balance will be less stable since the Soviets will be assured of nuclear weapons superiority. For example, the Soviets are assured of at least twice the number of ICBM warheads (RVs) that the U.S. will possess. And the total number of RVs cannot be verified. Modern Soviet RVs are believed to be as accurate as those of the U.S., while possessing yields several times higher.

The Soviets are permitted more than 300 "heavy" (very high throw weight) ICBMs, while the U.S. would have none.

Aside from the treaty, the SALT negotiators are considering a protocol and a "statement of principles." The protocol, in the nature of an Executive agreement, restricts "new" systems, "heavy" ICBMs and the deployment of land and sea based cruise missiles beyond a 600 kilometer (KM) range capability, so that they cannot hit the Soviet Union. While Backfire bombers would not count under the treaty or under the protocol, the FB–11, B–52, wide bodied jet or any other aircraft equipped to carry long-range missiles would count against the total systems permitted as a MIRVed system.

THE NATO/CRUISE MISSILE ISSUE

The Soviets have been adamant in their position that the agreement must provide against the transfer of cruise missile technology to U.S. NATO Allies. Since the land- and sea-launched cruise missile is considered by several NATO allies as a means of stabilizing the situation in Western Europe, they are seriously afraid that the U.S. will foreclose any land- or sea-based options which they may have. I share their concern.

The cruise missile is a stabilizing strategic deterrent weapon, since it can be deployed in large numbers and cannot be targeted in a first strike by the Soviets as missile silos and strategic aircraft may be. It represents a ready and secure retaliatory force.

THE TREATY AND U.S. POLICY

The policy of the United States with respect to the limitation of strategic offensive arms is expressed in Public Law 92–448, approved by the President in connection with the SALT I treaty on September 20, 1972. As stated in Section 3 of Public Law 92–448, our national policy calls for:

A stable international strategic balance which does not threaten the survivability of U.S. strategic deterrent forces.

A future treaty that would not limit the U.S. to levels of intercontinental strategic forces inferior to the limits provided for the Soviet Union.

Maintenance of a vigorous research and development and modernization program.

The SALT agreement under discussion in Geneva does not, in my opinion, measure up to our existing policy for the following reasons:

With the deployment of Soviet MIRVed and more accurate missiles, and the deployment of additional Backfire bombers, the asymmetry in total strategic power is continued and will grow more favorable to the Soviets during the life of the treaty.

The survivability of the U.S. Minuteman ICBMs is already threatened by heavy Soviet ICBMs. So is at least a part of SAC and those units of our SLBM force which would not be at sea. Nothing in the proposed treaty will make our ICBM force more secure. Instead, the threat will grow in proportion to the increasing number and accuracy of Soviet weapons. Under current Administration policies, the manned bomber leg of the triad will deteriorate. The Administration is not committed to the production or deployment of any new systems.

With the exception of "heavy" ICBMs which the Soviets will be able to deploy under the treaty, and the Backfire bombers which are not even under discussion, the U.S. and Soviet sides will be permitted a rough equivalence in numbers of strategic delivery systems. Numbers alone, however, are no measure of the inferiority or superiority of intercontinental strategic force levels. Even without the Backfire, the Soviets will be guaranteed superiority in the numbers of RVs and yield, and the opportunity to modernize and improve the accuracy of existing systems.

U.S. concessions at Geneva have dealt with Soviet systems which are in being, or under advanced development such as the SS–9, SS–17, SS–18, SS–19, SS–20 and SS–NX–18 sea-launched ballistic missile.

Soviet concessions, on the other hand, have been rare. They have sought to strictly limit even the systems which we do not have such as the cruise missile, cruise missile carriers, FB–111H, and the MX. In the absence of an early Presidential commitment, we may never have these systems.

The status of the U.S. cruise missile, cruise missile carriers, MX missile, and the Trident II missile are in a state of limbo. The fate of each of these systems depends upon decisions of the Office of the Secretary of Defense, the Office of Management and Budget, the President, and the Congress, creating multiple uncertainties. Each of these projects for political or fiscal reasons, may suffer the same fate as the B–1 bomber. Paul Warnke opposes all of them. I fear that a hastily signed treaty, which has no real advantages to the U.S., may well have the effect of drying up research and development funds for these and other deterrent forces. There are many people at work within the Carter Administration to see that this occurs even before a SALT II treaty has been proposed. This fact, and SALT II coupled with a comprehensive test ban treaty, and the stockpile problems such a treaty would cause, would by 1985 result in woefully weak U.S. deterrent forces, as compared with Soviet forces.

CONCLUSION

The SALT II treaty in its present form is not in the best interest of the United States. In view of a withering bomber force which will decline in capability while the treaty would be in force, a highly vulnerable ICBM force, and with the Trident, MX and cruise missile programs in doubt even within our own government, no treaty would be preferable to an instrument which would guarantee Soviet strategic superiority for the remainder of the century.

To those who would argue that any SALT treaty, regardless of content, would be better than no SALT treaty, I would recommend a review of British/French/German negotiations prior to World War II. History shows that a demonstration of national will and the maintenance of deterrent forces would have served the world better than the pacifist treaty of Munich. Certainly, no treaty at all would have been a better course than the legalization of Hitler's actions and the encouragement of bolder moves. SALT II, like Munich, may prove to be a very tenuous shield against Soviet adventures.

I cannot recommend support for a SALT II treaty, or a protocol thereto, which, among other things, would not halt the trend toward Soviet strategic superiority. Nothing in the proposed treaty or protocol would halt this trend, they would only legalize it until 1985. This trend cannot be halted by a SALT II treaty even more favorable to the United States than the draft now under consideration in Geneva. Any treaty must be bolstered by firm defense programs proposed by the President and supported by the Congress. Without a fair and equitable treaty and a sense of direction on the part of our own government, SALT II would be a travesty and may have tragic consequences in the futures.

SALT II is of vital importance to every American and to others in the world whose peaceful existence depends upon the deterrent power of our "nuclear umbrella." It is a matter which should be widely understood and debated. Our purposes for seeking a SALT II agreement should be made clear. Americans deserve to know the full risks and ramifications of such a treaty to our national security, even if the Soviets live up to the terms of the treaty and protocol, and where we will stand as a nation if the administration continues to push vital decisions on strategic systems farther into the future.

If the American people perceive SALT II as unfair and one-sided, where the U.S. is forced to play the game with all cards exposed while the Soviet's cards are hidden, the treaty has perhaps already failed. While the American people have on occasion been caught with their defenses down, they have never knowingly let their vital national security interests be bargained away no matter what the cost. They will not gamble their national security against the uncertain hope that the Soviets have good intentions.

REMARKS OF HONORABLE CHARLES H. WILSON

I am grateful for the opportunity to present my views on the SALT II negotiations in Geneva. But first, let me say that I take no pleasure in opposing the position of President Carter on this crucial issue.

During the past year, we have heard and read much about the Panama Canal Treaties. And, perhaps even more media coverage has been given to the dispute between Israel and Egypt.

The Panama Canal Treaties may determine who owns and controls the Panama Canal after the year 2000.

And, settlement of the Israeli-Egyptian dispute may determine who owns and controls the West Bank of the Jordan River.

But SALT II—and especially SALT II when combined with a Comprehensive Test Ban Treaty—may well determine who owns and controls the United States after the year 2000!

This is precisely the reason that I am speaking out publicly on this question. And this is why a vigilant press must get the word out to the people. It seems to me that the SALT II question deserves equal billing with the canal and the Middle East.

SALT II, and the Test Ban agreement, have been negotiated behind the locked doors and security guards of the Soviet and U.S. Missions in Geneva. Very little has come to light except for selective leaks from the Arms Control and Disarmament Agency and its Director, Mr. Warnke, to their friends in the unilateral disarmament lobby. The Carter Administration has, for more than two months now, refused to provide a copy of the Joint Draft Text of the Treaty to the House Armed Services Committee. Secretary of State Vance has not, to my knowledge, even acknowledged the Chairman's letter!

From what I have found out about SALT II, the Administration has good reason to keep the details of SALT from the people and the Congress. The way I see it, the unilateral disarmers want to keep the public in ignorance until the package can be the subject of a "Summit" deal, with great political hoopla. The SALT II package will then be sugar coated and presented as an "offer we can't refuse" from the "Godfather" in the Soviet Union.

Here are some of the things that are being withheld from the public:

Item: SALT II will not in any way limit the Soviet's supersonic Backfire bomber, which is capable of making nuclear missile and bomb strikes against American industry and cities.

Item: We have guaranteed the Soviets more than twice the number of ICBM warheads that the U.S. may have. Their accurate ICBM systems can, with little warning, hit more than twice the number of targets in the U.S. that our ICBMs would be able to take out in the Soviet Union.

Item: The Soviet Union will be able to deploy more than 300 very high throw weight ICBMs, each carrying as many as 8 MIRVed warheads. Each of the 2400 warheads carried on these heavy missiles will be several times more powerful than the explosive power of our Minuteman III missile.

Thus, with the blessing of the United States, the Soviets will, by the early to mid-1980's, have a first strike, hard target kill capability. The United States will have no, and I repeat NO, heavy MIRVed missiles.

Item: The U.S. has been euchred into a corner on MIRV limitations. We will, without doubt, insist on counting our slow B–52s, which are now about 19 years old, in the same MIRV limit as the MIRVed ICBM. This literally makes no sense at all. Even equipped with cruise missiles, it would take the B–52 eight to ten hours to hit a target, while a MIRVed ICBM would require only 25 to 30 minutes. Restricting the numbers of B–52s on this basis is like comparing race horses to jackasses.

Even while we are apparently willing to limit our B–52 force, we are also limiting the capability of the cruise missile to reach targets within the Soviet Union. The range limitation on the U.S. standoff cruise missiles is a real boon to the Soviet military planner. He will know where to concentrate his 6,000 radars, his 2,600 fighter interceptors and his 12,000 surface to air missiles. He will know where to plan to intercept and shoot down cruise missile carriers such as the old, slow B-52 and the proposed "Fat Albert" Cruise Missile Carrier. With a range limitation of 1300 nautical miles (2500 kilometers), Soviet planners can simply extend their intercept lines, forcing the cruise missiles to be launched farther and farther from their shores.

If President Carter is true to his word that he will not sign any SALT II treaty which cannot be verified, he will not sign the document as it stands now in Geneva.

This is the curious thing about SALT II. While the negotiations and proposed treaty are based on distrust of the Soviets, most of the verification of a treaty will have to be based on trust in the Soviet's word.

It is true, as Mr. Warnke says, that we can count most missile silos—if they are not hidden.

But, Mr. Warnke cannot tell us exactly what is in those silos or in the tubes of submarines.

Are they heavy missiles? Are they MIRVed?

Which Backfire bomber is equipped for long-range cruise missiles?

What is the maximum range of a particular cruise missile? Does it have a conventional or nuclear warhead?

How many missiles are MIRVed?

Will the Soviets have land-mobile missiles ready for deployment?

All of these things are verifiable about U.S. systems in our press and in hearings before Congress. The Soviet Union does not oblige us with this type of verification.

During SALT I, the Soviets did not bother to tell us that they were building a huge ballistic missile submarine under cover. Neither did they tell us that they were testing an antiballistic missile radar or a satellite killer.

Verification under SALT II will continue to depend largely on estimates—that is, guesswork. The people in the trade will readily admit that intelligence is about 10 percent hard information and 90 percent guesswork.

When Mr. Warnke was questioned recently about possible Soviet cheating on SALT II, he replied in effect: If we were to catch them cheating, we would have every right to protest. This, no doubt, is a great comfort to the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

SALT II comes at a most unfortunate time. As Secretary Harold Brown said, this is the 15th year of consistent Soviet military growth in both strategic and conventional forces, while, in real terms, U.S. defense budgets have declined during most of that period.

I could not put the situation better than General George Brown, the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, recently did; he said, "I am struck by the fact that in nearly every area of military strength there has been a relative decline over the years in relation to the Soviet Union, our principal potential adversary."

Thus, we are doing something in Geneva that we have never done before. We are negotiating from a position of relative weakness, and allowing the Soviets to negotiate from a position of relative strength.

The Soviets can read the trend lines as well as the Secretary of Defense and Chairman of the JCS.

They are building supersonic BACKFIRE bombers and developing a new heavy bomber—we killed the B-1 program.

They are producing and deploying a fourth generation of heavy ICBMs, and developing a fifth generation—we have no plans.

They have developed a land-mobile ICBM—we continue to stall on the MX missile.

They are putting several new ballistic missile submarines to sea each year—we have cut back on Trident construction.

They maintain an air defense system—we have abandoned ours.

They have a civil defense program—we abandoned any such effort years ago.

And, they will have a treaty which permits them to modernize and expand their strategic arms—while we will have a treaty which will, at best, maintain the status quo and, at worst, require the destruction of B-52s or missiles, and stifle any real ICBM improvements.

The subject of arms control is not new to me. In fact, I headed a special armed services subcommittee on Arms Control in 1974.

The subcommittee's report, issued in December 8, 1974, anticipated the change in the strategic balance as it evolved under the SALT I agreement, the subcommittee said:

"If stability does not result from an acceptable strategic arms limitation agreement, the U.S.—if it appreciates the consequences of the eroding character of its strategic posture—will decide it must either take the necessary steps to develop new and better strategic tools to become operative in the early 1980's, or recognize and accept it will become a military power second to the Soviet Union in the perception of other nations, and in fact."

The Carter Administration appears ready to accept such a result.

To sum up my remarks, it appears to me:

First, that SALT II will be a Strategic Arms Limitation Treaty which limits only U.S. strategic arms.

While there are vital and significant areas which will defy verification, the treaty would favor the Soviets even if they observed all of its terms.

SALT II and a Comprehensive Test Ban Treaty, when combined with inaction by the Executive Branch, will guarantee Soviet strategic supremacy.

SALT II is a bad deal, and a high price to pay for a political symbol.

[From the New York Times, July 24, 1978]

SOVIET OBJECTS TO U.S. MISSILE PLAN, COMPLICATING TALKS ON ARMS PACT

WASHINGTON, July 23.—Carter Administration officials said today that the Soviet Union had objected to an American plan for deploying mobile, intercontinental missiles. They said the move had injected a new complication into the Administration's search for a strategic arms agreement this year with Moscow.

The officials said that at a recent private meeting in Geneva, the top Soviet arms negotiator, Vladimir S. Semyonov, had informed Paul C. Warnke, the director of the Arms Control and Disarmament Agency, that an American proposal to hide land-based missiles among clusters of empty, underground silos might not be compatible with the terms of a new treaty to limit strategic arms until 1985.

According to the officials, Mr. Semyonov did not rule out American deployment of a mobile-missile system under a new treaty, but he did indicate that Moscow would resist some approaches the Administration is examining.

In particular, he is said to have questioned a so-called "multiple aim point" missile system in which hundreds of missiles would be shifted randomly among thousands of launching silos to complicate any Soviet effort to destroy American land-based missiles in a first strike.

The Administration has decided that a new arms accord must allow the United States to move ahead with mobile missiles, largely because it is thought that an agreement without this option cannot win Senate approval. Accordingly, during two days of talks in Geneva earlier this month, Secretary of State Cyrus R. Vance told the Soviet Foreign Minister, Andrei A. Gromyko, that the proposed treaty could not interfere with American plans to protect land-based missiles.

Mr. Vance, officials said, did not specifically refer to the mobile-missile idea, but in the session between Mr. Semyonov and Mr. Warnke it was more fully discussed. The Russian negotiator's primary concern, they said, was the difficulty the Soviet Union would have counting American missiles.

The Soviet reaction has caused consternation among Pentagon officials, who fear that Moscow is committed to banning mobile missiles. However, other officials said they were less alarmed and were optimistic that Moscow would accept some type of mobile-missile deployment.

The deployment of mobile missiles is banned in a three-year protocol now being negotiated by the two sides but not in the longer-term treaty, which would run until 1985 and limit overall members of missiles and bombers.

To make verification of compliance easier, the treaty restricts construction of new missile silos, which has led to concern by some officials that the shell-game idea might be prohibited.

They have maintained that rather than restrict the number of silos, the treaty should limit the cannisters that would be used to carry rockets from silo to silo.

Under such an arrangement, the officials contend, the United States could build new underground launchers, and methods could be worked out for Moscow to verify that cannisters carrying American missiles did not exceed the permitted number. However, Mr. Semyonov is said to have been skeptical about counting cannisters instead of silos.

Despite this, officials maintained that the chances of achieving an arms agreement this year remained good. One reason for optimism, they said, is progress on another unresolved issue—what new missiles, mobile and stationary, each side could deploy.

During his session with Mr. Gromyko, Mr. Vance is said to have proposed that the treaty allow both sides to test but not deploy one new land-based missile. Under this approach, the United States would be able, officials said, to develop the proposed mobile missile and could deploy it after the treaty expired.

Mr. Gromyko is said to have rejected this proposal on the ground that Moscow is ready to deploy a new missile soon while the American project is still on the drawing boards.

However, Mr. Gromyko, in a counter-proposal, is said to have been willing to accept an earlier American proposal on new missile deployment if Washington accepted Moscow's position on other issues still in dispute, including what restrictions are to be placed on the Soviet bomber known as the Backfire. The earlier American proposal was that both sides be allowed to test and deploy one new land-based missile during the treaty, with or without multiple warheads.

While Mr. Vance is said to have turned down this proposal, officials said that Moscow's apparent readiness to move toward the American position on new missiles was encouraging.●

SUPPLEMENTAL FUNDING REQUEST—HOUSE RESOLUTION 1276—SELECT COMMITTEE ON ASSASSINATIONS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. STOKES) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. STOKES. Mr. Speaker, I take this time to share with my colleagues the submission I have made to the Committee on House Administration supporting the request for supplemental funding to provide for the further expenses of investigations and studies to be conducted by the Select Committee on Assassinations for the 2d session, 95th Congress.

The 95th Congress reconstituted the select committee by House Resolution 222 on February 2, 1977, and extended its duration for the length of the 95th Congress by House Resolution 433 on March 30, 1977.

The select committee has identified four main issues to be analyzed to fulfill its legislative mandate as defined in House Resolution 222. First, who was or were the assassin(s) of President John F. Kennedy and Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr.? Second, did the assassin(s) have any aid or assistance either before or after the assassination? Third, did the agencies and departments of the U.S. Government adequately perform their duties and functions in collecting and sharing information prior to the assassinations; protecting John F. Kennedy and Martin Luther King, Jr.; and conducting investigations into each assassination and coordinating the results of those investigations. Fourth, given the evidence the select committee has uncovered, is the amendment of existing legislation or the enactment of new legislation appropriate?

During the first session of the 95th Congress and the 2d session to date, the select committee has been gathering evidence by field investigation, interviews, and the taking of testimony in executive session. Each investigation is following a carefully formulated and detailed plan designed to resolve significant issues concerning that assassination.

However, in order to fulfill the committee's legislative mandate during the remainder of the second session, the committee must conclude the investigations, hold public hearings, which are now scheduled for August, September and November, and write the final report which under the committee's reconstituting resolution is due by December 31, 1978.

To finance the committee's operation during the second session, the committee requested "primary expense" funding in the amount of $2,978,000 by way of House Resolution 956, introduced January 19, 1978.

The Committee on House Administration reduced this request to $2,500,000, which the House subsequently approved.

At the time of action by the Committee on House Administration, the record will show the select committee indicated that supplemental funding would be necessary to restore the cut funds plus an additional $100,000 to $200,000 for possible scientific projects whose expense could not then be accurately forecast.

Based upon actual operations through June 30 and a projection of expenses for the balance of the year, it is now determined that supplemental funding in the amount of $790,000 will be required.

This amount represents the $478,000 originally cut by the Committee on House Administration, plus an additional $152,000 for underestimating expenses and $160,000 for scientific projects.

In reference to the $152,000 additional expense money, while the committee has been extremely prudent in the expenditure of funds, it underestimated the funds needed for travel, witnesses, and telephone expense to conduct a comprehensive investigation.

The following is a comparison of the committee's original expense request with its revised 1978 budget:

| | Original request | Revised budget |
|---|---|---|
| Miscellaneous | 5,000 | 50,000 |
| Salaries | $2,400,000 | $2,335,000 |
| Travel | 300,000 | 420,000 |
| Consultant services | 132,000 | 86,000 |
| Witnesses | 25,000 | 100,000 |
| Stationery and supplies | 20,000 | 14,000 |
| Telephone and telegraph | 48,000 | 80,000 |
| Equipment: Lease | 28,000 | 28,000 |
| Reproductions, et cetera | 18,000 | 15,000 |
| Books and periodicals | 2,000 | 2,000 |
| Miscellaneous | 5,000 | 50,000 |
| Scientific projects | 0 | 160,000 |
| Totals | 2,978,000 | 3,290,000 |
| Funded, House Resolution 956 | | 2,500,000 |
| Supplemental funding request | | 790,000 |

Although the funds were not provided in the primary funding request, the committee decided that in order to conduct "a full and complete investigation," the funds, as indicated, would have to be spent on the scientific projects and in the other areas.

Consequently, the committee's present funds will last no longer than the latter part of September. The committee notes that this will occur even with a reduction of almost 30 persons from the committee's staff.

To put the 1978 revised budget of $3,290,000 in proper perspective, I would like to compare it with actual expenditures in 1977 of $2,089,400 which shows an increase of $1,200,600.

The increase is due solely to the fact that the select committee is operating at full strength and full investigative capacity in 1978 where it was not able to in 1977.

A few statistics for the first 6 months of 1978 and a full year projection compared with the entire year of 1977 will prove this point. They are:

| | 1977 | 6 months 1978 | Projection 1978 |
|---|---|---|---|
| Number of persons traveling | 387 | 485 | 700 |
| Number of areas visited | 562 | 716 | 1,000 |
| Number of man days traveled | 1,882 | 2,197 | 3,200 |
| Number of witnesses | 35 | 115 | 265 |
| Number of consultants used | 28 | 46 | 48 |
| Number of hearings and meetings held | 42 | 67 | 117 |
| Number of interviews conducted | 1,400 | 2,134 | 3,000 |
| Number of subpenas issued | 103 | 305 | 325 |
| Number of immunity grants | 5 | 112 | 135 |

In addition, the following number of files were requested from the various executive branch agencies during the first six months of 1978.

| Agency | Number |
|---|---|
| Department of Justice | |
| Mainly F.B.I. but includes A.T.F., I.N.S., D.E.A. and U.S. Marshals | 1,191 |
| Central Intelligence Agency | 705 |
| Department of Defense | 236 |
| Secret Service | 235 |
| Miscellaneous | 12 |

NOTE: The volume of material contained in a "Main File" has ranged from one serial volume to as many as 93 volumes comprising 6000 plus serials and exhibits.

The increase of $1,200,600 for 1978 over 1977 is accounted for in the following expense categories:

|---|---|
| Salaries | $608,600 |
| Travel | 246,000 |
| Witnesses | 87,000 |
| Telephone | 49,000 |
| Scientific projects | 160,000 |
| Contingency allowance | 50,000 |
| Total | 1,200,600 |

These increases are a matter of fact and not conjecture and are explained as follows:

SALARIES—INCREASE $608,600

In 1977, the committee contemplated reaching its authorized staff of 115 by July. However, maximum strength was not reached until the end of the year evidenced by the following comparative figures:

| | 1977 | 1978 |
|---|---|---|
| January | 73 | 115 |
| February | 73 | 115 |
| March | 64 | 117 |
| April | 63 | 116 |
| May | 59 | 118 |
| June | 72 | 118 |
| July | 84 | 114 |
| August | 93 | 92 |
| September | 103 | 90 |
| October | 111 | 90 |
| November | 114 | 90 |
| December | 114 | 90 |
| Average | 85 | 105 |

The average number of staff in 1977 was 85 compared with 105 in 1978 which accounts for the increase of $608,600.

|---|---|
| 1978 Salaries | |
| 105 × average salary of $22,238 | $2,335,000 |
| 1977 Salaries | |
| 85 × average salary of $20,310 | 1,726,400 |
| Increase | 608,600 |

TRAVEL—INCREASE $246,000

Because of lack of funds and other problems, travel was severely restricted in the early part of 1977. In fact, it was not until October that the committee reached its anticipated level of investigative travel. This level increased sharply in the first 6 months of 1978 but should taper off as the year continues. The following compares travel month-by-month in 1977 with 1978. The figures in the number columns represent the size of staff in that month.

| | 1977 | |
|---|---|---|
| | Number | Amount |
| January | 73 | 0 |
| February | 73 | 0 |
| March | 64 | $6,500 |
| April | 63 | 5,600 |
| May | 59 | 8,400 |
| June | 72 | 6,500 |
| July | 84 | 10,700 |
| August | 93 | 19,500 |
| September | 103 | 19,900 |
| October | 111 | 35,700 |
| November | 114 | 33,200 |
| December | 114 | 28,000 |
| Totals | | 174,000 |

| | 1978 | |
|---|---|---|
| | Number | Amount |
| January | 115 | $41,200 |
| February | 115 | 39,400 |
| March | 117 | 53,700 |
| April | 116 | 58,600 |
| May | 118 | 56,600 |
| June | 118 | 34,100 |
| July | 114 | 31,400 |
| August | 92 | 30,000 |
| September | 90 | 25,000 |
| October | 90 | 25,000 |
| November | 90 | 15,000 |
| December | 90 | 10,000 |
| Totals | | 420,000 |

WITNESSES—INCREASE $87,000

In 1977, the committee handled 35 witnesses compared with 115 for the first 6 months of 1978 and 265 projected for the full year 1978. The following is a recap of monthly expenses for 1977 and 1978.

| | 1977 | 1978 |
|---|---|---|
| January | $0 | $368 |
| February | 0 | 3,451 |
| March | 0 | 10,659 |
| April | 0 | 13,649 |
| May | 527 | 7,466 |
| June | 392 | 7,428 |
| July | 0 | 6,979 |
| August | 267 | 10,000 |
| September | 6,084 | 14,000 |
| October | 190 | 8,000 |
| November | 4,933 | 14,000 |
| December | 607 | 4,000 |
| Totals | 13,000 | 100,000 |

These funds cover the expenses of live witnesses, deposition witnesses, interpreters and other individuals providing information or assistance to the committee.

TELEPHONE AND TELEGRAPH—INCREASE $49,000

Lack of funds and the cutting off of service to the committee severely restricted telephone usage in the early part of 1977. It was not until the latter part of 1977 that telephone expense approached the anticipated level. Stepped-up investigative activity in 1978 has increased the expense further and it is expected that this level will hold through 1978. The following is a comparison of telephone expense for 1977 and 1978.

| | 1977 | 1978 |
|---|---|---|
| January | $1,374 | $4,672 |
| February | 837 | 5,909 |
| March | 1,267 | 7,107 |
| April | 1,604 | 6,367 |
| May | 1,801 | 7,035 |
| June | 2,275 | 6,910 |
| July | 1,590 | 7,000 |
| August | 2,437 | 7,000 |
| September | 3,726 | 7,000 |
| October | 4,851 | 7,000 |
| November | 5,061 | 7,000 |
| December | 4,177 | 7,000 |
| Totals | 31,000 | 80,000 |

SCIENTIFIC PROJECTS—$160,000

The committee has determined that the expenditure of funds for the following scientific projects is necessary to conduct a full and complete investigation.

| | |
|---|---|
| Photo Analysis and Enhancement | $95,000 |
| Accoustical | 60,000 |
| Engineering | 5,000 |
| Total | 160,000 |

CONTINGENCY ALLOWANCE—$50,000

As this will be the last opportunity to seek funding from the House, it was determined that a contingency allowance be requested for unanticipated expenses that may arise in the latter part of 1978.

Some of my colleagues have questioned the price tag of $5,000,000 for the select committee to conduct the two investigations. I would like to answer this by submitting the following comparative analysis of the budget and staffing level of the Warren Commission which investigated only one assassination.

WARREN COMMISSION

Staff: 83.
Duration: 10 months.
Budget: $4,418,423.*

The Warren Commission did not possess an independent investigative staff. For investigative purposes, they relied on the following Federal intelligence agencies.

FBI: Provided 150 full-time agents who in turn conducted 25.000 interviews and submitted 2,300 reports totalling 25,400 pages. They also provided secretarial and clerical assistance.

CIA: Provided 12 full-time and part-time professionals. They also provided secretarial and clerical assistance

Secret Service: Provided over 60 full-time professionals who conducted 1,550 interviews and submitted 800 reports totalling 4,600 pages. They also provided secretarial and clerical assistance.

Justice Department: Provided certain professional support.

IRS: Estimates that they provided 6 staff-years of support.

Converting the assistance from the Federal agencies into a full-time staff would have given the Warren Commisison a staff of 400 at a cost of over $10,000,000 for only 10 months to investigate the one assassination.

The Select Committee will have an average staff of 95 for two years at a total cost of slightly over $5,000,000 to investigate two assassinations.

*Budget expressed as 1976 dollars per Library of Congress Congressional Research Service, January 27, 1977.

As I mentioned earlier, the committee's present funds will last no longer than the latter part of September. Because of the urgency of this situation, the Subcommittee on Accounts will hold a hearing on the supplemental funding request on Tuesday, August 8, 1978 with action by the full Committee on House Administration later that week. This will enable their recommendation to be brought to the House floor in the early part of September.

I hope that my colleagues will support the select committee at this critical time so that the committee can complete the legislative mandate of the House and bring credit to the Congress of the United States.●

"HORIZONTAL DIVESTITURE: THE FORGOTTEN PROMISE"

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. DRINAN) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. DRINAN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to register my deep disappointment with the decision of the Carter administration to forego a policy which would prohibit the major oil companies from controlling alternative energy industries.

Horizontal divestiture was explicitly endorsed by Mr. Carter in his campaign and mandated by the National Democratic Platform of 1976. Despite his campaign statements, despite the platform on which he was elected, President Carter failed to include horizontal divestiture in the comprehensive energy plan he introduced in April of 1977. In recent testimony before a joint hearing of the Senate Judiciary Committee and the House Subcommittee on Antitrust and Monopoly, Assistant Attorney General John H. Shenefield made it clear that the administration now plans to turn its back on this promise.

The case for horizontal divestiture of energy companies is manifest. It is incomprehensible that we should stand by and permit the petroleum, natural gas, and coal giants to play a significant role in determining what energy alternatives will be developed, at what rate, at what cost, and at whose expense. As Professor Walter Adams of Michigan State University has asked, "shall we delegate to a private power complex—subject neither to the discipline of competition nor to effective Government regulation and with a record of public service that is not reassuring—the right to plan our industrial future? * * * The Exxons of this world will not suddenly or voluntarily surrender their market control. Nor will they start competing against themselves in defiance of the laws of profit and power maximization, and indeed, the laws of self-preservation." Mr. Speaker, it is precisely our industrial and economic future which is at stake in this matter.

According to the American Petroleum Institute, as quoted in the Washington Post of March 31, 1978, the oil industry today owns 43.7 percent of U.S. uranium reserves, over 40 percent of U.S. coal under private lease, and 40 percent of domestic copper holdings. Copper, it should be noted, is presently essential in the manufacture of solar energy collectors. These corporate giants, who in 1973 earned healthy and even outstanding profits while American consumers lined up at gas stations to pay skyrocketing prices, plan to continue to invest in alternative energy enterprises. The prospect of a practical energy monopoly is a sobering thought for people of any economic or political philosophy.

In May of this year in Knoxville, Tenn., President Carter stated his administration's support for "encouraging more competition and less concentration of economic power among the producers of petroleum, coal, and uranium." Mr. Speaker, I wish that the President would back up those words with concrete initiatives to oppose the concentration of which he speaks. Mr. SEIBERLING, my colleague from Ohio, has introduced excellent legislation H.R. 7785, which would amend the Clayton Act to bring about genuine interfuel competition. I call on President Carter to add his belated support to this most important measure, and thereby to uphold the principles of competition of which he has earlier been such an eloquent champion.

In 1948, candidate Harry Truman said:

To me, party platforms are contracts with the people, and I always looked upon them as agreements that had to be carried out.

I now urge my colleagues to join me in reminding the President of his campaign statements and his election platform, which explicitly called for "the legal prohibition against corporate ownership of competing types of energy." Mr. Speaker, this issue is not, however, merely one of fidelity to the President's public statements. As the U.S. oil companies continue to buy interest in and control over corporations which produce alternative energy supplies, prompt preventive action is not just desirable—it is imperative. As noted in the 1976 platform, " 'horizontal' concentration of economic power is dangerous both to the national interest and to the functioning of the competitive system." Lacking executive leadership in this vital area, Congress can and must seize the initiative on its own.●

McDONNELL DOUGLAS TESTIMONY ON NATURE OF INTERNATIONAL TRADE IN AIRCRAFT

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. VANIK) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. VANIK. Mr. Speaker, on July 14, the Subcommittee on Trade of the Committee on Ways and Means held a hearing on American and foreign practices in the financing of large commercial aircraft sales. The subcommittee has received a very useful, informative statement from the McDonnell Douglas Corp. discussing some of the issues of concern to the subcommittee. The McDonnell Douglas statement notes, for example, that the financing terms of a recent sale involving Rolls Royce engines "violate the existing Standstill Agreement as to downpayment, terms of financing, and coverage. Actually the financing covers over three times the value of the British export."

In discussing recent sales of airbuses to the U.S. market, McDonnell Douglas states:

If we were to attempt to offer such a financing package to a foreign airline customer, under present policy the Eximbank would not participate. The accepted interpretation of the Standstill Agreement is that if any element of the financing package exceeds the accepted guidelines, the official agency cannot participate. The EAL terms did exceed those guidelines. . . . We are aware of other instances of Airbus Industrie exceeding the limits of the Standstill Agreement.

The McDonnell Douglas statement is further proof of the need for agreement among the world's industrialized nations on clearer rules for export financing. The full text of the informative statement follows:

STATEMENT ON INTERNATIONAL COMMERCIAL AIRCRAFT COMPETITION

McDonnell Douglas Corporation (MDC) is a proponent of free trade. We have a corporate representative in Geneva as part of the Industry Sector Advisory Committee assisting in the United States GATT negotiations in the aerospace sector, and we support the current activity of the United States in seeking acceptable understandings in our areas of interest. However, cooperation requires joint dedication, and we are concerned with some recent developments and believe that they require discussion.

STANDARDS SALES AND FINANCING PRACTICES IN THE SELLING OF AIRCRAFT IN THE INTERNATIONAL MARKET

Most sales of U.S. commercial transport aircraft to foreign airlines are financed in part by the Export-Import Bank (Eximbank is not allowed to finance sales to domestic airlines). In a similar manner, sales of European aircraft are financed in part by European government credit and financing agencies similar to Eximbank. Such assistance is necessary because commercial jet aircraft sales generally involve some form of long-term debt.

The standard practice for financing the sale of American commercial jet aircraft to foreign buyers involves both the Eximbank and private lenders. Typically, the buyer makes a cash payment of approximately 15 percent of the aircraft price with Eximbank and private lenders providing the remaining funds through direct loans. These loans are usually repaid over a 10-year amortization period with the private lenders being repaid in the early maturities and Eximbank in the latter maturities. In general, the private lender's interest rate is determined by a base rate such as the prime rate in the U.S. or the six-month Eurodollar rate in London. The Eximbank interest rate is generally fixed throughout the repayment term and is a function of the term of the loan.

The accepted financing practice for non-U.S. manufacturers of commercial jet aircraft is similar. Typically, 85 percent to 90 percent of the contract value is supplied by the lenders with repayment ending 10 years after aircraft delivery. Normally government-backed insurance is available to guarantee repayment.

Government agencies in the U.S. and abroad have worked together to agree on common financing limits and avoid "financing wars." Several existing agreements pertain to the financing of exports, but only one applies to the financing of the export of commercial jet transports. This agreement was reached by the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development (OECD) Group on Export Credits and Credit Guarantees in May 1975 and is today commonly known as the "Standstill Agreement."

This Standstill Agreement of the OECD Group stated that ". . . the Members of the Group declare that for exports of subsonic aircraft and helicopters they will not grant softer terms than their current practices." The "no softer terms" provision in the case of commercial jet transports has meant that the members require a downpayment equal to at least ten percent of the contract value, and that the credit has a maximum length of ten years from the date of delivery. There also exists a second understanding in which it has been agreed not to finance or cover credit for more than 100 percent of the value of goods and services exported.

These criteria define the generally accepted permissible limits for officially sanctioned export financing in which governments participate. They are the guidelines to which Eximbank has adhered. Private financing, it should be noted, may take whatever form the market determines to be feasible, and the terms available to any particular airline are established by the qualifications of the particular borrower in the private commercial markets.

HOW RECENT TRANSACTIONS HAVE VARIED FROM STANDARD SALES AND FINANCING PRACTICES

Pan Am purchased twelve L–1011–500 aircraft powered by the Rolls-Royce RB–211 engine. The estimated total British content, including engines, was less than thirty percent of the total purchase price. The British Government's export financing agency, Export Credit and Guarantee Department (ECGD), provided the following financing for the engines: no initial cash payment, one hundred percent guarantee, and a fifteen-year repayment period. We have been told that the interest rate on this portion of the financing was fixed at 8.5% plus certain premium fees and other charges which raised the effective cost somewhat higher.

The financing for the airframes, which were built in the U.S., was also the subject of a British Government guarantee. Therefore, the British Government provided 100% financing for the entire airframe and engines for a period of 15 years. Such terms violate the existing Standstill Agreement as to down payment, term of financing and coverage. Actually the financing covers over three times the value of the British export.

In the Eastern Airlines purchase of the A–300, senior debt repayable over a ten-year period was provided with the lenders being given a guarantee in the normal manner of European export financing. In addition, four of the aircraft, originally delivered under a zero-cost short-term lease, were financed under a long-term lease. It appears that Airbus Industrie also supplied a substantial amount of senior debt and agreed to provide Eastern with approximately $96,000,000 in subordinated loans. It has been reported that repayment is deferred so that no payments will be made in the initial 4 years and interest only will be paid in years 6 through 10. Repayment will occur in years 11 through 15. According to newspaper accounts, the interest rate on this portion of the financing is to vary with Eastern's earnings. The remaining portion of the purchase price is to be supplied by the engine manufacturer and the airline itself.

If we were to attempt to offer such a financing package to a foreign airline customer, under present policy the Eximbank would not participate. The accepted interpretation of the Standstill Agreement is that if any element of the financing package exceeds the accepted guidelines, the official agency cannot participate. The EAL terms did exceed those guidelines.

We are aware of other instances of Airbus Industrie exceeding the limits of the Standstill Agreement. Twelve-year financing couched as leases have been offered in Korea, Thailand, South Africa and Germany.

THE EXTENT TO WHICH THE U.S. AIRCRAFT INDUSTRY RECEIVES DIRECT OR INDIRECT GOVERNMENT SUBSIDIES

European governments evidently are convinced that the U.S. commercial aircraft industry's supremacy is due to massive U.S. government subsidization. This notion apparently arises from the fact that the U.S. commercial aircraft manufacturers are also substantial military and NASA contractors. Accordingly, those governments view support of their industry as way to redress an imbalance. However, such a view is not justified.

More than twenty years ago, U.S. government funding of the B–47, B–52, and KC–135 programs helped Boeing take the lead in commercial jet transports. Other U.S. manufacturers without such military programs, however, quickly introduced competing jets, and since that time government-sponsored development has played a very modest, declining role.

Government funding of the competition for the C–5 transport program in the 1960's has been used as an example of government subsidization. In the case of MDC's Douglas Aircraft Company, however, we know that there is no relationship between the Douglas C–5A proposal and the DC–10. The objectives of military technology—short life, limit-load design, supersonic speeds, emphasis on aerodynamic and weapons performance but not on environmental constraints—are mostly very different from the long life, subsonic speeds, safety, and economic and environmentally acceptable performance that are the aims of commercial development. With the demise of the strategic bomber the relationship has declined even further. In the military area, there has been a rising emphasis of tactical aircraft and a de-emphasis of strategic and transport aircraft. Moreover, the recent military purchase of DC–10's as transport-tankers gave the government the advantage of development costs already expended by private enterprise. On a smaller scale, the military use of the DC–9 likewise made use of commercial development.

This trend is documented by the DoD-DoT-NASA Research and Development Contributions to Aviation Progress study of 1977. Some basic technologies originally developed at government expense have been beneficial to the commercial industry. The use of composite materials is an example. But when compared with the total development requirements of commercial aircraft, these benefits are modest. MDC estimates that probably not more than $200 million of NASA's annual budget is useful to commercial technology, and most of that amount relates to long-term goals rather than to current applications.

Our government has shown little interest in maintaining engineering staffs adequate for continuing development of the U.S. aircraft industry, so that the three commercial aircraft producers have had to do this themselves without help. Furthermore, although the government does permit military contractors to include in overhead costs the Independent Research and Development (IRAD) funds spent on military aircraft technology, the percentage of IRAD for which a company can be reimbused on military contracts cannot be greater than the percentage of military work in the company's long-term business base. Since MDC's Douglas Aircraft Company has only about 15 percent military work in its long-term base but devotes about a third of its IRAD expenditures to military systems technology, Douglas' commercial work in effect subsidizes more than half of its military IRAD work. Obviously this contradicts the preconceptions of our European competitors.

THE EXTENT TO WHICH FOREIGN COMMERCIAL TRANSPORT MANUFACTURERS RECEIVE GOVERNMENT SUBSIDIES

In general, the European governments treat their aviation industry as a national asset and in most cases actually have nationalized the companies or have controlling ownership of them. In addition, foreign governments often act as equity participants in commercial transport programs and absorb the large financial risks. Typical from 50% to 90% of program launch cost is a government responsibility.

Airbus Industrie, the entity established to develop and market the A-300, is owned by France's Aerospatiale, West German's Messerschmitt-Bölkow-Blohm, VFW-Fokker (a consortium of West German and Dutch companies) and CASA of Spain. Development funds have been provided by the governments involved, with repayment to be on a royalty basis. In the case of the French government, the mechanics of the payback are illustrated by Enclosure (1). For the first 130 aircraft the repayment is 0.06% per airplane. On the next 20 aircraft the amount is 0.17% per aircraft and on the next 210 aircraft 0.35% providing repayment of 85% of the funds over the delivery of 360 aircraft. In this way the governments absorb the bulk of the market risk, giving industry the opportunity to recover its funds on the early airplanes. Generally, no or very low interest charges are placed on these fundings. In the case of the A-300B, even the nominal royalty charges of 0.6% per aircraft were suspended in February 1976 and apparently have not been reinstated.

The total amount of such government funding is unknown. Enclosure (2) summarizes the best available data. It seems reasonable to assume that between guarantees and direct fundings, France and Germany as substantially equal partners have invested a total aggregate of over $3½ billion thus far in the A-300B program.

Another form of apparent subsidy is illustrated by Enclosure (3), which shows that Aerospatiale of France, while incurring massive losses in recent years, has shown a steady increase in capital worth. Such an increase can only have occurred as a result of substantial capital infusion by the French government, either directly or indirectly. A privately owned company would probably not be able to survive in the face of such losses.

CONCLUSION

Obviously this entire subject is extremely complex, but it must be quickly solved in a way that will restore genuinely free trade uninhibited by artificial barriers or artificial incentives. We cannot fault Eastern or Pan Am for accepting the most attractive financing packages available to them, and certainly no thought should be given to cancelling their purchases. But for the future, Eximbank should be given and encouraged to use the power to prevent extraordinary financing arrangements from taking business from American manufacturers in either foreign or domestic air line markets. Another part of the solution may be found in new forms of cooperation among aircraft manufacturers both here in the U.S. and overseas; this possibility was outlined in McDonnell Douglas Corporation's submissions to the CAB last October. Other problem areas—the low prices and special inducement that only government-subsidized industries can consistently offer—also require attention.

These problems exist today, and they are hurting U.S. manufacturers today all around the world. There must be prompt action on all of them if an extremely important and productive element of American industry is not to be seriously and permanently damaged.●

EASTON'S LARRY HOLMES NEW HEAVYWEIGHT CHAMP

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. ROONEY) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. ROONEY. Mr. Speaker, while some areas of the world may take issue, the 15th Congressional District of Pennsylvania recognizes only one heavyweight boxing champion of the world, our favorite son, Larry Holmes.

This Saturday evening, the citizens of Easton, Pa., and many friends from far and wide, will converge on Kirby Fieldhouse on the Lafayette College campus in Easton to pay tribute to "the champ."

Larry Holmes won the World Boxing Council's heavyweight title in a thrilling 15-round match with Ken Norton on June 9. Larry had reached the pinacle of the boxing profession with a perfect record of 27 victories and no defeats in professional competition. He won 19 of his victories by knockouts.

Born in Cuthbert, Ga., on November 3, 1949, he lived for a time only an hour's drive from Plains, Ga., home of our President Jimmy Carter. And, as the Easton Express newspaper recently noted, the Holmes family, like the Carter family, produced a son who rose to the very top of his chosen profession.

Larry moved to Easton with his family in 1956 and attended the Taylor and Porter Elementary Schools there. He wrestled at St. Anthony's Youth Center, played football, basketball, and baseball in local midget leagues, and got his introduction to boxing at the Easton Police Athletic League.

At the age of 13, Larry dropped out of Shull Junior High School while in the seventh grade and began working in a series of laborer jobs, pursuing his boxing training at every opportunity. As far back as he can remember, Larry told a reporter, he was stimulated by the challenge of fighting.

As his boxing skills improved, he advanced from the facilities of the Easton PAL and St. Anthony's to the Trenton, N.J., PAL. In 1972, he won the New Jersey Golden Gloves Championship, the Amateur Athletic Union Championship, and the Eastern Olympics Championship.

His amateur career consisted of 22 contests, 19 of which Holmes won.

He became the Irish Golden Gloves Champion, a semifinalist in the National Golden Gloves Tournament, and was runnerup in the 1972 U.S. Olympic Team trials.

Larry turned professional on March 21, 1973, in a match with Rodell Dupree in Scranton, Pa. Five years later, on March 25, 1978, the world learned that Larry Holmes was a solid, determined contender for the heavyweight championship when he decisioned Ernie Shavers in 12 rounds in Las Vegas.

And so there was no doubt in the minds of Larry's multitude of family, friends, and supporters in Easton, Pa., when he squared off with Ken Norton in the World Boxing Council's 15-round championship match on June 9 of this year. Larry would be bringing a world championship home to Easton, they knew. And Larry did.

More than 2,000 fans welcomed the champ when his plane arrived at nearby A–B–E Airport and many thousands more cheered him along the streets of Easton.

This Saturday night, I will join the many hundreds who plan to attend Larry Holmes' testimonial in Easton. We want the world to know that we are proud—every one of us in the Lehigh Valley—of our "Holmes Town" boxer who is the new world's heavyweight champ.●

AFFIRMATION OF SOVEREIGNTY OF THE INDIGENOUS PEOPLE OF THE WESTERN HEMISPHERE

(Mr. DELLUMS asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.)

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Speaker, I request, at this time, the opportunity to read into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, a manifesto, entitled, "Affirmation of Sovereignty of the Indigenous People of the Western Hemisphere," which was presented to me on July 27, 1978, by a representing committee of the Longest Walk, a native American pilgrimage, here in Washington, D.C.

I feel that the manifesto typifies and voices the high spiritual level and commitment to human rights which was embodied in the Longest Walk.

The manifesto follows:

AFFIRMATION OF SOVEREIGNTY OF THE INDIGENOUS PEOPLE OF THE WESTERN HEMISPHERE—THE LONGEST WALK MANIFESTO

Chief Joseph, Nez Perce: "Treat all men alike. Give them all the same law. Give them an equal chance to live and grow. All men were created by the same Great Spirit Chief, we are all brothers. We ask to be recognized as men, let me be a free man. Free to travel, free to stop, free to choose my own teachers, free to choose my own religion. Free to act, think and speak for myself, and I will obey every law or submit to the penalty."

We gather together to give a greetings and thanksgiving to all the Creation for its help and support to us during The Longest Walk.

Let us turn our attention to the Sacred Pipe. It is the Pipe that has led us from the western edge of our Turtle Island to the eastern side. The Pipe is the symbol of all Life. The bowl represents all Female Life, in that it comes from our sacred Mother Earth. The stem represents all Male Life, and the joining of the two represents the whole of the Universe and the laws of the Creation.

In the places where we live grows Tobacco, Corn, or other vegetation that has been given to us to act as a communication between the two-leggeds and the great Mystery. At this time we give a greetings and thanksgiving to these beings who aid our communication with the Great Mystery.

Finally, we wish to give a greetings and thanksgiving to the Spirits of the People that have combined to carry forth the beliefs and protection of our People. We recognize that the Great Mystery has provided that Spirit, and that it is part of our instructions to combine our spirits for the good of all Life.

Now, as we stand on the Eastern Shores, we wish to address the People gathered around us.

Grandfather, Great Spirit, you are the Ultimate power which created the Universe and all life within. Grandfather, to many spirits you have given to life on this earth, and to each you instructed on how to live according to your ways.

As I come from the womb of my Mother, the Earth, you gave me life. You have given me the choice of two ways to live—the good way and the bad way, and you have given me a sacred pipe with which to learn from my relatives the wingeds, the two-leggeds, the four leggeds, and those that live in the waters, to walk the good road, which is red.

Grandfather, as I stand before you today, forgive me if I am weak. Today we ask for your mercy.

Grandfather, you have created the Red Man, the Yellow Man, the Black Man, and the White Man. To each you have given a domain and a purpose. Today as the Red stand before the Yellow, the Black and the White, we pray that you may touch their hearts so that they may understand our purpose.

Grandfather, today we remember the countless members of our Red nation who have sacrificed their lives so that we, the coming generations may live to see this day.

Grandfather, today we remember the slaughtered millions of Buffalo, Elk, Deer, Eagle, and all the rest of natural life that you have created and have given purpose.

Grandfather, today we remember our Grandmother, the Earth, who gave us birth and who continues to nurture us, her children. Forgive us if we become weak to allow her exploitation and continued destruction.

Grandfather, today we pray for the coming generations.

Grandfather, today we pray for all the living.

Grandfather, as one Spirit, one Body, and one Voice we send this prayer. Grandfather, hear us today for there may not be a tomorrow for us, the Red Man.

AFFIRMATION OF SOVEREIGNTY OF THE INDIGENOUS PEOPLE OF THE WESTERN HEMISPHERE

We are the sovereign and free children of Mother Earth. Since before human memory, our people have lived on this land. For countless generations, we have lived in harmony with our relatives, the four-leggeds, the winged beings, the beings that swim, and the beings that crawl. For all time our home is from coast to coast; from pole to pole. We are the original people of this hemisphere. The remains of our ancestors and of our many relatives are a greater part of this land than any other's remains. The mountains and the trees are a part of us—we are the flesh of their flesh. We are the Human Beings of many nations, and we still speak many tongues. We have come from the four directions of this Turtle Island. Our feet have traveled our Mother Earth over many thousands of miles. We are the evidence of the Western Hemisphere, the carriers of the original ways of this area of the world, and the protectors of all life on this Turtle Island.

Today we address you in the language of the oppressor, but the concepts predate the coming of the invaders. The injustice we speak of is centuries old, and has been spoken against in many tongues. We are still the original people of this land. We are the people of The Longest Walk.

For many generations we have been seeking justice and peace from the European refugees, and their descendants who have settled on our sacred Turtle Island. It has been an incredibly long struggle. We have entered into many agreements for peace and friendship with the governments of these people, and yet we have received neither peace nor friendship. Most of our original homelands have been illegally taken from us. Our people have been, and continue to be, mercilessly hunted and slaughtered to serve the needs of corporations, governments, and their agents.

Today, the conditions in Central and South America are identical to the conditions in this country during the 19th Century. The process of annihilation and destruction are carried on with money, sophisticated weapons, missionaries, widespread sterilization, so-called developmental programs, CIA and FBI organized training of terrorists and provocateurs that are sponsored and provided by the United States. We can find no other words for the description of these acts other than murder and terrorism. This process is hidden from the peoples of the world by a conscious suppression of information coming from the offending countries.

Our people are often forced to leave their beloved homelands and are sent to lands where they greatly suffer. Our grandfathers and grandmothers were forced to walk many times in front of the guns of the invaders. Today we have been forced to walk, again in front of guns and the threat of destruction that comes from words in legislation.

The guns of today are not held by the Seventh Cavalry but are in the hands of the FBI, the Federal Marshals, and other persons who are supposedly upholding the laws of the United States. These guns and many other sophisticated weapons have been used to continue a campaign of legalized murder, terrorism, torture, mutilation, and oppression of our people. All of these weapons have been used in direct violation of international laws concerning the use of weapons against civilian populations.

Our Mother Earth feeds, clothes, and shelters us, as she does all life, but those who have embraced Western values do not realize the value of the Creation. They are exploiting our Mother Earth and all our relatives who walk and grow with us. This is not right.

For countless generations the cycles of life have been guarded and respected by our people. In the short span of five centuries, the people who invaded these lands have caused an unbelievably massive annihilation of all life forms of the Western Hemisphere. We indigenous people recognize and understand the Natural Balance of these life cycles and assert the right to live within this natural order.

Most of our original homelands have been taken from us. We have been allowed access to only a tiny fraction of the land which remains and it, too, is being destroyed against our will. Our lands hold natural resources that are coveted by huge transnational corporations. These organizations are very powerful. In many ways, the United States government has acted as a direct agent of these organizations.

We know that the present attacks on our lands and sovereignty will, unless halted, ultimately benefit the interest of corporations which seek coal, uranium, water and other parts of our Mother Earth. We understand that the attack on our existence originates with these interests. The land speculators of the last century have been replaced by the oil refineries and the ore processors of this century. The United States government failed to protect our interests against land speculators, who were far less powerful than the transnational corporations we face today. The present day racism against our people is fueled by the organizations, and the denial of our rights will open up our air, water and lands to a ruthless expoitation unparalleled in history. Uncontrolled Western development will destroy our ways of life, and will threaten all life on this Turtle Island.

The Creator gave to us our original instructions, telling us how to walk about on this Earth as protectors and relatives to all life. As long as the sun rises, the grasses grow, and the cycles continue, we are to carry on this duty. Around us a people who act in a way that will bring about the total destruction of all life. The transnational corporations destroy life in the waters, air, and land. Huge trawlers attack our relatives in the sea, giant machineries strip our Mother Earth's skin bare, factories and vehicles fill the sky with tons of poison. The recent rush to use nuclear power poses the most potent threat to ending all life in one generation.

In order to further satisfy the greed of these corporations, members of our communities have been seduced to aid their processes. Our resistance to these processes is strongly oppressed by the United States government, agencies and corporations. Much to our dismay, we find this process being promoted and used against us by the corporations of newly liberated areas. We call for a stop to these practices, and we seek real assistance from liberated people.

Our people gathered together on the western coast of this Turtle Island and discussed actions that could be taken to stop these many threats to the dignity and permanence of Life. It was decided that we should join together and begin this walk across our beloved land, starting at Alcatraz, our symbol of our continuing resistance. It also serves as the symbol of our unity as the original people of this land, and starting from this symbol we decided to bring to the American people, and the people of the world, the message that we are still a People. We carried with us our babies on cradle boards, and the little ones who run about on the Earth. We came with our young men and women, and we came with our elders and wise people. We are carrying with us our spiritual ways, and we have planted our prayers and sacred things all along our journey. We have come to seek justice and to deliver a message to the leaders and the people of the United States and the world. Our journey has indeed been The Longest Walk.

Why are we the only people of this hemisphere whose land and resources can be stripped from us by governmental decree? Formal agreements between our sovereign and separate nations and the occupying governments always become nullified, abrogated or violated and we have no legal recourse or protection from these illegal actions. Only to the indigenous people of this hemisphere does this happen. The oppression of indigenous populations is an automatic characteristic of Western Civilization. The United States' Bureau of Indian Affairs is one prime example of how that oppression becomes an institution of these people.

How do we explain to the American people that we love our Mother Earth and ways of life? How can we state we do not need the United States government to tell us how to be indigenous people? What will it take to convince the U.S. government to allow us to live in peace? How do we convince the U.S. government to simply leave us alone to live according to our ways of life?

The federal system has tried many programs for the so-called improvement of our lives. There have been an endless procession of such programs: the BIA, the Dawes Act, the 1924 Citizenship Act, the 1934 Indian Reorganization Act, the Indian Claims Commission, Termination, Relocation, Self-determination, Housing, and on and on. Our conditions have not improved.

There are those of our people who have been destroyed by words and promises of a better way of life through the American system. The American government chooses to see them as leaders of indigenous people. They form corporations and committees. But a corporation is not a nation!

On many of our territories, we are subjected to governments created under the Indian Reorganization Act of 1934, or the fostering of dissidents who are willing to sell out for an American sanctioned position. The Indian Reorganization Act was created as a part of a long range plan to terminate indigenous nations. The Indian Reorganization Act and other United States policies created governments which supposedly have the power to sell or lease away indigenous lands and resources, but the power is not recognized as a legitimate power by the majority of indigenous people. Those governments were created largely to implement United States policies that are contrary to the beliefs and laws of our people. They were given recognition by the United States government as having power to negotiate away our inherent rights. They were intended to give the appearance that those negotiations possess some legitimacy from the indigenous people. From the beginning these puppet governments have brought the wishes of the federal government to the indigenous people. They have never been able to effectively bring the wishes of the indigenous people to Washington. These governments are the clearest manifestation of federal policy in the indigenous communities. They do not, and cannot, effectively represent the people. They represent a policy which, when advocated by indigenous individuals, presents what can best be described as a kind of self-destruction. The United States government has divided, subdivided and allotted our land, and then directed the most desired parcels to those among us who shift alliances from traditional leaders to government agents. It has then termed much of the remainder of our sacred Mother Earth as excess to give it away to non-Indians.

In order for our people to be happy, healthy, and productive, we must have access to all of our relatives and the self-esteem, respect, affection, and a sense of belonging we receive from them. There are many policies and regulations that remove our many relatives from us. Our relatives in the waters are being removed by millions of sports fishermen and commercial fishing fleets. Our relatives, the four-legged creatures, are being hunted, trapped, slaughtered, driven away, and forced into extinction. Our relatives in the sky are faced with the same problems and have the same threats upon them. This indiscriminate barbarism is beyond the reason of our people. Our people only took the lives of those other beings when it was necessary for our survival and not the mere "sport" of it. Our Grandmother, the Moon, has been molested and a part of her being has been removed.

As we look about us we find it hard to believe that other two-leggeds can act in such a way. Zoos act as reservations for the other members of the Natural World. In every way the process of Western civilization commits a genocide toward all living things. This disruption of the natural cycles cannot continue without serious consequences. As we seek to protect and continue the original instructions of our people, we must now take actions to protect and preserve all those that help to form all the cycles of the Natural World.

Among us we find many people, agencies, and institutions actively removing the young people who run about the Earth. Daily, hundreds of those who are our closest relatives are torn from their communities. The transfer of the children from one group to another is recognized, by international law, as an act of genocide. This mass removal is rationalized in the laws and values of Western civilization, and by not recognizing our traditional institutions and systems. Western civilization can practice assimilation processes that have as their goals the disappearance of our people as a unique way of life. We are here to say that these practices are going to stop.

Our cultures are structured for Human Beings. They are based on principles of respect and responsibility for everyone and everything. The manner in which the people are to live is described to the people through our religious teachings. These religious teachings were given to the Creation by the Creator in order to insure our existence in this world. To remove our children from our communities, and to deny them access to these original instructions leads to the collapse of our families, societies, and nations. It is our commitment to reverse this process and rebuild our country.

We understand that self-esteem derives from the things that people do everyday. Our elder people teach a respect for one another and the respect for all the things of this place, including Mother Earth, the Grasses, the Waters, and the many things which support our lives. We have a high regard for the affection of our people. In our ways, we are taught our relationship to the generations yet unborn, to those who have gone before us, and to our nations of people. We are deeply rooted in the land and our people's roots draw sustenance from our Mother Earth. We, the traditional people, are instructed in the old ways and everyday we still live these instructions.

Everyday we must struggle to protect our right to carry on our way of life. In every way we are met with an interference. Our healing cultures are ridiculed, and laws are passed to keep us in the American healing systems. Laws exist which forbid the practice of our healing cultures.

The occupiers' border defining the settler regimes of Mexico, the United States and Canada divide our territories and peoples. Each of these regions seeks to impose fake identities of being Mexican, American or Canadian. Border policies inhibit the free flow of the members of our nations and break up the cultural continuity and integrity of our peoples. The national laws of these regimes function uniformly in the destruction and exploitation of our peoples. Land laws in Mexico force our people from their lands, and force them northward to seek survival. The immigration laws of the United States deny entrance to the indigenous people coming from Mexico. Yet, these same laws are distorted to allow for a legalized kidnapping of our children from the Canadian area. Throughout the hemisphere, immigration laws have historically been used to bring in large groups of immigrants to further the colonization and destruction of our Mother Earth and People. Since those immigrants are coming to this hemisphere to occupy our lands, we are asserting our right to determine who enters our lands and asserting our right to deport those people who we determine to be illegal aliens.

In our own country the leadership of our people evolves from the natural cycles of the Creation. The quality of leadership is one that is in harmony with the Universe. It is a leadership that genuinely arises from the people, responds to the people, and does not seek to dominate either people or the Natural World. It is a leadership whose vision is constantly trained on the well-being and survival of present and future generations. These are the people who are of The Longest Walk.

It is the common knowledge of many people that the American theories of democracy were derived from indigenous people. Among our people were the inspirations for Franklin, Washington and Jefferson. Today, it is in our minds that the Western people have never escaped the need to have a single king-like figure to be their leader. Throughout the history of the United States, the Western people have always chosen leaders who successfully led the process of genocide against our people and other indigenous people throughout the world.

So we have watched the process of American government, and we are shocked that American leaders have little or no accountability to their people. President Carter has come to office talking strong words about "Human Rights". To us, these words have a hollow ring when applied to our people. We call upon all people of the world to confront President Carter on the question of United States' honor of Human Rights for the indigenous people of this land.

One specific problem of Human Rights violations is the problem of political prisoners in America. Our children are political prisoners of American compulsory education laws. Our women a political prisoners through health practices that force sterilization upon them. Entire communities are political prisoners when our right to protect our communities from violent and destructive forces is ignored.

There can be no amnesty for all the political prisoners of the United States and the Western civilization, for all things—the air, the trees, the four-legged beings, the ones in the oceans, as well as the two-legged beings—are political prisoners. All types of life are prisoners of a political system which has no respect for human or natural rights—a system only interested in protecting corporate financial interests. And at what cost is this done? Survival?

Today, many brothers and sisters from sovereign indigenous nations are being held in prisons as prisoners of war, because they dared to defend their rights given to them by the Creator and acknowledged by treaties made in good faith with the United States government.

We as sovereign indigenous people demand the release of our people from your inhuman jails and behavior modification units. We do not want a "pardon" or "amnesty"—only the complete and total release of our people, for we have committed no crimes. We have only acted in defense to protect the sacred gifts of this Creation and her children. We are under attack and forced into a state of war for our land and resources.

We never had jails. Our leaders had no need of weapons to protect them from their own people, because they truly are servants of the people. But today we see these problems placed upon us. We do not want jails on our lands, nor do we want our people or ways imprisoned within them. No one was meant to live that was and no man has the right to make that decision.

We know and understand how our leaders and warriors have been locked away, as well as murdered to steal the land we live upon, to silence our voices and to destroy our survival. This has been so since your arrival. Your laws were made to protect, not your people, but the greed of the wealthy. So there is no respect in your laws and no justice in your courts. We do not recognize your self-appointed control over our lives and freedom.

As a people we have the right to gather together to give a greeting and thanksgiving to the Creation. We have the right to live in peace and tranquility. We have the right to the fruits of our own lands to feed, shelter and clothe our people. We have a right to conceive and to give birth according to our natural ways. We have the right to educate our children to our ways of life. We have the right to protect ourselves and our lands against abuses and to settle disputes that arise within our own territories. We have the right to clean air, clean water and the peaceful usage of our lands. We have the right to be a people. These are inherent rights. All people possess these rights under the laws of the Universe, as well as man-made laws. These are rights that cannot be given to or denied by one group of people over another. As the traditional people, we recognize and understand that these rights came from the Creator and not by actions of humans.

The United States has claimed to confer U.S. citizenship upon our people. Even that act has been used as a weapon against our people. It may be true that the United States has the power to confer citizenship upon whoever seeks it, but it has no right to deny our citizenship to our own nations. Today it comes to our ears that we are "privileged citizens" and that the treaties should be "abrogated" in order that we may be equal to United States citizens.

We are not United States citizens. We have treaties with the United States, and the U.S. does not make treaties with its own citizens. We protested the 1924 Citizenship Act. We do not claim U.S. citizenship. Nothing the U.S. has done in its relations with us has moved us to change that position.

The indigenous people of the Western Hemisphere are the most oppressed of any people in these lands. Every facet of our lives are regulated and interfered with by the institutions of the people who invaded our territories. In every way the lives of our people are disrupted. The hospitals sterilize our women, the bureaucracies aid in the theft of our lands, resources and waters. But the most outrageous aspect of this oppression is the Western people's fetish for disturbing our ancestors.

In the name of science and academics, the archeologists and other grave robbers roam the countryside eagerly seeking the remains of our people.

To our people, one's passing from this world to the next is as significant as birth. At the time our spirit starts its journey to the Creator's world, we have completed our cycle within the many cycles of the Universe. At that time we balance the many lives it has taken to provide for our continuance.

The passing into the next world and the process of burial are very dignified and sacred events in the lives of our people. But that dignity and sacredness are severely disrupted by the activities of the Western grave robbers among our people, we provide our relatives with the necessities of their journey and return our relatives to the bosom of our Mother Earth dressed in their finest clothes. We place their bodies throughout our lands, and they act as constant reminders of the cycles we live within.

Our ancestors' right to be at peace is not respected by the invaders. In many areas the grave robbers have a free hand to desecrate the resting places of our people. The objects we gave them for their journey and their clothes end up on display in side shows and museums. Further insult is added when such displays are rampant with misinformation about our people. The people of the United States are encouraged to support these outrages through contributions and tax dollars. Daily, thousands of children are herded through these buildings and are taught to believe that these practices are normal and acceptable.

Many of our sacred burial sites have been desecrated by the construction of dams, housing tracts, industries and other land destroying processes of the West. Laws have been passed, forcing our people to follow alien and contradictory burial rites.

All of these practices are genocidal in nature and are heaped upon our people, consequently promoting the destruction of the spiritual health of our people. The original intents are clear. They are part of the Western desire to practice forced assimilation. If this is denied by you, then prove it by taking action to end these practices.

We call upon all museums, collectors and other hobbyists for the return of our sacred items, the remains of our people and items of our material heritage for proper reinterment. We call for the return of those items not taken from graves, but from our people, to be returned for their continued use in our ways of life.

We call for the restoration of all lands illegally removed from our protection. We call for the payment of war reparations due to us, for the reconstruction of our nations.

We call for an end to the confusing situation regarding state and federal jurisdiction, and direct America's attention to our treaties and agreements which define the relationship of our countries.

We call upon organized religion to become allies in the process of liberation, and to stop their competition for our "souls".

We are here to make it clear to the American government and the people of the world that there is only one definition of who we are as a people. That definition arises from our religions, governments and the ways of life that we follow. No one else on the Mother Earth has the right to attempt to define us or our existence.

We feel these are simple things to carry out. If the processes that affect us today are allowed to continue, in thirty or fifty years our nations and communities will be as destroyed as the areas that America occupies. At this time in history, we, as the original people of this hemisphere, are the only ones living in this part of the world left with any direction on how to be a human being in harmony with the Universe. Yet this is the greatest gift we could offer to all humanity.

In closing, the young people of The Longest Walk want our elders to know that we cannot thank you enough for carrying on the traditional ways. If it were not for our elders, we would not be speaking and thinking this way today. We, the young people, want our elders to know that as long as there is breath left in our bodies, that we commit ourselves to never allow your teachings to be forgotten. We commit ourselves to carrying on these peaceful traditional ways.

ADDENDA TO AFFIRMATION OF SOVEREIGNTY OF THE INDIGENOUS PEOPLE OF THE WESTERN HEMISPHERE

The following position paper was adopted by three traditional governments of North American Indians: the Dine (called by the Spanish "Navajo"), the Lakota (known to the English-speaking people as Sioux) and the Haudenosaunee (called by the French "Iroquois", and known to the U.S. as the Six Nations). This is the first position paper ever to be presented in Washington by these three nations. The statement calls on President Carter to meet with the Traditional and Spiritual leaders of the Native people to begin serious negotiations on issues vital to the survival—physical and spiritual—of the Native peoples.

STATEMENT TO THE PEOPLE OF THE UNITED STATES AND THE WORLD, JULY 1978

For countless thousands of years, our people have lived on this continent in peace and tranquility, coexisting with all Natural Life. In the beginning, we were told that the human beings who walk upon the Earth have been provided with all the things necessary for life. We were instructed to carry a love for one another, and to show a great respect for all beings of this Earth. We were shown that our life exists with the tree life, that our well-being depends on the well-being of the vegetable life, that we are close relatives of the four-leggeds. In our way, Spiritual consciousness is the highest form of politics.

Our roots are deep in the lands where we live. We have a great love for our country, for our birthplace is here. The soil is rich from the bones of thousands of our generations. Each of us were created in these lands and it is our duty to take great care of them, because from these lands will spring the future generations of our peoples. We walk about with great respect, for the Earth is a very Sacred Place.

Our traditional governments are truly governments "of the people, by the people, and for the people." All power of authority, at all levels comes from the people and can be withdrawn at anytime if the power is abused or responsibilities not met.

Our traditional governments cannot be adequately compared to the different forms of government that exist around us today. As with all aspects of Native life, our governments have their roots in the religious systems. Leaders are chosen for, among other things, the way they live their lives according to the four main virtues of bravery, fortitude, generosity, and wisdom. They are men who have proven themselves and show commitment to uphold and enforce the Spiritual and Natural Law, and also the laws of the people.

We are a peoples who strongly believe in the cycles of the Universe. Everything is based on concepts of harmony and balance. With the coming of the peoples from the East, this hemisphere has experienced a 486-year conflict between Western Civilization and the Natural World Peoples.

The Western culture has been horribly exploitative and destructive of the Natural World. Over 140 species of birds and animals were utterly destroyed since the European arrival in the Americas, largely because they were unusable in the eyes of the invaders. The forests were levelled, the waters are polluted, our people subjected to genocide. The vast herds of herbivores are reduced to mere handfuls, the Buffalo nearly became extinct. Western technology, and the people who employ it, have been and continue to be, the most amazingly destructive forces in all human history. No natural disaster has ever destroyed as much. Not even the Ice Ages counted as many victims.

Many would like to believe that all of these injustices have ended. This couldn't be further from the truth. Our Native nations entered into hundreds of treaties with the European colonists and with the United States. These treaties recognized the sovereignty of our nations, and guaranteed the lands and resources which belong to our nations.

Our people are the most abused of all peoples in North America. The extreme wrongs which are committed against our people today affect our everyday lives. Under the laws and policies of the United States we do not possess recognition of even the most fundamental rights necessary for our survival. We have no real rights in our lands, no rights to determine our Way of Life, no rights to our economic development. We are not even allowed to protect our communities against unfair actions by any people who choose to invade our homelands. Our lands are leased "for us" by the B.I.A. Our governments are frequently controlled or hindered by the Interior Department. Our rights to exist as communities and nations are not protected and often denied by the courts. We are a horribly oppressed people in our own land. The most basic justice is denied to our peoples, and only to our peoples!

We are the only peoples in North America who own land and resources and who must worry that these things can be taken away from us No one else who owns resources is subjected to an unrelenting fear that the United States government will take those things away—But the Native Peoples must worry about these things.

We are the only people who have formal legal agreements with the United States government, which the United States freely violates without legal liability. It happens to no others. The Constitution of the United States does not allow this to happen to other peoples. Yet, the U.S. claims the legal right to violate and ignore legal treaties made with our nations. Only to our people does this happen.

Our people are often subjected to such extensive bureaucratic control and manipulation that the process amounts to the denial of even the slightest amount of real self-government. Although there are laws and policies that give the appearance of participation in the processes that affect our land and peoples, the reality is that we have no power over the bureaucracies or laws and policies which affect our lives. Indeed, the practices of the United States have the impact of foreign control over our affairs. The official U.S. position states that there exists on our lands a significant measure of self-determination. This is an illusion created to confuse the people of the U.S. and the World. Our peoples possess the least self-determination of any communities in North America.

Only the Native People can be subjected to acts of theft and fraud with no possibility of justice under law. What other people are told that even if a fraudulent, or other illegal act can be proven beyond any doubt, that the courts have no power to correct the wrongs which are committed? Yet, that is the actual practice of the courts. The Political Question Doctrine applied by the courts prevents the courts from questioning fraudulent treaties, prevents the courts from questioning or correcting abusive acts of government relating to our peoples.

What other communities have no right, under law, to pass ordinances to protect their members from the acts of violent and destructive outsiders? What other communities of people in the whole world are denied the right to control the acts of companies and individuals operating on their lands? Yet this is exactly the situation suffered by our peoples in the United States today, right now!

Only our peoples can be driven from their lands without due process of law. Under the U.S. Supreme Court decision in the case of the Tee-Hit-Ton Indians, the United States can, and does, take lands which have been forever the lands of our peoples. They not only take the land, but they assert the power to do so without any compensation, and without due process, and there is no law which protects our peoples from these obvious thefts.

The struggles of our peoples have brought our leaders before the Judicial, Legislative and Executive branches of the U.S. government time after time in futile attempts to find Justice.

The real issues of Sovereignty and Treaty Rights have been consistently submerged to the processes of bureaucratic white-tape. Time after time we have been referred to the Interior Department which has neither the competency nor the power to effectively deal with these issues. We cannot allow these acts to continue if we are to survive as a People.

It seems the basic attitude of the American people and their government towards our peoples is yet one of extreme apathy.

Presently the Human Rights, Rights of Nationhood, Right of Self-Determination and the basic right of existence of our peoples are being actively denied in the United States.

We challenge the President of the United States to take the first step in correcting these wrongs by meeting with the Traditional and Spiritual leaders of our peoples to begin serious negotiations.

The basic issue of Human Rights raised by the President of the United States is hypocrisy and an outrage when viewed in the context of the history and present conditions of our peoples.

It must be pointed out to the American people that the United States and Canada are the two major nations which have not signed the United Nations Universal Declaration of Human Rights of 1948.

The definition of Genocide as stated in Article II of the international Convention on Genocide provides the basis of our peoples charge of Genocide made at the United Nations in Geneva, Switzerland, September 1977.

Article II states: "In the present Convention, genocide means any of the following acts committed with intent to destroy, in whole or in part, a national, ethnical, racial, or religious group, such as:

(a) Killing members of the group;

(b) Causing serious bodily or mental harm to members of the group;

(c) Deliberately inflicting on the group conditions of life calculated to bring about its physical destruction in whole or in part;

(d) Imposing measures intended to prevent births within the group;

(e) Forcibly transferring children of the group to another group."

Many of our young people went across the seas and never returned. We were told that we went to war to fight for our country. Our war casualties under the U.S. flag are greater than any other sector of the North American population. Yet today, our country is threatened by the United States.

United States policy and intelligence agencies have directed illegal military operations against our peoples, such as COINTELPRO. These actions have resulted in the violent deaths of a number of our leaders. The process has not stopped, and we have no protection against these actions. As a result of these actions there are in many United States prisons patriotic Native People who only advocate peace and freedom for their nations.

According to a GAO report issued last year, 24 percent of our women were forcibly sterilized during the period 1971–75.

Nearly 1 out of 3 of our children are being placed in non-Indian foster homes daily, by various county, state and federal agencies.

The Indian Reorganization Act of 1934, continues to destroy the traditional governments of our people, causing widespread disruption of a tranquil Way of Life, and literally pitting brother against brother.

The clearcut policy of genocide of the last century continues in more sohisticated forms in this century.

Our religions have been attacked, and degraded, our children continue to be processed through various forms of Western educational programs. The Spiritual leaders of our nations are now being subjected to the destructive nature of government program monies. Taxpayers monies are being used to regulate the practice of our natural religions. There are even efforts to certify our medicine peoples and to despiritualize the nature of our healing culture. That practice is a policy that is destroying our natural healing practices. It is a policy which is an outrageous attempt to interfere with, and ultimately destroy our natural religion.

Finally, the bills currently before Congress which call for the abrogation of Indian treaties, and termination of our lands, resources, and of genocide to the existence of our peoples is alive and well. The fact that the present Congress of the United States, in the year 1978, can consider such legislation should alarm the people of the United States. When a government denies the human rights of one people, it is only a matter of time before those rights will be denied to all of its peoples.

We call upon the voting public of the United States to seriously consider and question the ethics and morality of their representative leadership in Congress who are responsible for the introduction of dangerous and racist legislation against our peoples.

We call upon the United States to acknowledge its responsibilities under international law to respect Indian treaties, to insure genuine self-determination for our nations, and to correct past wrongs in an honorable and equitable manner.

The traditional people recognize that the injustices perpetuated upon our people, and indeed upon many of the peoples of the world, are the major factor destroying the Spirituality of the Human Race. Peace and unity are the foundations of the Spiritual Way of Life of our peoples. But peace and unity are not companions to injustice.

We call upon all the peoples of the world to join with us in seeking peace, and in seeking to insure survival and justice for all indigenous peoples, for all the Earth's creatures, and all nations of the Earth.

We will take whatever steps necessary in the protection of our Sacred Mother Earth, and the rights and well-being of our peoples.

We will continue our efforts before the World Community to regain our inherent Human and Sovereign Rights.

THE PRINCIPLES OF NATIVE WOMEN FROM INDIGENOUS NATIONS AND PEOPLES OF THE WESTERN HEMISPHERE

Since time began we are the bearers of the unborn generation, with our own instructions in which to conduct ourselves to live in harmony with Mother Earth and Grandmother Moon. We are still fulfilling our duties, even though colonization has been to interfere with our Circle of Life.

We continue to realize that our struggle in this hemisphere is unique. Our land base is guaranteed through international treaties. Our culture and way of life has survived through resistance from foreign domination. Our fight today is to survive as a people. Native women have always been in the front lines in the defense of our nations. Today we are targets of the colonial governments of the western hemisphere, our Native women of the northern part of this Turtle Island need support from all traditional and spiritual leaders. We are born within the womb that held no borders or discrimination.

Our young are being attacked through the racist educational system of governments and churches. Our unborn are attacked through programs of genocide called sterilization. We value our young for they are the very foundation of our future generations. Only by throwing off the yoke of colonization with the strength of our spirituality will we survive as Peoples Nations.

We will work on local, national and international levels to obtain our goals of true liberation and freedom.

Since time began the Native women were all born with equal rights, we share in this Longest Walk, in our search for survival.

We the Native women of this Western Hemisphere will take our place and stand proudly with our sisters and brothers in the world in the common struggle for all basic rights.

POLITICAL PRISONER RELEASE

The historical and present denial of the enforcement of our treaty reserved rights by the Office of the President has created the vacuum under which you have assumed the authority to legislate and regulate our rights. This authority you exercise is unlawfully assumed and acts to deny us that lawful protection of our rights vested in the Office of the President. The unlawful regulation of our internal and external affairs by the Congress and the Courts of the United States is always for the benefit of interests other than our own. Since our politics and law-making has been out of our hands, we as Native peoples, have all been political prisoners in the truest sense of the term. We will now discuss some examples and a way of working out of this intolerable situation.

Leonard Peltier is serving two life sentences in the federal prison at Marion, Illinois. He was convicted in the death of two FBI agents at a shoot-out in Aglala on the Pine Ridge Indian Country. Peltier was part of a peace keeping force there, at the request of the Independent Oglala Nation, the recognized traditional leaders of the Aglala people.

The majority of the Oglala people have been in contention with the federal Tribal Government in that country for control of their political authority and organization since 1973. The tribal government has continued, after the example of the United States armed force at Wounded Knee, to wage war against its opposition through acts of terrorism, which by June of 1975, had resulted in over forty-five murders and thousands of acts of violent and armed aggression against the traditional people of its own tribe. These acts were committed by BIA police and other paid agents of the federal and tribal governments who operated without fear of prosection for their crimes. In fact, it seems that the many FBI agents there to enforce law and order were somehow themselves involved in the atrocities.

It was against this background that the Oglala Lakota were moved to call for brave men to provide protection for their more innocent and helpless. Leonard Peltier is one of those who answered that call and is now a casualty of that strife between those two political bodies.

Peltier was arrested in Canada and extradited to the United States under a treaty between the two countries. It is now a matter of record that the petitions presented by your government was fraudulant, containing falsified affidavits prepared by the FBI which were the basis for his extradition. We have just recently petitioned the Canadian Government to recall Peltier, raising internationally the reality of how your government, through its agents honors your treaty obligations, no matter who you make them with.

Robert Robideau is imprisoned at Leavenworth, Kansas, convicted of charges which arose from his flight to avoid prosecution for the same incident and charges as Peltier. He was eventually charged and tried as a co-defendent of Peltier's, but in separate trials. His defense was able to substantiate his plea of self-defense and he was found not guilty in a jury trial.

Herb Powless imprisoned at Terra Haute, Indiana, was convicted as a felon in possession of fire arms. The charge stemmed from the same political strife that claimed Peltier, and is further unjustifiable in that the governor of the state convicting him as a felon had already granted him a full pardon. Herb was no longer a felon, but he was a strong political leader in his own community. It is for this reason that he is now in prison.

These three are most clear examples of our political prisoners. These are some of our most spirited young men. As we look at it closely, we see that almost all of our families have a brother or sister in prison or being processed through your criminal justice system. Our greatest resources in human energy is being destroyed in your prisons. The loss to their children, their families, and to our nations is disastrous and we must question if this is not by your purposeful design. In any case the effect is the same.

It is in this light that we now say to you that as sovereign nations we have never severed the tribal relations of these men nor have we relinquished our own lawful jurisdiction over them to you or to anyone else. We recognize that the jurisdiction you exercise over our people is a fact of life dependent only on your obvious willingness to totally enforce it. Somehow it has, of late, coerced those of our people empowered by you to represent us into submittal to it, but we are here to tell you that we do not accept it. That in accepting it we could not hope to survive its effect to help annihilate us as a people.

We are here to demand the release of these three patriots and we are establishing a commission to identify our other most obvious political victims in your prisons, and to establish a way to secure the release of all our people from your prisons, and to also establish a way to resume the exercise of our total jurisdiction over all of our own people to the exclusion of your criminal justice system and your other institutions and agencies.

A MANIFESTO FROM THE ALGONQUIN NATION

The following supportive statement grew from the minds of a handful of participants of the Longest Walk representatives of the Great Lakes Area indigenous people. We shall attempt to set forth some examples of our Indian Way of Life, and also show that we concur with our brothers of the Lakota Nation, the Six Nation Confederacy, the Dine Nations, and other Indian Nations as well, in their efforts to seek our own way of life for our people. We also hope to reveal a united interest and support of all traditional peoples everywhere who struggle to maintain their sacred traditions.

The traditions of the Indigenous people are varied and many as there are numerous tribes scattered throughout the Western Hemisphere. But it is these same traditions that have kept alive the spirit of our people and has brought about a new awakening among us to those things which are meaningful to the Indigenous people. Our traditional teachings have also given us the will to outlast the present practices of this government, known as the United States, in their attempts to assimilate us into the mainstream of white America. These scared instructions further enable us to see clearly the vision before us, so we can plan with clarity the future of our unborn.

These old ways are not easy to learn and understand, let alone to live, but attempts are being made by many of our young people to educate themselves in their Indian culture. Survival Schools are springing up rapidly among those of us who live in cities, as well as those who reside on reservations. The language of our old people and various Indian studies programs are being introduced into the curriculum of many such institutions. Our young are taking great pride in learning the old religious teachings of our people and strive to acquire as much as they can during our ceremonial services. As we seek for this knowledge and listen to the voices of our Elders, we shall see changes that will be beneficial for people everywhere.

These changes shall occur at all levels, cultural, physical, spiritual and economic. We must embrace these teachings with our whole being that we might be agents of change throughout this whole country. When the white man realizes he is wrong, and he will, he will need help that only we can provide.

Indigenous people to this land have always been taught to love, honor and respect all living things, as they are considered sacred to him. The Europeans took advantage of these traits and misused us because they saw that we had the one thing he wanted and needed, which was the land, our Sacred Mother. Once the white man realized what he could gain from us, he never ceased in his quest to acquire all he could get. In this way he was also able to control the natural resources of that land. To this day he still has not stopped, but has devised even more sophisticated ways to steal what little we have left of this precious commodity.

Without this land base the Red Man is dead in all ways except for being physically and biologically alive. Attempts to create land bases by some tribes have been met with fierce resistance by the white man, as he too recognized the importance of land. Legislative practices and current legislation tend to lend support, not to the Red Man, but to those who already control most of our Sacred Mother.

We know the meaning of love, honor and respect. This is exemplified in the way we view our world. We do not abuse our Mother, the sacred earth, we don't abuse our four-footed brothers and winged beings, we don't misuse our black, yellow or white brothers. As was stated before, all life is sacred to us. Our religion sustains and supports our Way of Life.

These views and religious practices have not been dealt with in a respectful manner by this present government. They have made so many attempts to repress and suppress us throughout their history. They have not respected one thing of the original people. They desecrate our graves and jail many of our young, and our medicine people as well. Wisconsin, Michigan and Minnesota are just three of the most recent states where outright grave robbing was documented. They take the bones of our ancestors and place them in museums for others to view while they call it history and art. Many of our people who dared fight for us are sitting in prisons today as political prisoners, not to minimize those who gave their lives freely for the protection of the traditional "Way of Life". When will all of this disrespect for our ways and our people come to an end?

The only thing the white man wanted from the Indian was the land he saw us living on. Now he has desecrated that and little remains for him to seize. We have a small amount of land left, and what we have we must keep for our children and those who follow. As has been stated above, a land base is desperately needed for us to survive. We are of our Sacred Mother Earth, we were made for our mother and we must do all in our power to obtain more of her and keep all we have left.

The United States Government made treaties with us which they have not kept. They have broken their promises to us so many times it is burdensome for us to remember. We signed those treaties with the utmost good faith, but soon realized they were not sincere. In spite of this we continued to attempt to live in harmony with them. We still desire to live in peace, if at all possible, but time and patience is running out for us. Our human rights have been violated repeatedly, as our children are being certified at age 13 to stand trial as adults for crimes they allegedly commit. Indian children are being placed in white foster homes by the score, separated from their loved ones and completely torn away from their cultural teachings. Indian women are being sterilized without their knowledge or consent. The list of injustices could go on and on.

But something is happening among us. A prophecy is being fulfilled. Our songs have become greater, our drums louder, our unity has been foretold, because the prophecies of our old people are in complete harmony with our Way of Life.

Time is fast drawing to a close when the white invader shall stand in judgement for what has been done to all those he has held in oppression. We are a strong people made stronger by all we have had to endure. We shall continue to grow stronger as our songs get louder and our culture is again reawakened.

We cannot add more to what has been so ably stated by our brothers from other nations, except to pledge our undying support. We cherish the Indian Way of Life, like many of those who came on this long walk for freedom and justice for our people.

Many of those who came on this walk are still young in years and in our culture. As young people, we want to let the elders among us know that we cannot thank them enough for carrying on the old ways of our nations. If not for them we could not carry out the original instructions that were given to us by the Creator. We wouldn't even be speaking in this manner today with the pride of our teachings. As long as there is breath left in our bodies, we intend to carry on those traditional instructions we have learned, nor will we allow them to ever die out among us.

The United States of America has continually violated the independent Native people of this continent by Executive Action, Legislative fiat and Judicial decision. By its actions, the U.S. has denied all Native people their International Treaty rights, Treaty lands and basic human rights of freedom and sovereignty. This same U.S. government which fought to throw off the yoke of oppression and gain its own independence, has now reversed its role and become the oppressor of sovereign Native people.

Might does not make right. Sovereign people of varying cultures have the absolute right to live in harmony with Mother Earth so long as they do not infringe upon this same right of other people. The denial of this right must be challenged by truth and action. World concern must focus on all colonial governments to the end that sovereign people everywhere shall live as they choose, in peace with dignity and freedom.

The International Indian Treaty Conference hereby adopts this Declaration of Continuing Independence of the Sovereign Native American Indian Nations. In the course of these human events, we call upon the people of the world to support this struggle for our sovereign rights and our treaty rights. We pledge our assistance to all other sovereign people who seek their own independence.

Preamble to: Declaration of Continuing Independence by the First International Indian Treaty Council at Standing Rock Sioux Indian Country, (June 8, 1974).

DECLARATION OF PRINCIPLES FOR THE DEFENSE OF THE INDIGENOUS NATIONS AND PEOPLES OF THE WESTERN HEMISPHERE

PREAMBLE

Having considered the problems relating to the activities of the United Nations for the promotion and encourageemnt of respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms,

Noting that the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and related international covenants have the individual as their primary concern, and

Recognizing that individuals are the foundation of cultures, societies, and nations, and

Whereas, it is a fundamental right of any individual to practice and perpetuate the cultures, societies and nations into which they are born, and

Recognizing that conditions are imposed upon peoples that suppress, deny or destroy the culture, societies or nations in which they believe or of which they are members,

Be it affirmed that,

1. RECOGNITION OF INDIGENOUS NATIONS

Indigenous peoples shall be accorded recognition as nations, and proper subjects of international law, provided the people concerned desire to be recognized as a nation and meet the fundamental requirements of nationhood, namely:

(a) Having a permanent population
(b) Having a defined territory
(c) Having a government
(d) Having the ability to enter into relations with other states

2. SUBJECTS OF INTERNATIONAL LAW

Indigenous groups not meeting the requirements of nationhood are hereby declared to be subjects of international law and are entitled to the protection of this Declaration, provided they are identifiable groups having bonds of language, heritage, tradition, or other common identity.

3. GUARANTEE OF RIGHTS

No indigenous nation or group shall be deemed to have fewer rights, or lesser status for the sole reason that the nation or group has not entered into recorded treaties or agreements with any state.

4. ACCORDANCE OF INDEPENDENCE

Indigenous nations or groups shall be accorded such degree of independence as they may desire in accordance with international law.

5. TREATIES AND AGREEMENTS

Treaties and other agreements entered into by indigenous nations or groups with other states, whether denominated as treaties or otherwise, shall be recognized and applied in the same manner and according to the same international laws and principles as the treaties and agreements entered into by other states.

6. ABROGATION OF TREATIES AND OTHER RIGHTS

Treaties and agreements made with Indigenous nations or groups shall not be subject to unilateral abrogation. In no event may the municipal laws of any state serve as a defense to the failure to adhere to and perform the terms of treaties and agreements made with indigenous nations or groups. Nor shall any state refuse to recognize and adhere to treaties or other agreements due to changed circumstances where the change in circumstances has been substantially caused by the state asserting that such change has occurred.

7. JURISDICTION

No state shall assert or claim to exercise any right of jurisdiction over and indigenous nation or group or the territory of such indigenous nation or group unless pursuant to a valid treaty or other agreement freely made with the lawful representatives of the indigenous nation or group concerned. All actions on the part of any state which derogate from the indigenous nations' or groups' right to exercise self-determination shall be the proper concern of existing international bodies.

8. CLAIMS TO TERRITORY

No state shall claim or retain, by right of discovery or otherwise, the territories of an indigenous nation or group, except such lands as may have been lawfully acquired by valid treaty or other cessation freely made.

9. SETTLEMENT OF DISPUTES

All states in the Western Hemisprere shall establish through negotiations or other appropriate means a procedure for the binding settlement of disputes, claims or other matters relating to indigenous nations or groups. Such procedures shall be mutually acceptable to the parties, fundamentally fair, and consistent with international law. All procedures presently in existence which do not have the endorsement of the indigenous nations or groups concerned, shall be ended, and new procedures shall be instituted consistent with this Declaration.

10. NATIONAL AND CULTURAL INTEGRITY

It shall be unlawful for any state to take or permit any action or course of conduct with respect to an indigenous nation or group which will directly or indirectly result in the destruction or disintegration of such indigenous nation or group or otherwise threaten the national or cultural integrity of such nation or group, including, but not limited to, the imposition and support of illegitimate governments and the introduction of non-indigenous religions to indigenous peoples by non-indigenous missionaries.

11. ENVIRONMENTAL PROTECTION

It shall be unlawful for any state to make or permit any action or course of conduct with respect to the territories of an indigenous nation or group which will directly or indirectly result in the destruction or deterioration of an indigenous nation or group through the effects of pollution of earth, air, water, or which in any way depletes, displaces or destroys any natural resource or other resources under the dominion of, or vital to the livelihood of an indigenous nation or group.

12. INDIGENOUS MEMBERSHIP

No state, through legislation, regulation, or other means, shall take actions that interfere with the sovereign power of an indigenous nation or group to determine its own membership.

13. CONCLUSION

All of the rights and obligations declared herein shall be in addition to all rights and obligations existing under international law.

TESTIMONY OF CAMBODIAN PEOPLE

(Mr. ANDERSON of Illinois asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.)

Mr. ANDERSON of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, like many Members, I have read with horror the continuing press reports on the plight of the people of Cambodia since April 1975. The magnitude of the atrocities conducted by the Khmer Rouge since they took power is difficult for a free and peaceful nation to comprehend.

As I advised Members in a letter yesterday, I have obtained copies of interviews with Cambodian refugees who arrived in Thailand after October 1977, conducted by U.S. foreign services officers, and extracts of earlier reports by the U.S. Embassy in Bangkok on conditions in Cambodia from 1975 to 1977. These are a portion of the materials provided by the U.S. Mission to the United Nations to the U.N. Division on Human Rights on July 6, 1978.

Today I am beginning the submission of some of these documents into the RECORD. I plan to continue these submissions in the days to follow because I believe it is important for us in Congress to continue to bear witness to the terrible sufferings of the Cambodian people, particularly in light of the fact that most of the major international bodies concerned with the violation of human rights have failed to firmly condemn the perpetrators of this holocaust for almost 3 years now.

The first of these materials follows:

INTERVIEW WITH CAMBODIAN REFUGEE IN SURIN, THAILAND CONDUCTED BY AMERICAN EMBASSY OFFICER IN JUNE, 1978

(Account of Sen Chul—Refugee agreed to use of his name in public document)

Sen Chul, 27, came from Koukmon village, Ampil District, Oddar Meanchey Province. He studied eleven years and attended college at Samrong one year, where he received a diploma. He was in Samrong when the Khmer Rouge took over and subsequently returned home to Koukmon. After the takeover, the Khmer Rouge held mass meetings in which everyone was told to identify himself. Chul admitted that he was a student. Chul arrived in Thailand in February, 1978.

Conditions of Living in Democratic Kampuchea. "Life was better in Koukmon than in other places. In the mobile youth group in which I worked, we had enough to eat. We had plenty of rice but no fish or meat. In the village, where my family lived, and I lived with my wife after we got married, food was also adequate but limited to rice. The crop was better this year than last year when we had a drought.

"We were issued one set of clothes when we could no longer mend the ones we had been wearing. For those who worked hard, the clothes wore out in about four months. To get a new set, you had to present concrete evidence that your present ones were worn out. This was easy since they were usually rags. We got one scarf and a set of black pajamas.

"We worked from 0400 to 1100, 1300 to 1700 and 1900 to 2200 each day since 1975.

"I was with the mobile youth until 1976 when I got married. After that I moved to the village and worked as a farmer. Once or twice a year we had a 'mating period.' For two days, while also working, young men and young women were allowed to talk with each other. Except during the mating period, young men and women were not allowed to talk with each other, day or night, except for talk about developing the country. If the Khmer Rouge knew that you had violated this 'ethics code' you would both be executed immediately. I knew of about twenty young men and women caught flirting, who were executed. No romantic chitchat is allowed. After the two day mating period, you report to the authorities that you have found a suitable partner. Aside from the mating period, you cannot tell a girl that you like her. You must go to the village chief and tell him. If you tell her directly, you will be killed. In either case, if the chief agrees, you must wait until the mass marriages are held about every six months at the same time as the mating season.

"Girls have no right to refuse. Even if the man is crippled, had one hand, or is ugly, the girl must accept. She is summoned and told that she must marry. If she refuses, she will be executed. In some cases, she and her family are told that they must be 'relocated' far away. In 1976 about fifteen families of girls who refused to marry were relocated. But, in fact, the Khmer Rouge escorts returned the next day with all their clothes and distributed them to others. Everyone thought that the families were executed. Being 'relocated' frequently means being executed."

Executions. "The Khmer Rouge have executed all the former soldiers and government officials they can identify. They also forcibly relocated the families of former soldiers. I knew of about fifty families of former soldiers who were sent to the northern district, but everyone thinks they were also executed.

"In 1978, the Khmer Rouge started executing former students, former members of village defense forces, or former militiamen. They started with the leaders and with those who studied to higher grades. In January and February, about twenty students, who had studied five years or more and had then been assigned to the mobile youth, and about thirty former militiamen were executed. I know of thirteen young men, some of whom were my friends, who were killed. The Khmer Rouge tied their hands behind them and took them to the forest. The next day I saw 13 fresh mounds. No one knew of any reason why they would have been killed except that they were former students.

"The worst crime is criticizing the way people are being treated and administered. If you do so, the Khmer Rouge say, 'you are a bad element' and 'do not support Angka'. If they want to kill anyone, the Khmer Rouge merely say, 'you are supporting the enemy' or 'you are a spy.' These are only pretexts. These charges are made either before you are executed or afterward. Before killing students, there were usually no meeting. The Khmer Rouge would just round up ten or so and take them away.

"I had two cousins killed in 1978. They were Chhum Bu, about 50, and Sin Sok, about 45. After they were executed, their families were also executed. There were about 60 families 'relocated' since 1975."

Human, Civil and Poiltical Rights. "There are no rights or freedoms in Cambodia. The Khmer Rouge have clamped down on every facet of life. The central government's policy is to exterminate all the old people to have a new generation of Cambodians who have never known a good life. Their policy can be compared to burning a field of grass so that new grass can replace the old. They are succeeding very well because they are killing everybody."

INTERVIEW WITH CAMBODIAN REFUGEE IN BURIRAM, THAILAND, CONDUCTED BY AN AMERICAN EMBASSY OFFICER IN JUNE 1978

(Account of Source H—The name of the individual refugee who provided this account has been excised to protect the identity of family members or friends still in Cambodia)

Source H, 25, from Battambang was a student until the Khmer Rouge victory in April 1975. Afterward he became a farmer. He escaped to Thailand on May 16, 1978. His account follows:

Conditions of Life in Democratic Kampuchea.—"We had 300 grams of rice a day for three people from 1975 to 1978. There was no change in the ration. There were only herbal medicines, and people were frequently sick with dysentery and beriberi.

"We worked each day from 0500 to 1200, 1230 to 1800, and occasionally, from 1900 to 2200. If there was no work, I slept. There was nothing else to do and I was very tired. There were about 1,000 people at first in the village. I ate with 150 of them. By 1978 there were fewer than 500 people left in the village. Eighty percent of the dead had died by assassination and twenty percent of disease. Most of those assassinated were former officials. I personally saw about sixty soldiers loaded on a truck in 1975 and hauled off to be killed. The driver of the truck, named Nieng, later told me that they had been killed. Gradually, former students and teachers were also killed. The Khmer Rouge did not know that I was a student. Three days before I fled to Thailand, I found out from a spy (chhlop) that I had been identified and would be killed.

"My younger brother was killed for being late three times to work, fifteen or twenty minutes. They carried him away. My father saw him killed and told me. He was 16.

"For minor faults, you would be warned. The second time you would be warned and either killed at home or taken away to the forest.

"You could not criticize or suggest anything or even speak to the village chief. Any criticism of the regime meant immediate death."

Human Rights.—"There is no such thing as human rights or justice in Cambodia. There is only facism, and death, without pity."

MARCH 31, 1977.

LIFE IN CAMBODIA

INTRODUCTION AND SUMMARY

They've done terrible things to us. You know, we Cambodians have always been an easy-going people. They've changed that completely. They've gotten rid of all of our traditions. No one is any longer allowed to do our graceful dance, the ramwong. Now, the only dances are 'revolutionary' dances. We no longer have our religion. They even change our language, using many strange words. We are no longer allowed to greet one another in our old manner. Now, we either use a stiff Chinese handshake or ask from a distance, 'How are you, comrade?' Everyone has to wear black clothing. These people (the Khmer communists—KC) are not civilized.—Recently arrived refugee.

Cambodians fleeing their country continue to speak of a very harsh life and work regimen, some executions, a general air of fear and uncaring and illiterate KC. As much as the daily rigors and dangers, however, there is often a much deeper sense of alienation or inner hostility caused by the Cambodian Communists' complete disregard for all that the Cambodian people traditionally cherished, features which differentiated them from other peoples. The refugee's statement quoted above was made in a tone which can only be described as deeply sorrowful.

The Cambodian regime is pursuing total revolution whose end is difficult to foresee—provided the present leadership can continue to maintain both its grip on the country as well as its present fervor. If pursued to its conclusion, the result will be something quite unique in human experience. The Cambodian people involved in it are considered, sadly, as objects of relatively little real value, despite the fact that, in theory, the revolution is being waged in their name.

As we do every several months, the Embassy submits another wrapup on life in Cambodia, this one based upon interviews conducted with refugees since the beginning of 1977. There is considerable similarity to these surveys. Cambodia is now one large work project, and refugee comments—based upon their knowledge of one very small area limited to a few square kilometers of the country—serve only to confirm what we have been hearing for almost two years already and to provide some detail about specific conditions in one locality or another.

ORGANIZATION

Diversity in Village/Cooperatives. The movement of population in Cambodia appears to have ceased. One refugee recounted having been moved eight times since the takeover, observing that things have more or less now "settled down". The desired number of persons comprising a cooperative would appear to be 1,000. Except for totally new villages, most others in Cambodia are of greatly varying sizes. Sometimes the effort is made to have them adhere to theory by declaring a small village a small village cooperative (sahakoo toic) and joining it with another or even all those within a commune to make a large cooperative (sahakoo thom).

We continue to hear of a number of examples in the north and northwest where families living in GKR-held areas during the war years have been placed in villages long under KC control. In one instance, each "new" family was housed with an "old" family in a Siem Reap village so that the old could keep watch over the newer arrivals. In Thmar Pouk district of Battambang province, 200 new villagers were placed in a KC village of 300 persons. The total constituted a village/cooperative, but each element lived in its half of the village and worked separately. In living and working, the old villagers supervised the new; there was little social mixings. The new residents accused the old ones of eating better and of not being nice, although they also believed the long-time residents were not much happier than they with their lot.

Local Administration. Many local authorities continue to be military personnel. An ex-KC soldier heads a long-time KC village in Kompong Thom province, appointing other members of the village committee from among local residents. In a similar village in Siem Reap province, the president and vice-president of the village committee are active military, with the third member (for economic affairs) a long-time resident. In a new village in Oddar Meanchey province, a KC civilian is in charge, selecting an old man as his deputy and intermediary with the people.

Higher Administration. No refugees with whom we have spoken this year had seen anyone visit his village from the central level. Indeed, a doctor from Preah Net Preah (Battambang) said one finds the KC themselves know little more than the names of the most prominent members of the central leadership. At most a rare refugee will have heard of the regional level (phumpheak or pheak). The northern region, headquartered in the town of Siem Reap and consisting of the sectors of Oddar Meanchey, Siem Reap, Preah Vihear, and Kompong Thom, is headed by an unidentified middle-aged military man who formerly commanded a battalion. When he visited a village in Oddar Meanchey, he was wearing black pajamas.

Somewhere above the village level, probably at sector or district, cadres (kamaphibal)—both military and civilian—seem to be attached. A pilot who arrived in Thailand in late November from an area to the east of Samrong said that these cadres would visit his village "only once in awhile". Wearing Chinese or American pistols, which are marks of importance, they would work briefly with the people to demonstrate solidarity and deliver lectures on the need to work.

People's Representative Assembly. Several persons described the voting farce of March 20, 1976, in which they theoretically chose their representative in the PRA. In a village in eastern Oddar Meanchey, no one voted, nor did the residents ever see the man chosen as their representative, knowing only that he is concurrently the Oddar Meanchey sector chief, called locally Mit Hien. In Preah Net Preah, everyone was given a name they did not know and told to vote for him.

Travel. Travel passes are issued only for a good reason. It is rare that one can obtain authorization to go farther than the next village a couple of kilometers away. It is no longer possible to forge passes easily, since the KC have evolved to the rubber stamp level of bureaucratic sophistication.

THE LIFE

With communal working and living the rule, virtually all discernible vestigas of traditional Cambodian life have been eliminated. A vilage scene is very drab. No colors other than black may be worn, the KC observing that that color hides the dirt better. Men must wear pants instead of the traditional sarong, which is now worn only by women. The previously indispensable astrologer is no longer allowed to practice. There have been a large number of changes in the language, even for a word such as "eat". There are no monks ("parasites", according to the KC) except in one place of which we have heard: Samrong. The refugee who had formerly been a pilot and who did not live too far away from there claimed that eight monks have been permitted to remain in a wat, perhaps for display purposes. The monks are required to grow their own food, but occasionally elderly people from his village are permitted to travel there to offer them fruit. Otherwise, there are only "lots" of soldiers and some civilians who are working with the KC living in Samrong.

Food. The rule in present-day Cambodia appears to be to provide a person thin rice gruel twice a day. Two persons or more may share one milk tin of it. People try to supplement this with pieces of waterplant, banana, or manioc. Exceptionally, a person may receive a plate of rice; one wonders whether this depends upon the whim of the local leader as much as supply. The most extreme example of which we have heard was in the case of the pilot mentioned above. After the harvest was completed in early 1976, the people in his village received rice to eat for the next 2–3 months. His village is the exception an another way, as well, for the people sometimes receive meat, particularly as a reward for a good harvest. Generally around Cambodia after the harvest, authorities store in nearby vats or the like at most only that portion of the production considered sufficient to meet the people's needs.

Two refugees from Siem Reap reported never having any meat to eat. However, an arrangement was worked out whereby the people made fishing poles and nets for the KC, who fished while the people worked. At the end of the day the KC would divide up the fiish, part for the 500 people and part for themselves. Each villager received only a small portion, of course, but it was something. It was the periods when there was no salt which were the most difficult; after a time there would be swelling of limbs and sometimes death as a result. In Oddar Meanchey, a person now receives a kilogram of salt every three months, coming from Kampot. In that respect, the situation is said to be much better than it was a year ago.

Disease. As we have been reporting for some time, there is agreement among refugees that deaths due to a combination of disease, malnutrition, and general exhaustion and weakness were greater in 1976 than during the previous year. Among diseases, malaria and its complications remain the big killer. New refugees from both Siem Reap and Kompong Thom reported cholera last year. One of them who almost died from it himself noted that a village close to his in Kompong Thom was virtually wiped out by the disease in May. There remains an extremely low birth rate and a high mortality rate of children and their mothers.

THE WORK

Continuing to work seven days a week, without a break, the population of Cambodia has passed from harvesting the rice to, once again, building irrigation canals and dams. Phnom Penh radio broadcasts are now devoted almost exclusively to reports on ongoing work designed to control and distribute water in various parts of the country.

The Cooperative. All work is performed under the aegis of the cooperative, which often receives its orders from the village or commune's economic chief. One village/cooperative of 1,000 persons in Oddar Meanchey is organized as follows, from its smallest to largest unit: (A) the basic element is the squad (krom) of 12 persons of the same sex, which can be further divided into units (pouk) of 3–5 persons, depending upon the work to be done; (B) three squads comprise a platoon (kong toic) of 36 persons; (C) three platoons make up a company (kong thom); three companies comprise a battalion (viareah, in current KC terminology); and three battalions comprise a regiment (kong pia) which is equal to a cooperative. In view of the essentially military nature of Cambodia's leadership and organization, it should come as no surprise that cooperatives are also run along military lines.

Divisions by Age. In northern and northwestern Cambodia (and most likely throughout the country), persons are separated by age for work purposes, and further separated by sex. Adults constitute the main work force, of course, sometimes camping out in a field and returning to the village after a month. Young children usually remain in the village during the day. Cambodians from Ampil district in western Oddar Meanchey complained that parents are told that their children will be cared for in their absence but, in reality, that has not been the case. In the eastern part of the province, small children tag along with the women when they go out to work.

Children between the ages of 5 and 12 are often taken away to an area somewhat removed from the village to live together, work on small handicraft projects or carry night soil to adults working in a field, and receive some indoctrination but little real education. In those cases where the children are not permitted to return to the village, their mothers can often take things to them and reassure themselves that their children are still alive. In others, even if the children are assigned to help in the same field as their parents, they can neither eat with them nor, at night, sleep with them. The KC will choose one pliable child from among each group and name him president.

It is particularly the teenagers and young unmarrieds who are the objects of special attention throughout most, and perhaps all, of Cambodia. Beginning at ages 13, 14, or 15, members of this age group are generally separated completely from other family members. Removed physically to another area, they may come under commune or other direction, rather than that of the village. They are placed in special camps of 4,500 to 1,000 persons, scattered around a province. In all cases, they constitute a special mobile work force which labors in distant areas to perform such hard work as making new rice fields or felling timber. They may remain at a site for a month before being permitted to visit their families, if they are even permitted to do so. One refugee claimed that these youths are objects of special lessons on communism. In their special role in or out of the cooperative, the teenagers are divided into platoons, etc. It is thought that, as a separate force, they can be trained quickly to act as a military unit should there be a need for soldiers. In each group of these teenagers (known as kong chhlat or, literally, the group of intelligent ones), the KC also designate a person who appears pliable as the president.

Pregnant women work hard for seven months. Then, depending upon the situation, they may be allowed to remain in the village, perhaps working there or caring for young children, until two months after they give birth, when they must return to the fields. Also remaining in the village with tasks to carry out are the elderly.

Variety of Work. The KC sometimes describe the country's general economic plan to the people. It calls for increased production of rice which Cambodia will sell abroad, in exchange for which it will purchase equipment to open more factories to produce more items, such as clothes, for the people. In the pilot's village near Samrong, the KC had the people attempt to grow three crops of rice last year. There was generally sufficient water available in the area, and people found themselves in the unique position—for Cambodia—of harvesting and planting rice at the same time. Although the effort was not notably successful, the KC told the people that they fully intended to produce three good crops there during the course of 1977.

An increasing number of refugees describe working in the fields on other crops in and out of the rice growing season. Cotton, manioc, bananas, and corn and other vegetables are being planted. Once this is done, the KC have the people leave the crops alone until they are ready for harvesting. The KC may allow the people to retain some of the output, with the KC keeping the remainder or send it away. In one village in Thmar Pouk district, a craft "guild" consisting of several persons who know how to weave is designated to take the large amount of cotton produced there and make clothing. Those villagers in need of clothes receive them, and the remainder are shipped to an unknown destination.

The refugees from Siem Reap described 1976. The year was one of digging and building irrigation works and of planting. A month before the rice harvest began in November, everyone was in the fields planting cauliflower and other vegetables. Then came harvest time, and the entire population of the village was sent to the rice fields. In their space time, people were making farm implements and fishing poles. Indeed, another person said it is this type of thing, bamboo dishes, or vessels for carrying water, to which the KC are referring when they use the word "handicrafts" on the radio.

Finally, livestock raising is also receiving emphasis. One has the impression that the number of working animals is increasing after a dismal beginning in 1975. When a village is considered to have an excess of buffalo or cattle, these are shared with other villages.

GOVERNMENT SERVICES

Health. A Cambodian doctor who arrived in Surin from Preah Net Preah noted that most KC medics are women. He claimed that they received no training and tried to treat malaria, beriberi, or cholera with such fluids as coconut milk and Pepsi (sic). He himself was not allowed to practice because he was not a revolutionary.

In most places, medicines other than the natural kinds are simply not available except, at most to the KC. The pilot said that some Chinese-produced medicines and some of other origins would reach his village from time to time. Limited in its variety, there was occasionally some aspirin or chloroquin, which was better than nothing. Sadly, people were generally forced to return to work before they had recovered from their illnesses. A person seriously ill could apply to a village official to be treated in a hospital located in a private house in Samrong. Some medicine was available there.

Education. We have heard few recent accounts of formal education other than teaching children revolutionary songs. No one heard of any effort at conducting a literacy campaign among adults.

Provision of Goods. We have noted how clothing was distributed in a village, some of whose inhabitants had weaving skills. In some villages, it seems to be the rule that each person will receive one new set of clothing per year. Black cloth thought to be of Chinese origin was made into clothing and has apparently been distributed in several provinces during the past year. If a villager wants shoes, he can obtain them only by making them himself.

Information. Although there still seem to be some areas where people are not allowed to listen to any radios, it is more generally true that arrangements are made for people to listen on a community set, those belonging to the KC, or even on their own sets. In Oddar Meanchey, the pilot reported that those having them are permitted to bring them out into the open and tune in to the Cambodian services of either Laos (sic), the People's Republic of China, Viet-Nam, or Phnom Penh. His village also had loudspeakers over which Radio Phnom Penh broadcasts were diffused. An item banned from use there, however, were radio/tape recorders, the KC fearing that persons may play tapes containing pre-liberation songs.

Despite frequent fear that one risks one's life by showing signs of being educated by reading, persons report occasionally having looked at a KC publication. Recent refugees said they saw two items: (A) a four-page printed monthly (possibly weekly) newspaper, and (B) a thirty-page monthly magazine containing some color photographs showing peasants planting rice, etc. The message in both is always the same, i.e., the need to work hard.

CONTROL OF THE POPULATION

The Military. Little is really known of the KC military organization. There is dispute over whether the wearer of green fatigues is different from the wearer of black pajamas; this writer believes there is no difference between the two. There is controversy over the extent of new recruitment of soldiers; many refugees have heard of no recruitment at all in their areas. It is really not known whether soldiers guarding a village are of a different element than those attached to much higher levels of the government; some knowledgeable refugees are convinced that they belong to the same unit despite their being assigned to different levels or carrying out different tasks. Distinction in rank or importance on any level seems to be indicated by whether one has a pistol or not.

Soldiers are concentrated particularly around the border with Thailand (and, presumably, Viet-Nam), frequently a deterrent to men taking the risk and fleeing the country with their wives and children. It is said that it is the concentration of forces on the border of Preah Vihear province (not to mention the rugged terrain) which accounts for the fact that almost no refugees arrive from that neighboring area into Thailand.

Troop presence in villages continues to vary considerably from a complete absence of soldiers to ten or twenty, a combination of old and very young ones. A village 37 kilometers from Thailand in Thmar Pouk district has only one KC soldier, a man with a Khmer Krom accent of southern Viet-Nam, who is in charge of the village. The dozen refugees from there who arrived in Thailand at the beginning of February said they "feared" that KC patrolled the area around the village at night, however. Indeed, reports of a number of refugees suggest that KC often use mobile patrols rather than station troops permanently in an area, a practice which would seem to be logical in view of their limited manpower.

Refugees agree that there is considerable corruption among local KC. Everything can be traded for favors, but it is a dangerous game, for the KC soldier may not necessarily keep his part of the bargain.

Executions. The answer to the riddle of KC control remains, of course, the maintenance of an atmosphere of fear. People continue to disappear often enough to keep the remainder of the population on edge and in line, whether or not there is a soldier physically present. Most refugee accounts continue to support the conclusion that the number of executions is now lower than during the first ten months or so after the takeover. Some twenty-two Cambodians who fled Ampil district in early January 1977, cited the case of one person who was led away from their village and of two others from an adjacent village three weeks earlier. All three were marked for execution, they thought, not because of their past records (which, of course, still mean the difference between life and death, if they are discovered) but because the KC judged that they "lacked respect," a term which covers complainers, the lazy, etc. The pilot fled when he was warned that he was to be executed as an educated person the following day. The last executions in his village had been of two persons fifteen days earlier, caught while trying to escape.

The last executions of which the former soldiers who escaped from Siem Reap province in January were aware of three friends caught while attempting to escape six months earlier. The entire village was forced to assemble to watch the three being beaten to death. Generally, the only former government soldiers above the lowest ranks still alive are those who have successfully hidden their backgrounds.

The pilot noted that those who are led away from a village are told that they are going to Angka, the organization. Later, their bodies are found in the forest or in shallow graves in the ground. Typically, their hands are still tied behind their backs, their corpses showing signs that they were killed with blows from hoe handles and axes. Because he was sometimes used as a messenger, he had occasion to pass by the end of the runway at Samrong. This spot, where no people live, is a favored place in Oddar Meanchey for executions. Persons from Siem Reap province described two similarly favorite spots there, one being at the Chikreang district town. Those who do the killing in Cambodia may be either KC located in the village of the victim or KC at a base camp. The doctor from Preah Net Preah told his captors he was formerly a hospital guard; he claimed that doctors or teachers were executed for minor offenses, such as listening to the radio.

Prison. Asked whether, if one has done something wrong, he is imprisoned, some refugees declare adamantly that there are no prisons in their areas, that a "wrong" is redressed only by beating the person concerned to death on the back of the neck. Elsewhere, however, prisons are reportedly located in the towns of Samrong and Siem Reap. Persons caught while trying to escape are sometimes placed in them prior to execution at one of the principal execution spots.

One of the sadder features of Cambodia today is that having a "love affair" is considered to be a crime. One of the refugees from Siem Reap recalled a friend who was discovered having intercourse. The KC beat him to death while forcing his girlfriend to watch. The same source said that a man and a woman in his village were discovered in late December to be having an affair. As this is strictly forbidden, the man was imprisoned and given no food while the woman was allowed to go free. Generally speaking, the man dies in jail, but if he does not, he is released after a time and returned to work.

Special Camps. On rare occasions, we continue to hear of special work/concentration or re-education camps exisitng in Cambodia, although it is not clear why, in view of their readiness to execute, the KC even bother. A reporter recently met three men who had been in a hard labor camp for former officers in the Kampot area until they escaped in December. The object seemed to be to work the inmates to death, although most had already been executed by the time the sources heard they were going to be, as well, and fled. The cooperative from which the doctor came in Preah Net Preah consisted only of former health and teaching personnel. Theirs was one of a series of small cooperatives for persons in these professions. They spent three days studying communism, then went to work in the fields. The families of some were permitted to join them later.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. HANSEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks preceding the vote on the second Long of Maryland amendment to the bill, H.R. 12157.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Idaho?

There was no objection.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

(By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows to:)

Mr. RODINO (at the request of Mr. WRIGHT), for today, on account of illness in the family.

Mr. ADDABBO, after 2:30 p.m. today and for July 28, on account of official business.

SPECIAL ORDERS GRANTED

By unanimous consent, permission to address the House, following the legislative program and any special orders heretofore entered, was granted to:

(The following Members (at the request of Mr. HANSEN) to revise and extend their remarks and include extraneous material:)

Mr. GOLDWATER, for 5 minutes, today.
Mr. KEMP, for 10 minutes, today.

(The following Members (at the request of Mr. RAHALL) to revise and extend their remarks and include extraneous matter:)

Mr. ANNUNZIO, for 5 minutes, today.
Mr. GONZALEZ, for 5 minutes, today.
Mr. PEPPER, for 5 minutes, today.
Mr. FORD of Michigan, for 5 minutes, today.
Mr. FLOOD, for 5 minutes, today.
Mr. BINGHAM, for 5 minutes, today.
Mr. OTTINGER, for 5 minutes, today.
Mr. LEGGETT, for 5 minutes, today.
Mr. CHARLES H WILSON of California, for 5 minutes, today.
Mr. STOKES, for 5 minutes, today.
Mr. DRINAN, for 5 minutes, today.
Mr. VANIK, for 5 minutes, today.
Mr. ROONEY, for 5 minutes, today.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

By unanimous consent, permission to revise and extend remarks was granted to:

Mr. SEIBERLING, immediately prior to vote on the Long of Maryland amendment on H.R. 12157 in the Committee of the Whole today.

Mr. ANDERSON of Illinois, and to include extraneous matter, notwithstanding the fact that it exceeds two pages of the RECORD and is estimated by the Public Printer to cost $985.50.

Mr. BRADEMAS, and to include extraneous matter notwithstanding the fact that it exceeds two pages of the RECORD and is estimated by the Public Printer to cost $886.

Mr. DELLUMS, and to include extraneous matter notwithstanding the fact that it exceeds two pages of the RECORD and is estimated by the Public Printer to cost $2,135.

(The following Members (at the request of Mr. HANSEN) and to include extraneous matter:)

Mr. YOUNG of Alaska.
Mr. MOORE.
Mr. DEL CLAWSON in two instances.
Mr. CAPUTO.
Mr. LAGOMARSINO.
Mr. STEIGER.
Mr. CARTER in three instances.
Mr. FINDLEY.
Mr. GILMAN.

(The following Members (at the request of Mr. RAHALL) and to include extraneous matter:)

Mr. ANDERSON of California in three instances.

BILL PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT

Mr. THOMPSON, from the Committee on House Administration, reported that that committee did on this day present to the President, for his approval, a bill of the House of the following title:

H.R. 11877. To authorize supplemental appropriations for fiscal year 1978, and to authorize appropriations for fiscal year 1979, for the Peace Corps, and to make certain changes in the Peace Corps Act.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. RAHALL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 50 minutes p.m.), the House adjourned until tomorrow, Friday, July 28, 1978, at 10 o'clock a.m.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

4653. A letter from the General Counsel, U.S. General Accounting Office, transmitting a report on the release of certain budget authority, the rescission of which was proposed by the President and disapproved by the Congress; to the Committee on Appropriations.

4654. A letter from the Director, Defense Civil Preparedness Agency, transmitting a report on property acquisitions of emergency supplies and equipment during the quarter ended June 30, 1978, pursuant to section 201(h) of the Federal Civil Defense Act of 1950, as amended; to the Committee on Armed Services.

4655. A letter from the Executive Secretary to the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, transmitting a proposed final regulation governing the award of Federal funds for the experimental program for opportunities in advanced study and research in education, pursuant to section 431(d) of the General Education Provisions Act, as amended; to the Committee on Education and Labor.

4656. A letter from the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare, transmitting the annual report for 1977–78 on the health consequences of smoking, pursuant to section 8(a) of Public Law 89–92, as amended (84 Stat. 89); to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

4657. A letter from the Comptroller General of the United States, transmitting a report on the need for improved mapping, charting, and geodesy support of the strategic ballistic missile submarine force (CED–78–142, July 25, 1978); jointly, to the Committees on Government Operations, and Armed Services.

4658. A letter from the Comptroller General of the United States, transmitting a report on the need for the Defense Department to improve tactical towed array sonars to enhance antisubmarine warfare capability (PSAD–78–71, July 27, 1978); jointly to the Committees on Government Operations, and Armed Services.

4659. A letter from the Comptroller General of the United States, a report on the condition of the strategic and critical materials stockpile (EMD–78–82, July 27, 1978); jointly, to the Committees on Government Operations, and Armed Services.

4660. A letter from the Comptroller General of the United States, transmitting a report of the U.S. Geological Survey programs to provide systematic assessment of the mineral potential of key areas in the United States (EMD–78–83, July 27, 1978); jointly, to the Committee on Government Operations, and Interior and Insular Affairs.

4661. A letter from the Comptroller General of the United States, transmitting a report on the Alaska Railroad's present and future role and ways management could be improved, (CED–78–137, July 27, 1978); jointly, to the Committees on Government Operations, and Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

4662. A letter from the Comptroller General of the United States, transmitting a report on revenue estimates under various methods of taxing Americans abroad, (ID–78–52, July 27, 1978); jointly, to the Committees on Government Operations, and Ways and Means.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS

Under clause 2 of rule XIII, reports of committees were delivered to the Clerk for printing and reference to the proper calendar, as follows:

Mr. MAHON: Committee on Appropriations. H.R. 12511. A bill to extend for 1 year the child care food program of the National School Lunch Act and the women, infants, and children program of the Child Nutrition Act of 1966; with amendment (Rept. No. 95–1153, Pt. II). Referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union.

Mr. MAHON: Committee on Appropriations. H.R. 13635. A bill making appropriations for the Department of Defense for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1979, and for other purposes; (Rept. No. 95–1398). Referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union.

PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS

Under clause 5 of rule X and clause 4 of rule XXII, public bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. ANNUNZIO (for himself, Mr. ROUSSELOT, and Mr. PATTERSON of California):

H.R. 13612. A bill to amend the authority for the flexible regulation of interest rates on deposits and accounts in depository institutions; to the Committee on Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs.

By Mrs. BURKE of California:

H.R. 13613. A bill to amend the Communications Act of 1934 to establish requirements with respect to agreements relating to the broadcasting of certain professional sports clubs' games; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

H.R. 13614. A bill to amend the Clayton Act to prohibit any professional football league from imposing certain territorial restrictions on any club in the league; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. EDWARDS of Alabama:

H.R. 13615. A bill to authorize the Secretary of the Army to make studies of means of preventing streambank erosion at historic Blakely, Ala.; to the Committee on Public Works and Transportation.

By Mr. FITHIAN (for himself, Mr. FINDLEY, and Mr. VANDER JAGT):

H.R. 13616. A bill to suspend the duty on freight cars until the close of June 30, 1982; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. FORD of Michigan (for himself, Mr. BRADEMAS, and Mr. KILDEE):

H.R. 13617. A bill to establish a Department of Education, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Government Operations.

By Mr. GEPHARDT:

H.R. 13618. A bill to establish a limit on total budget outlays; to the Committee on Rules.

By Mr. GIBBONS (for himself, Mr. PICKLE, Mr. GEPHARDT, Mr. STEIGER, and Mr. FRENZEL):

H.R. 13619. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to make technical corrections in the provisions relating to individual retirement plans; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. GILMAN:

H.R. 13620. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to provide for nonrecognition of gain on sales of certain business interests and for accelerated depreciation of certain property, and to amend certain securities laws to facilitate private offerings and for other purposes; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. GILMAN (for himself, Mr. ARCHER, Mr. BRODHEAD, Mr. D'AMOURS, Mr. DELLUMS, Mr. FISHER, Mr. GEPHARDT, Mr. GUYER, Mr. HARKIN, Mr. HOLLENBECK, Mr. HUGHES, Mr. LUKEN, Mr. LUNDINE, Mr. MINETA, Mr. PANETTA, Mr. ROBINSON, Mr. SANTINI, Mr. WINN, and Mr. YATRON):

H.R. 13621. A bill to establish a task force to study and evaluate the taxation of real property by State and local governments, the effects of such taxation on certain taxpayers, and the feasibility of Federal taxation and other policies designed to reduce the dependence of State and local governments on such taxation; jointly, to the Committees on Ways and Means, and Government Operations.

By Mr. GRADISON (for himself, Mr. BAUMAN, Mr. FLOWERS, Mr. O'BRIEN, and Mr. WINN):

H.R. 13622. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to provide for automatic cost-of-living adjustments in the income tax and withholding rates; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. LENT:

H.R. 13623. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to provide for the exclusion from gross income of certain employer educational assistance programs; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. NOWAK:

Mr. BONIOR introduced a bill (H.R. 13634) for the relief of John Franklin Herbert McLin, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

HOSPITAL COST CONTAINMENT

HON. JAMES T. BROYHILL

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 27, 1978

● Mr. BROYHILL. Mr. Speaker, the problem of rising hospital costs has become an issue of great national concern in recent months. The focus of attention has been on the President's proposed hospital cost containment legislation, H.R. 6575.

This legislation was recently before the House Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee on which I serve. From the day the bill was introduced, April 25, 1977, I have spent considerable time studying the problem. I have found that the problem of rising hospital costs, indeed health care costs in general, can only be properly addressed with the kind of program that recognizes the inherent complexities of the industry without jeopardizing the quality of healthcare or services available to the American people. Unfortunately, I believe that the Congress and the administration still have considerable work to do before we find workable solutions to the problem.

Recently an article on cost containment written by the dean of the Bowman Gray School of Medicine at Wake Forest University, Dr. Richard Janeway, was brought to my attention. I found Dr. Janeway's comments most enlightening and timely in view of the recent actions by the Commerce Committee. Accordingly, I am submitting the text of the article in order to afford my colleagues the benefit of Dr. Janeway's thoughts.

As Congress continues its consideration of cost containment, I hope that Dr. Janeway's comments will serve as guidance to Members as they study the very difficult and complex field of quality health care at reasonable costs.

The comments follow:

MEDICAL EDUCATION AND THE COSTS OF MEDICAL CARE

The editor of the NCMJ has provided the dean of each of our medical schools an annual opportunity to speak directly to the members of our state society. This offer represents far more than an opportunity; it is a privilege.

I have chosen to comment on pending federal legislation directed at containment of the costs of medical care. This issue might appear to be of limited interest of a fulltime medical educator, but that is far from the truth.

Arbitrary "spending-cap" cost containment proposals strike equally at the quality of medical care and the quality of medical education. The proposed legislation provides an unparalleled opportunity for the practicing community and the universities to speak with a single voice. It behooves all of us to ask questions based on hard facts which will validate a rational and non-emotional resistance to the simplistic "9%" solution currently advocated by the administration in H.R. 6575 and S. 1391. The Medicare-Medicaid Administrative and Reimbursement Reform Act (S. 1470), introduced by Senator Talmadge, is an improvement over administration proposals. However, even this bill fails the test of critical analysis when its provisions are measured against the complexities of financing medical care in a setting consonant with quality, scholarship, human dignity and freedom of choice.

Many in government have concluded that containment of the costs of medical care will solve all the problems of health care in our country. While I subscribe to the view that the health of our citizens cannot be "left entirely to the medical profession," I am opposed to government control of the quality of medical care we may be allowed to provide. We are not arbiters of national lifestyle, nor did we create poverty and illiteracy. Somehow the semantic and real difference between medical care and societal health has been deleted from the federal lexicon.

We, our patients and our students (we are all in this together) are faced with a prime example of an apparently simple solution to a complex human problem. We must organize ourselves so that our patients and students will not have to bear the inevitability of the proof that the proposed solution is incorrect. The proof will manifest itself by a decline in the quality of care and education we are willing and able to provide at a level expected of us by our now and future patients.

Are we prepared to implement a rational resistance to pervasive federal intervention? Based on the published testimony of our supporters, I am not convinced of our readiness. I am concerned that data may have been generated before some of the most appropriate questions have been asked.

As an example, is it not more appropriate to ask questions related to the cost of caring for comparable illnesses than it is to compare "per diem costs" among dissimilar environments? We should also have data that rank-order the most common illnesses treated in each hospital and compare costs among hospitals on that basis. It would be helpful to have data which document the intensity of nursing care as it relates to patient outcomes in a variety of hospital settings for a variety of illnesses. Should we not present data to indicate that limitation of capital expenditures (a major factor in all legislative proposals), even with full consideration given to "life-cycle costs," will make at best a minuscule impact on the aggregate national costs of hospitals which are labor/supplies-intensive rather than capital intensive? Is there no way we can demonstrate beyond question that our costs are determined largely by the prices set by our suppliers, the wages we pay our employees and by the expectations of our society?

Although it is true that physicians generate 70 to 80 percent of hospital charges, is it not equally true that in the main we respond to the societal demand to "Do everything you can for Mom, no matter how much it costs?" We have in this instance the obligation to question, but do we have the right to refuse these demands?

Unfortunately, the answers to these questions are not readily available in a form or quantity suitable for national aggregation. We have not always asked the right questions and have not, therefore, generated the important data. We can prove with great accuracy the cost per pound to process laundry, but we do not have the data to prove who lives, and why.

That we in the medical profession have an obligation to contain costs and to teach our students appropriate methods to contain future costs should by now be beyond question. As did many other units in North Carolina, we accepted this obligation many years ago at Bowman Gray/Baptist Hospital in the absence of federal mandates. Many of our efforts to be efficient and cost-effective will be punished rather than rewarded by the proposed "spending-cap."

Our society is ambivalent in its evaluation of the adequacy of our current system. The availability and costs of services have been the subject of widespread public criticism. The quality of care has not often been criticized on the basis of data. We must prevent the uncritical acceptance of the concept that the only thing that counts in health care is how much it costs. If we ask the right questions we can prove the social value of the services we render. If we do not, we will unwittingly assist an attack on the quality of our care. Unless we develop baseline data related to outcome-quality, we will have a difficult task indeed to prove that a decline in quality resulted directly from federal control.

We should prepare ourselves quickly lest society falls victim to the political axiom that the safest way to capitalize on the present is to mortgage the future.

RICHARD JANEWAY, M.D.●

DEPUTY CHIEF OF POLICE ELDRED M. LEMBKE RETIRES

HON. GLENN M. ANDERSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 27, 1978

● Mr. ANDERSON of California. Mr. Speaker, the men and women who serve on the law enforcement agencies in our communities occupy a very special place in our society. Perhaps no other group of individuals serves our people in so many ways—or become so involved in events taking place in our communities.

For the past 29 years, Deputy Chief Eldred M. "Al" Lembke has served the people of Los Angeles as a member of the Los Angeles Police Department. Since May of 1975, he has served as commanding officer—operations south bureau, which includes the Los Angeles harbor area. Al's upcoming retirement will leave a great sense of loss in the many communities he served, both in his last assignment and in the many other posts he has held with distinction over the years.

Born in Los Angeles on June 6, 1924, Al Lembke graduated from Manual Arts High School and attended the University of Southern California and California State University at Los Angeles. He served in the U.S. Navy for 6 years, with duty aboard submarines and destroyers in the Pacific Theater during World War II.

Chief Lembke joined the Los Angeles Police Department on February 1, 1949. He advanced to the rank of sergeant on March 6, 1960, and made lieutenant on June 9, 1963. Al became a captain on July 31, 1968; commander on July 12, 1970; and deputy chief on October 31, 1974.

Chief Lembke's assignments have covered a wide range of our diverse Los Angeles metropolitan area. They include the 77th Street division; Venice division; Devonshire division; bureau of administration; University division; Hollywood (Vice OIC); Metropolitan division; West Los Angeles division; and tactical operations and planning (staff coordinator).

Chief Lembke has also held a number of commands throughout the Los Angeles area, ranging from the San Fernando Valley area to the harbor, which lies in my district. He has served as the assistant commander of the patrol bureau; and as the commanding officer of the Devonshire patrol; the Venice patrol; the tactical operations group; the headquarters bureau uniformed service group; the headquarters bureau; and operations south bureau.

In his 29 years in service to our community, Al Lembke has performed in a manner which exemplifies the best in police tradition. After the 1971 earthquake, which broke the Van Norman dam, he received a commendation for his exemplary performance of duty as field comander of police forces deployed to the area. He chaired the Terroristic Crimes Subcommittee for the President's Private Security Advisory Council in 1972, and was instrumental in the development and implementation of the LAPD's special weapons and tactics (SWAT) teams.

Chief Lembke published the model civil disturbance control plan distributed by the International Association of Chiefs of Police, which reflected his own experience in dealing with public demonstrations and disturbances on several occasions.

As commanding officer—operations—south bureau, one of Chief Lembke's objectives has been the establishment of strong, active citizens' support groups in the various communities. Through organizations such as the Harbor Lights in the port area, the Los Angeles Police Department has been able to establish a positive relationship with community members, allowing them to serve their area better through cooperation and understanding.

Al Lembke has also been active in professional and community organizations, including the International Association of Chiefs of Police; the Los Angeles County Peace Officers Association; the California Peace Officers Association; the Rotary Club; and the American Legion.

Mr. Speaker, retirement does not signify an ending, but instead of the start of a new portion of our lives. Chief Al Lembke has personified the best characteristics inherent in the calling of police work for over 29 years. He will be missed by his fellow officers, as well as the many community members who have had the pleasure of knowing him, and working with him, over the years.

My wife, Lee, joins me in expressing our sincere congratulations to Chief Lembke as he approaches his retirement date of June 29, 1978. We would also like to express our best wishes to his lovely wife, Mary; and their twin daughters, Linda and Lori.●

RENEWAL OF HUDSON, N.Y.

HON. EDWARD W. PATTISON

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 27, 1978

● Mr. PATTISON of New York. Mr. Speaker, throughout the country efforts to revitalize aging cities are many. Outstanding progress and remarkable results for these efforts are not so common. Some methods work. Others do not. With so much "trying" going on, it seems worth our while to stop and look at those examples of outstanding progress in revitalization to see what they might include that others could learn from.

One such example exists in my district and I would like to share it with my colleagues and the people in their districts. The economic development efforts of the city of Hudson began in 1966, when the local unemployment rate was 11 percent, the central business district had a vacancy rate of 20 percent, and 34 percent of the housing was substandard. In the years since, the city planned overall efforts and specifically targeted projects. The key factor in Hudson's renewal was full participation and cooperation by Federal, State, and local governments, business, community, and local political leaders. Successful, visible early projects led to greater involvement, and creation of the necessary agencies and boards to manage renewal projects. At present, the vacancy rate in the business district is below 3 percent and one-seventh of the housing has been newly built or rehabilitated.

I bring to your attention the article from the June Journal of Housing which details the history of Hudson's economic development gains of the past decade:

HUDSON'S ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT GAINS: ARE BASED ON PUBLIC/PRIVATE COOPERATION, UTILIZATION OF A WIDE RANGE OF PROGRAMS

(By William Loewenstein and Barry Lang)

On October 13, 1977, representatives of the New York area office of the Department of Housing and Urban Development, the Small Business Administration, a design firm, and the city of Hudson, New York, attended the convention of the state chapter of the American Institute of Architects to receive an award recognizing the success of Hudson's community development programs. The programs consisted of housing rehabilitation in historic areas and the redevelopment of Hudson's central business district, emphasizing historic structures. The award marked the third time in two years that Hudson has received awards for design in urban renewal and community development areas but this award was the first to recognize the importance of public-private partnerships to success.

When the city began its economic development efforts in 1966, it was faced with an unemployment rate exceeding 11 percent and it ranked at the bottom 25 percent in the state for per capita income. Suburban shopping centers had led to a 20 percent vacancy rate in the central business district and condemnation signs were appearing on many of the buildings. No new factory had been constructed in the city in over 100 years. Furthermore, the city's housing stock was in poor condition. In March 1966, the state division of housing and community renewal did a housing survey in Hudson. With a total of 3406 housing units, 1168 were substandard—34 percent of the total inventory. The North Bay neighborhood, with the largest concentration of housing in the city, was 68 percent substandard. The report labelled Hudson's housing stock among the worst in the whole state.

The report stirred the Hudson community into action. In 1966, the city filed an application with HUD for a planning grant. By 1970, an urban renewal plan had been approved by HUD.

Historic Rehabilitation: Hudson has been called a living museum, covering every period in America's architectural history. Hudson includes examples of colonial, federal, Victorian, and Adams styles of architecture. The heart of the renewal plan was to utilize the elegance of the old buildings and to restore them to their historic beauty.

To encourage work in the area, the city decided the first step should be something that would produce immediate and visible results: it undertook the restoration and improvement of a park that serves as the terminus for the area, overlooking the Hudson River. Improvements made in the two-acre Promenade Hill Park included new playground equipment and landscaping; restoration work was done on a fountain, a statue, and on the benches. The cost to the city was $50,000.

Next, the city's urban renewal agency, with the help of the consulting firm of Raymond, Parish, Pine and Weiner, devised a facade easement program. Using this mechanism to assure renovation along historic lines, the city obtained rights to 46 residential facades in a two-block stretch of Warren Street near Promenade Hill Park. The city then spent $300,000 of urban renewal funds to restore the facades. This amount leveraged 1 million dollars in private money, which went to rehabilitate the interiors of the houses and bring them up to standard as well as to make general improvements. Another $318,000 of urban renewal funds were spent by the city to make public improvement in the project area, such as new sidewalks, street repaving, and new sewer and water lines.

Other Housing Efforts: The city has since expanded the project to an adjacent area that has 11 multi-family residential structures. About $150,000 of community development money is being spent on the facade easements, with private investment expected to amount to about $300,000.

To meet the housing needs of Hudson, the city has built or rehabilitated fully one-seventh of its housing stock—523 dwelling units. Included are 168 units of middle-income housing built under the Federal Housing Administration Section 236 program; 135 units of public housing for both the elderly and for families, which were built with conventional public housing funds under the turnkey program; 20 single-family houses earmarked for purchase by low-income families, which were built under the Section 221 (d)(2) program; and rehabilitation of 200 units, 12 of which were done under the Section 312 low-interest rehabilitation loan program and the remainder of which were done under the local municipal loan program, with the help of up-front CD subsidies.

Central Business District: The next major project was the revitalization of the central business district. The CBD was in a state of advanced decay. Surrounding suburban shopping centers threatened to destroy the economic health of central Hudson. There was inadequate parking. Disinvestment was rampant.

The central business district, besides being the physical heart of the community, contributed the bulk of taxes to the city. In public hearings throughout the city, speaker after speaker, regardless of ethnic background or economic level, recognized that without a healthy and vital CBD, there was little future for the city. The argument of "why help businessmen, let them help themselves" was quickly discarded.

In early 1975, a coalition of the public and private sectors formed to develop a strategy to counter the downward slide of the CBD. Participants in the coalition included local merchants; the city's community development and planning agency; the city's planning consultants; and another city-retained consulting and assistance organization, the National Development Council, which is a nonprofit economic development organization with New York City and Washington, D.C. offices that is funded by HUD, SBA, the Department of Commerce, and private sources.

The first goal was to establish an overall plan and then to demonstrate visible results. A major need was to create off-street parking. Using $100,000 of community development money for land acquisition and relocation, 270 offstreet parking places were created. Two mini-parks also were built, turning garbage-strewn vacant lots into attractive community assets that provide access to the main street from the new parking areas. These improvements cost $59,000.

Local Loan Program: The National Development Council played a major role in the downtown project, creating a municipal loan program. This was originally intended for merchants only but since has been extended to residential property-owners. The program offers an interest subsidy—using community development funds—to assist in rehabilitation and renovation. The up-front interest subsidy has proved to be essential in obtaining participation, particularly among the downtown merchants. The city has used $540,000 of CD funds for this program. It has stimulated the rehabilitation of 73 of the 83 commercial buildings in the CBD, leveraging 1.2 million dollars in private financing.

SBA also played a key role in the redevelopment of the downtown, as well as in the city's industrial efforts. It has made nine loans totaling about 1 million dollars through its Section 7(a) and Section 502 programs that provide money for both working capital and for capital improvements.

Eminent domain powers of the urban renewal agency also proved helpful in the downtown project. For example, the building now occupied by London Bridal, a clothing store, was owned by an absentee landlord who did not want to either sell or comply with rehabilitation. Under the threat of condemnation, however, the out-of-town owner agreed to sell the building to the operator of the clothing store, who, with the help of an SBA loan, purchased the building, fixed it up, and began her business.

A part of the CBD plan included uniform design standards that is allowed false fronts and stressed the original design of the historic structures. To implement this plan, the urban renewal agency condemned all nonconforming signs. The merchants then replaced old signs—which were often neon—with free-standing wooden period signs.

The city also used $600,000 of CD funds to repave streets, replace sewer and water lines, and construction period sidewalks in the downtown area. In addition, the Niagara Mohawk Power Corporation installed new street lights and removed overhead wiring at its own expense.

The consequence of this effort is that the vacancy rate of stores in the area has dropped from 20 percent to 3 percent. Only three of the 83 stores in the project area now stand vacant. As the revitalization of the five-block area draws to a close, the city is planning to extend the effort through the remaining four blocks that separate the CBD from the original residential rehabilitation area near Promenade Hill Park. The plan is to use the municipal loan program to leverage rehabilitation of the mixture of commercial and residential structures there. The facade easement program will not be used again simply because the city cannot afford it now. Hudson is no longer an entitlement city under the CD block grant program. It is a phase-down city.

Industrial Development: As part of the urban renewal program, Hudson created a new industrial park. In designating the location, the city wanted to avoid relegating paints to marginal areas that have no amenities or ties to the community. A million-dollar investment by an industry is as important as a million-dollar investment by a luxury apartment developer. Thus, the city designated a prime area that was near residential development.

Each sector of the community understood that it would need to cooperate. The city would have to make financial sacrifices by providing tax incentives so that business would locate there. The financial community would have to make loan funds available. Land worth $60,000 would be sold at a write down, with water and sewer facilities on site. The city also decided it would have to carry out an advertising campaign and permit the executive director of the community development agency and his staff to spend the necessary time to attract industry and retail facilities into the community.

With the help of the National Development Council, Halpern Manufacturing Company, a clothing design and manufacturing concern, moved to Hudson and built a new plant. The company employs 120 people, with an annual payroll in excess of 1 million dollars. The National Development Council, the Small Business Administration, the New York State Job Development Authority, the New York State Urban Development Corporation, and private lenders arranged the necessary $225,000 loan for Halpern.

In a nearby deserted textile mill, the National Development Council arranged a $458,000 loan to attract X-Tyal, a manufacturer of rubber products such as rubber rafts, rescue equipment, and other heavy duty rubber products. The loan created 250 new jobs in Hudson. A third loan—$135,000—to Craftech, a manufacturer of plastic nuts and bolts, has recently been approved and will create an additional 40 jobs.

Three other loans are being processed. The six loans, combined, will generate 700 new jobs in Hudson.

Public Transportation: For the past 13 years, Hudson has not had public transportation. The only way to travel in Hudson was by private car or taxi, which was too expensive for the highly concentrated senior citizen and low-income population. (In 1970, Hudson's population had 25 percent elderly, with a total of 45 percent near or under the poverty level.)

Under the Urban Mass Transit Program of the Department of Transportation, Hudson was granted $75,000 to purchase three buses, construct a bus garage, and erect bus stop signs. The buses started in summer 1976 and have been highly successful. The city operates the new bus system.

The Cooperation Formula: The success of the revitalization of Hudson depended upon receiving the full cooperation of all sectors—federal, state, local government, and business and community leaders.

In community development, the words "politics" and "politicians" are often viewed negatively but, in Hudson, we perceived from the beginning that we had to have full political participation to be able to succeed. The local politicians offered the necessary leadership for revitalization.

The first step was to set up the necessary legal institutions and agencies to carry out the economic development program. A local development corporation (LDC) was set up to extend second and third mortgages and to make available New York State Job Development Authority and SBA loans. An industrial development agency (IDA) was needed in order to offer tax breaks, assemble and lease land, and participate in financing. An overall economic development plan (OEPD) was needed to qualify for basic eligibility under the Economic Development Administration. To run the low-cost municipal loan program for residential and commercial rehabilitation, a municipal loan board was necessary. The Hudson Community Development and Planning Agency was needed to give staff assistance to the various agencies and to administer the community development resources. Finally, the cooperation of the planning commission was needed to effectuate development plans.

Board Make-Up: The proliferation of boards and agencies could have presented bureaucratic rivalry and jealousy but local elected officials prevented it by using a simple strategy. Each of the boards was represented politically by the mayor, the minority and the majority leadership of the city council, and the chairman of the planning commission. The strategy served two major purposes: (1) it assured that the city's political structure was involved in every major decision related to the development of Hudson and (2) by involving both the Republican and Democratic leadership, community development became "nonpolitical," regardless of the outcome of future elections. The leadership of both parties was equally committed to the success of revitalization in Hudson.

In addition, the membership of each of the boards included major local business leadership, creating an important public-private balance and assuring that the talent of the private sector was included.

A second part of the strategy was to establish the Hudson Community Development and Planning Agency. Hudson created a small but highly professional administrative staff to coordinate the multiple program that would carry out the various policy decisions in a uniform and coordinated manner. In a day-to-day operational sense, the staff was essential to help initiate projects, to work with the federal and state agencies and programs, and to keey after all the necessary details.

Local Bank Help: From the beginning, it was clear that local bank participation would be necessary for success. The political and local business leaders held a series of meetings with the banks in the community. As a result, two banks committed themselves to making loans to assist residential, commercial, and industrial development.

The banks realized that revitalization, with the creation of new jobs, was not only good for the community but would benefit the banks as well by attracting new deposits and healthy lending opportunities.●

ED MURPHY'S HARAMBEE HOUSE: A DREAM TAKING SHAPE

HON. LOUIS STOKES

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 27, 1978

● Mr. STOKES. Mr. Speaker, for several months now, an exciting, new enterprise has been taking shape in this town in the form of the Harambee House Hotel on Georgia Avenue. This black owned and managed establishment is one of the finest hotels that I have visited in Washington, D.C. The decor, service, entertainment, and rooms are all done with taste and style.

Mr. Speaker, I am certain that my colleagues in the House are well aware of the many problems which confront black businesses when they seek to establish themselves in a competitive market. Due to lack of capital, discrimination, and a long list of economic barriers, the black entrepreneur has great difficulty maintaining the financial base so necessary for success. For this reason, Mr. Speaker, I would like to make special mention of the proprietor and creator of Harambee House, Mr. Ed Murphy. Through years of struggle, Ed Murphy did not let his dream die. He has succeeded where few others dare to venture. I have no doubt, Mr. Speaker, that Harambee House will grow and thrive under his able guidance.

Mr. Speaker, so that my colleagues in the House can be more familiar with the Harambee House, I submit to you at this time an article by Washington Post columnist Jackie Trescott which appeared in the July 22, 1978, edition of the paper:

LONG PULL FROM HOT DOGS TO HARAMBEE—ED MURPHY COMBINED STREET SAVVY AND PRAGMATISM TO BUILD A DREAM

(By Jacqueline Trescott)

Standing at a window of the new Harambee House Hotel, the facility he fought 10 years to build on this hodgepodge strip of Georgia Avenue, Ed Murphy glows. Then he glowers.

Within his view there's a post-card panorama of downtown Washington, steeples and monuments soaring. But, also, a bird's eye view of a flourishing junkyard—radiators and bed frames jutting above the trees—directly across from the hotel entrance.

Murphy fidgets, shifting his rod-thin frame from one leather slip-on to the other, as his hard, dark eyes case the streetscape. Up the avenue is the marquee of his second supper club, a short-lived venture that inherited the pizazz of his first but not even its marginal financial success.

Quickly Murphy turns away from these static reminders of heartache. He's cooly ecstatic, the joker's grin spreading across his angular and taut face, a face that has been part of Washington's street scenes for most of his 47 years. Now the biggest gamble of his business life, converting small talk that started around his nightclub's mahogany bar into a nine-story hotel, has hit the jackpot. People are signing the register. Music blasts from the supper club.

Though Ed Murphy is far from the hotel magnate status of his dreams, and doesn't own the hotel, it's his picture that hangs in the lobby and his ideas that have injected a fanciful individuality into the Harambee.

"I want it to be a home. The commitment is to a first-class operation," says Murphy, relaxing in one of the hotel's penthouse suites that is swathed in the deep beiges and oranges of the hotel's general decor. "I don't want to challenge Pitts and Paschals," says Murphy, mentioning black-owned hotels in Washington and Atlanta. "But our challenge is to the Hyatt-Regency."

And every imaginable roadblock has occurred getting this far. Over the last 10 years, Murphy's personal odyssey has been a rocky one—from flamboyant bar owner to identifiable face on the unemployment line to respectable businessman. On the way, Murphy changed, learned to compromise, toned down the high life. He was schooled in the ways of the executive board rooms, where the rules are light years away from the corner of 11th and O streets NW, where Murphy grew up.

No saga of the black businessman is uncomplicated, but Murphy's story was additionally affected by events he had no power to control. The junkyard is only one part of the story. There is also Watergate, the once-bright hope of black capitalism, local power politics and investigations that have stalked Murphy's business dealings.

And the gamble isn't over. The Harambee's location and limited convention facilities are some handicaps, say some observers.

The Harambee, located off the bustling intersection of 7th Street and Florida Avenue between the campus and hospital of Howard University, is one of a handful of black-owned hotels in the country. One of the largest minority commercial building projects in the city in recent years, it is expected to renew interest in the Georgia Avenue corridor.

Initially Murphy approached the federal government for the construction money, but the Commerce Department advised him it couldn't lend to an individual. The People's Involvement Corporation (PIC), an 11-year old antipoverty agency with a proven record in that neighborhood, received the $7.5-million loan and grants and owns the hotel. It leases the business to the Murphy Hotel Corp., whose chairman is Ed Murphy. Easily recognizable by its rooftop insignia—a profile of an African likeness etched with a black, red and green stripe—the Harambee contains 169 rooms with a computerized lock system, a health club, a nightclub and several meeting and reception rooms.

"It's an excellent facility," said Len Hickman, executive director of the 40-member Washington Hotel Association. "It has more amenities than others that size. Its major drawback is the location, but the planned Metro stop will help that. Like the Madison and the Georgetown Inn, it takes time for an independent to build a reputation."

And the immediate reputation of the Harambee depends largely on Murphy.

"GUYS AND DOLLS"

In every city's night-life gallery, the characters who stand out are the smooth, flashy and carefree ones, those who evoke equal shares of mystery, romance and rumors.

In Washington's cast of "Guys and Dolls," Murphy has been one of the principals. "I came from 11th and O Streets. Sometimes I broke the rules and regulations on protocol, but I did it," says Murphy, whose Washington childhood was a segregated one. Born in the Shaw area, he looked up to the barons of U Street, who struggled to keep their barber shops and pool halls open. After Cardozo High School, he went into the Army and returned to Washington to buy the store where he once stocked groceries.

A successful business was his only goal and he worked his way up, bootstrap by bootstrap, nickel by dime, hot dog stand by supper club. "Then I outgrew the supper club. So I took another site, a hotel. I was tired of always going to Connecticut Avenue for meetings and family meals out. So I was determined to keep this business on Georgia Avenue," says Murphy.

But Murphy, before his rebound into present good fortune slipped badly and ended up on the front pages, a very recognizable face on the unemployment line. Anticipating the groundbreaking for the hotel, Murphy had closed his first supper club in September 1972. At the farewell party, surrounded by the judges, secretaries and doctors who had made Murphy's a popular watering hole for the black middle class, Murphy was buoyant, toasting his bright future.

Within weeks, Murphy was picking up a $105-a-week unemployment check. "It's so degrading that it's humorous—almost. In the community, I'm looked up to as successful," Murphy said at the time. "If a guy like myself, grassroots, from the ghetto, if I can't make it, then what chance have others got?" He pointed a finger at the Commerce Department's Economic Development Administration (EDA) which had held in escrow some of the money due Murphy for relocating his business.

BLACK CAPITALISM

"Once you package a $7 million project, you should be something. Not a complete zero," said Murphy, fingering two gold bracelets on his arm. His voice is usually a growl and even now his words for the government aren't kind. Some feel that Murphy's own candidness about his lifestyle—once in a 1972 magazine article he posed bare-chested in his apartment among the waterbed and fake fur throws and openly talked about how gambling gave him his start—prompted some federal agencies to scrutinize his bankbooks.

Part of his disillusionment came because Murphy had given a good stab to linking up with the establishment. Though he never cut off his old friends in trying to get the hotel project, he built up a working relationship with then-secretary of commerce Maurice Stans. At a dialogue between Stans, cit officials and black businessmen in 1969, an aide of Mayor Walter Washington's stood up, and in effect said, "If you care so much, Mr. Secretary, why aren't you looking at Ed Murphy's project?" Murphy gave his spiel. Stans liked what he heard.

"Everyone was talking about black capitalism. Some people like Stans were sincere," says Murphy, his manner changing from languid to combative as he talks about Stans. "All I can say is that Stans gave his full support. We did our part, pounding home on the black theme," and Murphy, who was then an outspoken member of several black economic groups, laughs a hard laugh.

"We were into our black thing; Marion Barry and Calvin Rolark, we would usually meet with Stans every 30 days. There was this man, Stans, heavy into African safaris. He speaks fluent Swahili. If he had challenged us on that level, we couldn't have retorted."

However, ujamaa, Sawhill for cooperative economics, was not around the corner. Stans was indicted in the Watergate coverup in May 1973 and was acquitted in April 1974. A few months later Murphy opened the second supper club, up the street from the original, and it failed.

More than the money, Murphy had lost some of the nutrients of a street guy's happiness. Gambling was out, as were clothes spending-sprees. Also, his political base was eroding without the supper club, where many of the city's maverick politicians and groups held forth.

Because Murphy was determined ("We are going for broke on this project," he told friends. "We will show a black idea can work"), he learned the art of bridge building. "At some of those early meetings Murph would jump in and call a spade a spade, saying 'you're trying to put the clamps on this project.' Then he would switch to a very philosophical, oppressed posture. He would say 'you are kicking my butt and everyone feels it.' Now he combines the angry man, the intimidator, with business sense—the 'this is profitable for you' approach," remembers Darryl Hill, then president of the Greater Washington Business Council.

"I have never given up," says Murphy, his back flat against a brown suede-covered chair. "Some of these events have been very damaging to my reputation as a businessman. But every time I went through a heavy number, I looked at it as a test. And I enjoyed the fight. I am still one of the everyday people." Murphy smiles faintly. "I don't dare try to do anything else."

WINNERS CLUB

Once past the plain concrete front, where a former doorman of the Madison Hotel reigns, the dual personality of the Harambee—African casualness and small-scale efficiency—is immediately evident.

Murphy's hotel is rich in textures and warm, forestry colors. But the occasional juxtaposition of moods—a beige fabric wall, deep chocolate tile floor, a few sculptures and perforated ceilings in one corridor—caused a critic to label the decor "afro-tac."

But unlike some other new hotels, the Harambee lobby is not encumbered by fountains, travel desks and shops. A straight path, lined with couches and potted plants, leaves social space and leads directly to the registration desk. The rooms, which are decorated with vivid, tapestry wallpaper, cost from $25 to $210 a day.

On the second floor a spacious room with an elevated bandstand in the center serves as both dining room and supper club. It's called Murph's Haramba Supper Club.

Guest artists at the Haramba have included Freddy Cole, Oscar Brown and Jean Pace. Dick Gregory performed in an adjacent room because he wouldn't appear where alcohol is served. Both the supper club and a first-floor meeting room, the Kilimanjaro Room, have been used for press conferences by Muhammad Ali, Coretta Scott King, Nancy Wilson and community groups. Vice President Walter Mondale came to one political party there. Half the staff of 215 has been hired for food and beverage service. The breakfast menu is standard hotel, the lunch expands beyond the routine to include Tasmanian beef, water chestnut pie and Tunisian couscous; dinner features Continental food as well as one soul dish. During a recent show, however, only a skimpy menu was offered, limited to five main dishes and no appetizers.

The Harambee features a health club, a luxury feature in a small hotel. Like the Watergate facilities, it's open to memberships. Though the pool isn't as large as the Watergate's, the area around the pool is conducive to cabana parties.

To keep the Harambee from being classified as a hang-out, Murphy and James Gibson, president of the hotel corporation and second-in-command to Murphy, developed a Winners Club system. The membership system includes the supper club and the health club; besides admission to the gym and pool, the $50 to $1,000 charge doesn't seem to buy more than a "no cover charge" arrangement or discounts for performances. Nevertheless, about 400 people, according to Murphy, have signed up for the plan.

Initial reactions have varied. Charlayne Hunter-Gault, a correspondent for PBS' "McNeil-Lehrer Report," missed a clock in the lobby and didn't receive some of her messages. "In my profession I need to communicate with the outside world and the telephone system wasn't satisfactory. But when I complained, everyone was agreeable.

Joseph C. McKinney, finance officer for the AME Church office here, decided to switch his board meetings from the Washington Hilton to the Harambee.

POLITICAL GAME

"The only drawbacks are parking," says McKinney, "and the view from the dining room." Plans for an underground parking lot had to be scrapped when water was found underneath the property, but a 300-space garage is one block away.

Actually, at night the Junkyard doesn't intrude, looming as a collage of urban living or a bit of Star Wars metal on the chicken wing strip. But in the daytime, it is an intrusion. And Gilbert Freedman, the scrap iron dealer who has been at that location for 37 years, says, "I don't have any plans to move."

But Ed Murphy isn't worried. He feels his new game of politics—the combination of street savvy and mainstream pragmatism—will win. And the optimism that carried him past obstacles isn't going to be broken by a junkyard. Instead, he talks of his corporate capability, the 120-year lease.

He whispers wistfully, "Atlantic City," as he talks about advising minorities on hotels there and as he pushes back from a meal of hard-shelled crabs.

"I know there's a certain reluctance, it being a black hotel. And some people don't want to leave a chain. But I think people will come. Realistically I know at first white people don't want to sleep on Georgia Avenue. But they will come up for cocktails and entertainment, enjoy the hospitality and come back to stay.

"And no one," he says finally, somewhat fiercely "is going to let a junkyard kill the million-dollar project of a black man. Not as long as I am here." ●

HOUSTON POST OPPOSES FURTHER REDUCTIONS IN U.S. CONTRIBUTIONS TO THE WORLD BANK

HON. MATTHEW F. McHUGH

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 27, 1978

● Mr. McHUGH. Mr. Speaker, the foreign assistance appropriations bill will soon come before the House for consideration. As every Member is aware by now, numerous amendments will be offered to reduce funding and to restrict how our assistance may be used in a variety of ways.

I am opposed to these amendments, Mr. Speaker, and I have been encouraged by the fact that so many thoughtful and responsible newspapers across the Nation have indicated their opposition as well. For example, the Houston Post in a recent editorial pointed out that the World Bank plays a vital role by stimulating demand for American goods and services in the developing countries. It opposed further reductions in funding for the Bank, and suggested that the restrictive amendments that will be offered will ultimately politicize the working of the Bank and lead other nations to impose their own conditions on its activities.

For the benefit of those Members who may not have seen this editorial, I am including it in the RECORD at this time.

[From the Houston Post]

FINANCIAL FACTS

The World Bank is neither a charity of nor a burden to the United States. Like commercial banks everywhere, it is self-supporting and it makes a profit. Yet Congress seems in the mood to cripple the bank badly, either by cutting American investment capital or by tying strings to it in ways that the World Bank board cannot accept under the charter. If Congress damages the bank, it will ultimately damage the American economy at a time when it needs all the strength it can muster.

The U.S. is a rich country with many poor neighbors to the south and on other continents. But no American industry can flourish if we sell only to Americans. We need a worldwide market for our exports if we are to gain the foreign currency essential to our import of foreign oil and raw materials. One out of eight jobs in American industry depends on the export business for existence. One acre out of three of American farmland grows crops for export.

Of all those goods and crops, a good third goes to developing countries. U.S. exports to the developing countries are greater than all we sell to Western Europe, Eastern Europe, China and the Soviet Union combined. If the developing countries stop developing, if they lose their reason for buying farm machinery, power plants, sewer pipes, road building equipment, if they lose the ability to buy and pay for American farm and industrial products, one-third of our export trade will be lost to us.

Each member nation contributes to the bank's capital fund, any nation can borrow from it for developmental projects. The World Bank is the chief pipeline for investment capital from the industrialized nations of the world to the developing nations. But it makes its loans only after careful on-site scrutiny, expert evaluation and a clear understanding of how the money will be spent. So long as a borrowing country is spending a World Bank loan, bank advisers stick with the project to be sure that the work is being properly carried out. The result is that World Bank money is productive, stimulating the economy of countries that borrow. It is such a prudent and knowledgeable lender that multinational banks follow its lead on commercial loans.

But Congress is behaving rather as though the World Bank were an adolescent dependent needing to have its allowance cut. In January President Carter asked for $3.5 billion for the World Bank and smaller regional development banks. The House Appropriations Committee has cut it to $2.65 billion. Several congressmen seem to see this as an opportunity to bring the World Bank under this nation's thumb by threatening to withhold the U.S. portion of capital from specific countries for specific reasons. But the World Bank is neither a political institution nor an American institution. It has 130 members of varying ideologies. Its sole purpose is that of economic development. If Congress starts playing that game, other member nations could hold back capital for specific ideological reasons. Other countries have—in fact—tried that trick without succeeding. These are self-defeating tactics and can only harm an institution that is a strong pillar of the global economy. We must hope that the House shows greater grasp of the financial facts of life than the House Appropriations Committee has shown.●

FARM SAFETY WEEK

HON. W. HENSON MOORE

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 27, 1978

● Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, this week is National Farm Safety Week as proclaimed by the President March 23, 1978. Besides extolling the virtues of safe practices on farms and encouraging the men and women of this country's agricultural community to regard safety as an integral part of all their activities, President Carter also stated in his proclamation:

Anything that diminishes the ability of farmers and ranchers to meet these vital needs (production of food and fiber) is of great concern.

Perhaps, Mr. Speaker, the item of greatest concern to farmers and the personnel of USDA's Extension Service, which administers an essential farm safety program, is the fact that the President submitted a budget for fiscal year 1979 to the Congress deleting all funds for farm safety. When the fiscal year 1979 Department of Agriculture budget reached the House Agriculture Committee, on which I serve, for review under the budget process, all $1,020,000 programed for the previous fiscal year for farm safety had been cut. I learned that the Extension Service considers this program very helpful and educational, as well, and in light of such problems as grain elevator explosions wanted very much for it to continue.

I added an amendment to the House Agriculture Committee's recommendations on the fiscal year 1979 budget restoring the $1,020,000 in its entirety, and was very pleased when the Appropriation Committee in turn restored full funding for the Extension Service farm safety program. I hope very much that Congress will eventually approve a fiscal year 1979 appropriation bill supporting this program.

I have no doubt that the President had good intentions when he signed his name to the proclamation for National Farm Safety Week. However, as has been evident in other actions taken by this administration, the Carter commitment to agriculture has been one no less than a complete contradiction.●

U.S. ARMS TRADE POLICIES IN THE WESTERN HEMISPHERE: A GLOBAL MODEL OR A DISASTER?—PART III

HON. ROBERT J. LAGOMARSINO

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 27, 1978

● Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Speaker, this is the third and final segment of the testimony of our former colleague, Joseph Karth, president of the American League of International Security Assistance, Inc. (ALISA), before the Subcommittee on Inter-American Affairs of the House International Relations Committee. Mr. Karth was testifying on U.S. arms trade policies in the Western Hemisphere. In this concluding segment, Mr. Karth summarizes his arguments against the current U.S. policy of unilateral restraint in hemispheric arms sales.

REMARKS BY JOSEPH KARTH

But our arms sales policies in Latin America and elsewhere in the world are part of a larger picture, a picture which has important implications for the overall American economy for American jobs, and, indeed, for the role of the United States—politically and economically in relation to the rest of the world.

The Administration—and to a great extent the Congress—apparently feels that the United States should not confer the benefits of its trade upon countries that reject U.S. values. Likewise, they seem to believe that the United States can reward or punish countries by withholding trade, foreign aid, or investment.

The evidence mounts daily that this is indeed not the case. America can no longer influence the behavior of other nations by economic retaliation. Our preeminent position in the world economy has eroded. Our once substantial lead in technology has been overtaken in many significant areas. Even the once mighty dollar is being sneered at in most parts of the industrial world.

In many areas of medium and high technology—machine tools, power turbines, reactors, jet aircraft, naval vessels—foreign competitors from Europe, Japan and even some developing countries export goods that approach or surpass the best American designs, even though they may cost more at the present time. As a Brazilian official recently pointed out to an American industrialist, "Of the first 70 nuclear reactors built outside the U.S., 63 were built by the U.S. In the last three years, 37 more were built, two of them by the United States and 35 by European suppliers." In fact, a recent New York Times article, which I request be inserted in the record, indicates that imports of machinery and transport equipment and of manufactured goods, mostly from Western Europe and Japan, have overtaken oil imports as the biggest drains in this nation's expanding trade deficit.

In this climate, subordinating exports to political goals is a policy that can boomerang. In many cases, countries denied U. S. goods can easily find them elsewhere. Moreover, if the United States acquires a reputation as an unreliable exporter, other countries will take steps in their own self-interest to assure their future supplies.

So increasingly, the other side of the trade coin becomes important. America needs the benefits of trade, the exports needed to sustain U. S. employment and to pay for our imports of machinery, manufactured goods, and oil.

By voluntarily eliminating export markets, as we have done to a great extent in Latin America, America's overseas economic and political power is weakened. In the short run, the U.S. trade balance—$31 billion in deficit last year—suffers, and the value of the dollar drops; this undermines confidence abroad in America's economic vitality. In the long run, the U. S. competitive position permanently deteriorates from a willful sacrifice of markets. Paradoxically, the more the United States seeks to use the levers of trade to achieve political results, the more it may weaken its economic and political power.

The Administration and the Congress often cannot resist the attempt to impose our moral and political values on someone else, and the weapon closest at hand is often economic sanctions. But playing politics with U. S. exports, playing politics with the American economy, has become increasingly risky.

In a recent speech at the University of Hawaii and undoubtedly following Administration policy, Vice President Mondale dutifully outlined a foreign policy program for the United States based on the Carter Administration's "new foreign policy concerns—human rights and restraints on arms transfers."

Can we honestly agree with the Administration that our foreign policy must be based on those concerns? I think our concerns must be more fundamental. I think that in the final analysis, U. S. foreign policy must be based upon the national interest and upon the security of the United States of America, even if that means that we may find ourselves on occasion selling arms and commercial items to governments whose internal policies we do not admire.

A State Department witness testified before this Subcommittee on June 27 that, in the judgment of his Department, the economic costs involved in implementing U. S. policy in Latin America "are worth the benefits derived from having clear policies in favor of human rights and arms restraint." He failed to identify either the costs or the benefits derived. While I cannot identify any benefits, I believe that I have identified certain of the costs involved.

Our attempts to impose unilateral standards on the rest of the world, both in terms of arms sales and human rights, is doomed to failure. Already, the attempt to implement these standards in Latin America has caused serious problems for our own foreign policy, our own economic development and our own national security.

PROPOSED AMENDMENTS

1. Section 406, International Security Assistance Act of 1976, is amended to add the following:

". . . unless the President determines (and reports to the Congress) that such is in the interest of the United States."

This section presently reads:

"No military assistance, security supporting assistance, military education and training, credits, guaranties, cash sales, or export licenses may be provided Chile."

2. Section 620B, Foreign Assistance Act (FAA) of 1961, is amended to add the following:

". . . unless the President determines (and reports to the Congress) that such is in the interest of the United States."

This section presently reads:

"No military assistance, security supporting assistance, military education and training, credits, guaranties, military sales, or the granting of export licenses for the commercial sales of arms may be made to Argentina after September 30, 1978."

Section 38(b)(3), Arms Export Control Act (AECA) is amended to add the following paragraph:

"(F) Notwithstanding the provisions of this act or any other provision of law, the export of defense articles and defense services which the Secretary of State determines shall have a nonlethal application or are to be used in furtherance of the safety and well-being of the civilian population shall not be deemed prohibited."

INDIVIDUAL RETIREMENT PLAN TECHNICAL CHANGES ACT OF 1978

HON. SAM GIBBONS

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 27, 1978

● Mr. GIBBONS. Mr. Speaker, today I am pleased to introduce the "Individual Retirement Plan Technical Changes Act of 1978," a bill to improve the fairness and efficiency of the law governing individual retirement accounts, annuities, and bonds (IRA's, designated under the bill as, "Individual Retirement Plans"). Nearly 4 years ago, as part of the Employee Retirement Income Security Act of 1974 (ERISA), the Congress enabled millions of working Americans not covered by retirement plans sponsored by their employers to establish their own individual retirement plans. An estimated 3 million individuals have already taken advantage of this opportunity to help themselves, making the IRA a successful and increasingly important component of private retirement systems.

However, not everyone has been successful in taking advantage of the IRA program. Last February, it was revealed in hearings of the Oversight Subcommittee of the Committee on Ways and Means, of which I am chairman, that in 1975 and 1976 alone more than 70,000 individuals got themselves into a mess of trouble by making "excess contributions" to IRA's. By and large, these were people who acted without fully understanding the complex and restrictive eligibility rules. Others acted without the availability of complete or accurate information regarding their own financial circumstances. Still others, as outlined in a major Federal Trade Commission report prepared at the request of the Oversight Subcommittee, entered into IRA insurance contracts requiring fixed premium payments for substantial periods of time even though these payments may be nondeductible excess contributions under the IRA rules.

The bill I am introducing today is aimed at clearing up many of these problems, both for those who have already gotten into them and for the future. It does so, in general, by expanding the opportunities to correct mistakes, eliminating the double taxation and the overlapping penalties which have followed from those mistakes, and eliminating some of the unnecessary restrictions which, in many cases, caused the mistakes in the first place. In addition to eliminating or lessening the traps for the unwary, our intent is to make both regular and "rollover" IRA's easier to use and administer.

Turning to the particulars, the bill contains a series of changes in the IRA provisions of the Internal Revenue Code related to four basic areas: First, contributions, second, rollover provisions, third, penalty provisions, and fourth, administrative or reporting provisions. Each set of changes is described below.

CHANGES RELATING TO CONTRIBUTIONS

In summary, the changes related to contributions: First, extend the latest IRA establishment and contribution dates (currently 45 days after the close of the taxable year) to the tax filing date for the year; second, allow a deduction where "excess contributions" are applied to a subsequent year's undercontribution; third, allow greater time for the correction by withdrawal for inadvertent "excess contributions"; fourth, allow a pro rate IRA deduction for people covered under a qualified plan for only part of the year; and fifth, require IRA insurance contracts issued in the future to provide for flexible premiums.

Section 11 of the bill extends the current February 14 deadline for making contributions to and for establishing an IRA until the individual's Federal tax filing date (including extensions) for the year involved. Thus the latest date for calendar year taxpayers to contribute to or establish IRA's generally would be April 15 (plus any extensions) of the following year.

The bill, under sections 12 and 14, also provides relief from the double taxation and overlapping penalties which may often result, under present law, from making an "excess contribution." Many unsuspecting individuals who made contributions for which they were ineligible have found themselves caught in a web of adversity: Their "excess contribution" is, under present law, fully taxed as ordinary income in both the year it was put in and the year it is taken out. On top of that, there is a 6 percent excise tax for each year the excess remains in the account—and a 10 percent premature distribution tax when an individual under age 59½ removes the excess to avoid the annual 6 percent tax.

Under section 14 of the bill, an individual whose contribution does not exceed $1,750 may avoid both the double taxation and the 10 percent premature distribution tax, and avoid the 6 percent excess contributions tax for future years, by withdrawing an excess contribution at any time. In addition, a special rule extends the relief, without the $1,750 limitation, to IRA rollover situations where the individual has reasonably relied upon erroneous information furnished by an employer. Section 14 is effective with respect to distributions in taxable years beginning after December 31 1975. Thus most taxpayers who have already suffered adverse tax consequences as a result of previous distributions of excess contributions will be eligible for tax refunds, and individuals who distribute excess contributions in the future will not be subject to the double and overlapping tax consequences.

Alternatively, if the individual is entitled to an IRA deduction for any year which follows a year in which an excess contribution is made, he is allowed, under section 12 of the bill, to receive a deduction by applying the excess as a contribution for a later year. While it was previously permissible to correct an excess contribution through a subsequent undercontribution, the deduction was lost in the process; section 12 changes this result. Moreover, there is a special transitional rule in cases where the applied excess would generate a deduction in 1976 or 1977; the bill would instead allow the deduction in 1978. This provision alleviates the need of taxpayers eligible for the 1976 or 1977 deduction to file amended returns for those years.

Section 13 of the bill relaxes the harsh all-or-nothing rule under which no IRA deduction is available for an entire year if the individual is an "active participant" in a qualified employer-sponsored plan for just a single day of the year. Under this new provision, the allowable deduction would be the lesser of 15 percent of compensation or 1/12 of the $1,500 annual maximum ($1,750 in the case of the "spousal" IRA) for each full month in which the individual is not an "active participant."

Section 15 of the bill is drawn from the 2-year study and the recommendations of the Federal Trade Commission. This provision no longer permits new individual retirement annuities which require fixed premiums. Because most people are unable to foresee changes in employment or other changes in circumstances years down the road which may affect their continued ability to meet a long-term fixed payment obligation, and because current law may restrict both eligibility for and/or the maximum amount of the premium payments, I share the view of the FTC that the fixed or inflexible premium contracts need to be removed from the IRA market. To its credit, I should state that the insurance industry itself took the lead in recognizing the incompatibility of the fixed premium contracts with current law. Because many IRA participants have already invested in inflexible contracts, section 15 also allows a special tax free conversion of such a contract into a flexible premium IRA annuity.

CHANGES RELATED TO ROLLOVER PROVISIONS

Many comments from the public have suggested the existence of certain inappropriate restrictions related to the availability of rollover IRA's. Accordingly, and consistent with a policy of providing maximum flexibility to taxpayers in this area, the rollover provisions of present law are changed as follows: First, individuals are permitted to roll over less than the entire amount distributed from a qualified plan (and attributable to employer contributions) into an IRA or another qualified plan; Second, individuals may roll over the proceeds from the sale of property distributed rather than rolling over the property in kind; Third, a surviving spouse is permitted to roll over a plan distribution into an IRA on the same basis as a plan participant; Fourth, the 5-year plan participation rule for receiving a "lump sum distribution" is repealed insofar as it restricts eligibility for a rollover IRA; and Fifth, the rule limiting the frequency of rollovers to once every 3 years is repealed.

Section 21 of the bill permits partial rollovers: An individual is no longer required to transfer the entire amount distributed from a qualified plan into a rollover IRA. In addition to providing a greater measure of flexibility for meeting individual needs, this change should reduce the frequency (and the significant adverse consequences) of defective rollovers. It should be noted that, generally, special 10-year averaging and capital gains treatment are not permitted with respect to portions of distributions not rolled over.

Secion 22 of the bill permits an individual who receives all or part of a lump sum distribution in the form of stock or other property first to sell all or part of the property and then, within the existing 60-day period from the date of the distribution, roll over the proceeds of the sale. This change should provide greater flexibility to the public since many IRA trustees have been unable or unwilling to accept rollovers in the form of property.

Under Section 23, the opportunity to make a rollover contribution is extended to a surviving spouse who in any year receives a total distribution from a plan in which the deceased spouse participated. Under present law, a plan participant who receives a distribution often is eligible for a rollover contribution while, on the same facts, apart from the identity of the recipients, his surviving spouse is not. Because our intent is to provide greater opportuntes for the use of the rollover IRA as a mechanism for preserving tax-favored retirement savings, the existing restriction is relaxed. It should be noted, however, that the change extends only to rollovers into an IRA and not to rollovers from an IRA or a qualified plan into a qualified plan.

In keeping with the policy of providing maximum flexibility, the 5-year plan participation requirement for rollover eligibility is removed, under section 24.

Finally, in order to avoid unduly restricting the ability of individuals to shift IRA investments and to advance IRA portability, the bill repeals the rule that IRA rollovers may not be made more frequently than once every 3 years by any individual.

CHANGES RELATED TO PENALTIES

In addition to the expanded opportunity to rectify certain excess contributions (and, as discussed above, to escape the double taxation, early distribution tax and the future application of the excess contributions tax), the following changes are made in the IRA penalty provisions:

First, under section 31, the Treasury and IRS are given the authority, where the taxpayer makes a reasonable error and takes appropriate remedial steps, to waive the existing 50-percent tax on distribution shortfalls known as excess accumulations. This is a hefty penalty which should be applied only in situations where a tax abuse purpose is found to exist. The provision is effective for taxable years beginning after December 31, 1975.

Second, under section 32, the existing limitations on the amount of an "excess contribution" which may be corrected through a distribution prior to the tax filing date (for the year in which the contribution is made) is removed. Thus, an excess contribution, including an excess rollover contribution made in any year, can be corrected without penalty by withdrawing the excess contribution and any earnings on it by the tax filing deadline for that year.

ADMINISTRATIVE OR REPORTING PROVISIONS

Section 41, the final provision of the bill, eliminates the separate individual reporting requirements for an IRA to which contributions have not been made and from which distributions have not been received during a taxable year. This provision should make it easier for individuals to establish and maintain IRA's without excessive paperwork.●

TRIBUTE TO JOSEPH R. RAYMOND

HON. CLARENCE D. LONG

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 27, 1978

● Mr. LONG of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, I want to pay tribute to Mr. Joseph R. Raymond, who recently died of cancer at the age of 38.

Joe was a distinguished member of the Maryland House of Delegates before he became responsible for all Baltimore City affirmative action and equal opportunity programs. In 1977, Joe was appointed as a deputy auditor general of the Agency for International Development.

Joe was a dedicated citizen of the city of Baltimore. He will be missed by all who knew him.●

THE GREAT TERRAIN ROBBERY

HON. DON YOUNG

OF ALASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 27, 1978

● Mr. YOUNG of Alaska. Mr. Speaker, on May 19, 1978, the House passed H.R. 39, the Alaska National Interest Lands Conservation Act. Since that time, a number of my colleagues have inserted in the RECORD statements describing this bill as a great conservation measure, one which will "save" Alaska.

Quite frankly, I am a little confused as to what we are saving Alaska from. My State has an excellent conservation record; in fact, it is better than that of the Federal Government. Alaska's oil spill and water pollution laws are as strong or stronger than those established by this Congress. Alaska has close to 6 million acres of State parks, an area roughly the size of Massachusetts. Our hunting and fishing laws, designed to provide a sustained yield of fish and wildlife, have resulted in lower harvests than when we were under the control of the Department of the Interior. I suggest that the Government look to its own house before trying to clean ours.

The D–2 lands issue goes beyond simple environmental protection, however. It is an issue involving the right of American citizens to control their own destiny. In 1959, Alaska was granted statehood and was promised 104 million acres of land, to be used for the growth and enjoyment of the citizens of the State. By passing H.R. 39, the House has broken that promise. The people of Alaska have been told that their needs are not important, that the desires of certain Federal agencies to establish a 124-million-acre kingdom must come first. Furthermore, this land grab has been couched in terms of preservation, with a threat that "if we do not pass H.R. 39, then the bulldozers that are now waiting to rip into Alaska will be unleashed."

Mr. Speaker, the bulldozers, the flowers, the wildlife, and the people can coexist if we only let them. The way to do it is by enacting legislation which sets aside an ample amount of land for parks, forests, and refuges, gives Alaska the land it was promised, and sets up a procedure for planned, controlled growth.

I think that the following editorial, entitled "The Great Terrain Robbery," which appeared in the Manchester Union Leader on July 3, 1978, speaks to all of these issues. I insert it at this point in the RECORD:

THE GREAT TERRAIN ROBBERY

D2, as those who have been following the Alaska national interest lands controversy know, is not an insecticide or the designation of some super-secret weapons system yet to be developed. Trouble is, the news media generally have given such scant coverage to the controversy, even in the wake of the U.S. House of Representatives' passage of HR-39, that most Americans could be excused if they equated D2 with extraneous considerations.

In point of fact, D2 refers to Section 17 (d)(2) of the Alaska Native Land Claims Act of 1971 which instructed the Secretary of the Interior (currently Cecil D. Andrus) to withdraw up to 80,000,000 acres of Alaskan land for study for possible inclusion in a national preservation system of national parks, forests, wildlife refuges and scenic and wild rivers. Congress' assignment is to decide which lands will be so designated.

Why should the average citizen of New Hampshire be concerned? Well, that's an easy question—one of the few easy questions involved in the controversy—to answer. If for no other reason, Granite Staters should be concerned that this federal control vs. states' rights issue could set a precedent and allow the federal government to designate federal lands in New Hampshire as highly restrictive wilderness areas.

Well, anyone who is in favor of preserving the natural environment, and who feels the country is running out of outdoor recreational opportunity, might be expected to have a natural inclination in favor of designating lands as federal wilderness areas, and it is this natural inclination that the supporters of HR-39, recently passed by the House and now before the U.S. Senate, are exploiting.

But the issue is not all that uncomplicated. In the first place, while this newspaper is willing to concede that many congressmen have been living in an intellectual wilderness, we are not sure that many of them really comprehend what a wilderness area is. A public opinion poll conducted by the American Forest Institute reveals that one in five Americans believes he or she has visited a wilderness area. However, attendance figures from the units of the national wilderness preservation system, which consists of nearly 23,000 square miles (about 15,000,000 acres), indicate that that is not the case. Many of these visits were actually to parks, forests or other nonwilderness areas. Under the 1964 Wilderness Act, federal wilderness areas were intended to be 5,000 acres or more where man's presence is not apparent and where visitors will remain temporarily. By law, such areas have no roads, no campgrounds, no recreational facilities such as ski areas. They allow no motorized vehicles, no campers, boats or aircraft, etc.

What the average American, and probably the majority of congressmen who voted in favor of HB-39, which delineates which acreages of Alaskan land should be included in the federal protection package and how they should be protected and managed, does not understand is that designating lands as federal wilderness areas will not materially increase the kind of outdoor recreational opportunities the majority of people want.

With just cause, Alaska's so-called Ambassador of Information, former Lieutenant Governor M. A. "Red" Boucher, laments that the D2 controversy has been put forward erroneously as a confrontation between conservationists and developers, whereas, "in fact, it is a one-sided media battle artfully staged by conservation elements which are swept up in a cause, collecting acres and acclaim." The State of Alaska, the former mayor of Fairbanks points out, is huge in acreage but small in population and power and is now fighting "for its right for orderly growth against stronger and better financed factionally organized opposition . . ."

Mr. Boucher, an affable and articulate spokesman for Alaska's D2 Steering Council, says that Alaska asks only "for a cool headed appraisal of objective facts" and an understanding that "in almost all cases the lands in question are so remote and forbidding that any development would be in the distant future," so why the haste?

Alaska does have a counterproposal to offer, one which seems entirely reasonable. It proposes that about two-thirds of the acreage be made into cooperative federal-state lands to be classified after careful study by a joint federal-state commission.

The problem now is that not only does the State of Alaska itself require a certain amount of development to survive, but also that some classifications would close suspected or known fields of gas and oil that the American public needs. The basic issue involved, as Alaska views it, is sensible balance. The choice is not between development or natural beauty; there is ample room in Alaska for both development and wilderness for generations to come.

As D2 Day, the December 18th date on which Congress must decide how much and which lands in Alaska shall be included as federal wilderness lands, approaches, Alaska's basic position seems to have eluded the majority of congressmen. The state does not object to large areas of land being set aside in the four categories as so-called national interest lands. The problem is mainly with the legal "wilderness" definition which could make adjacent state-owned lands virtually worthless. Why worthless? Because some of the wilderness parcels would deny access to and across those state lands for recreation, transportation and utility purposes. The State of Alaska is willing to negotiate on the amount of acreage and is in no way opposed to wilderness areas in themselves—as long as they do not hinder access or development of adjacent state areas, the protection of resources or the livelihood of native people.

Alaskans, who have dubbed D2, "The Great Terrain Robbery," ask only that their fellow Americans in turn ask their elected representatives in Congress to strike a sensible balance allowing Man his proper place in the ecosystem while at the same time protecting and conserving nature, with all citizens recognizing that because of that state's provision of heat for our homes through Alaskan oil and natural gas, this issue vitally concerns each and every one of us. Why the haste? Why run the risk that classifications of Alaskan land will close suspected or known fields of gas and oil that the American people need? ●

A TRIBUTE TO BOB HALL

HON. MICHAEL T. BLOUIN

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 27, 1978

● Mr. BLOUIN. Mr. Speaker, a special thanks is due Bob Hall for his outstanding career in the Extension Service. The Nation should be grateful for the wisdom and practical advice that men like Bob Hall have contributed to a prosperous American agriculture. Bob has been known throughout eastern Iowa, because of his ability to anticipate changes in agriculture while working with people to take advantage of the opportunities afforded by these changes. Bob, too, has been aware of the problems and pitfalls of changes in agriculture and has guided many a farmer around them.

If Bob's wisdom had been confined to Delaware County, it would have been a tragic loss. We are all proud of the national recognition Bob has achieved. His philosophy of helping people help themselves has invigorated not only those in agriculture, but all those who look to the inner strength of the American people to make our Nation great.●

PRESERVATION OF AMERICA'S HERITAGE ABROAD

HON. FREDERICK W. RICHMOND

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 27, 1978

● Mr. RICHMOND. Mr. Speaker, the fabric of our society is strengthened by visible reminders of the historical roots of that society. Among the visible reminders of America's past are the cemeteries, monuments, and historic buildings located in other nations, which are associated with the foreign heritage of American citizens.

Many of the cemeteries, monuments, and historic buildings which visibly represent the foreign heritage of present-day Americans are threatened and are in need of protection.

These landmarks are in danger of deterioration or destruction, because there are no longer descendants or compatriots in the communities where these landmarks are located, or because of neglect or deliberate actions by the governments of the countries in which the landmarks are located.

I am sure my colleagues have heard the tragic stories of the destruction or neglect of several of these landmarks:

The last remaining wall of the Warsaw ghetto was torn down by the Polish Government just over 1 year ago. The remains of the ghetto lie underneath modern apartment buildings, and all that remains of the wall is a pile of rubble and a shattered monument.

The Soviet monument at Babi Yar in Kiev, where more than 100,000 people, one-half of whom were Jews, were murdered by the Nazis, was not built until the 1970's, and then only because of worldwide public opinion, aroused by the moving verse of the poet, Yevgeny Yevtushenko. A combination of Soviet anti-Semitism and actions by Ukranian officials had previously converted the area into the site for apartment houses and a television transmitter.

Many of Czechoslovakia's Jewish cemeteries have been designated for other uses. The Slovakian Jewish community's 3,500 remaining members were unable to save them. In 1976, six cemeteries were officially listed for demolition, and descendants in the West and in Israel claimed they were given insufficient notice to arrange for reburial of their relatives.

In a November 22, 1977, article in the Washington Post, Richard Cohen wrote of his search for firsthand information about his grandparents in Ostroleka, Poland. He closes his article on a poignant note:

Now the old man is saying that the construction that has taken the cemetery is also going to take his house. He worries about what kind of apartment he will be given and then he returns to the topic of the cemetery. He said a woman complained about conditions there. She was an old woman and she had gone to Communist Party headquarters in the town and she said that something should be done about the cemetery that bones were turning up and the children were playing with them. Something was done and for a while the place was cleaned up.

Outside it was raining and outside it had turned windy and cold. It was dark and unlighted out by the cemetery and so we stepped in puddles and slipped in the mud and finally made it back to the town. Now we had a person to look for—the woman who had complained about the cemetery. She must be very old and she must know things about the town and about the square where my grandparents once lived and maybe something about them. We went off looking for her. The old man had been very specific.

She was the last Jew in the town.

Mr. Speaker, the graves and monuments of our ancestors in foreign lands are worthy of great reverence and respect, for they serve as a reminder of the contributions of those men and women, not only to their own country, but to the foreign heritage of the United States as well.

When these visible reminders of our foreign past are destroyed or allowed to deteriorate, it is a cause for profound sadness among the descendants and compatriots in America whose roots are obliterated.

Today, I am introducing legislation to establish a Commission for the Preservation of America's Heritage Abroad.

This Presidential Commission will be responsible for identifying threatened cemeteries, monuments, and historic buildings located abroad which are associated with the foreign heritage of U.S. citizens. In addition, the Commission will publicize the names and locations of these landmarks.

Most importantly, the Commission, in cooperation with the State Department, will obtain assurances from the involved foreign governments that the cemeteries, monuments, and historic buildings will be preserved and protected.

I urge my colleagues to join me in support for this measure which will help preserve America's heritage in foreign nations.●

CONGRESSMAN JIM LLOYD'S TESTIMONY ON AVIATION TRADE PROBLEMS

HON. GLENN M. ANDERSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 27, 1978

● Mr. ANDERSON of California. Mr. Speaker, Congressman JIM LLOYD, my distinguished colleague from California, recently testified before the Ways and Means Committee's Subcommittee on Trade. His testimony was carried as an editorial in Aviation Week and Space Technology's July 24 issue.

I do not quarrel with some of the worthy objectives which the administration may be attempting to achieve with these actions as reported by Congressman LLOYD, but his testimony does raise valid questions that concern me.

Are there not better ways to achieve the objectives of our adminstration without such damage to ourselves? Are we not worried also about our balance of trade, about productivity, and about inflation? Leaving aside the question of sales of military aircraft, why should we hesitate to sell our commercial aircraft, and even more so, what is so threatening in the sale of general aviation aircraft? If, as the editor of Aviation Week and Space Technology seems to imply, this is partially a bureaucratic stumbling block, why should we, in an administration dedicated to reducing bureaucratic stumbling blocks and redtape, seem to be increasing them? Is there no good way to expedite these decisions?

I believe we need good answers to some of these questions for our constituents and for our aviation industry and their employees. Congressman LLOYD's illuminating testimony follows:

BUREAUCRATIC STUMBLING BLOCKS

(Rep. Jim Lloyd, a California Democrat and a former Navy fighter pilot, takes a close interest in international aerospace and its effects on U.S. policies and trade. He recently attacked the Administration and State Dept. for regressive regulations and redtape that hinder sales. Excerpts of his testimony before the House Ways and Means subcommittee on trade follow.—Ed.)

We were once a nation of superb horsetraders who bargained the United States into prosperous international leadership. However, sometimes it appears that prosperity is viewed as eternal.

Fortunately, there are those of us who realize that a prosperous nation, in order to survive, cannot rest on past achievements forever.

The horsetraders, and descendants of that energetic and visionary breed, still exist. But, the Administration, and in many cases Congress itself, in their zealous approach to curing the ills of international society, have allowed a segment of the bureaucratic process to wield extraordinary veto powers which are absolutely inconsistent with economic reality. . . .

While I do not condemn the Administration or Congress for all that's wrong with our economy, in the commercial, general and military aviation marketplace, stumbling blocks have been created. In many instances, I consider them capricious, unrealistic and detrimental to any effort designed to reduce our balance of payments. Inflexible idealism cannot be allowed to replace realistic and responsible fiscal management. If that occurs, the very foundation and economic strength on which this country was created will slowly crumble.

Let me cite a few brief examples to make my point:

The sale of T-34C aircraft to Argentina. Approval of the export license was languishing in the State Dept. even though a valid contract had formerly been approved and would have been fulfilled prior to Oct. 1, 1978, when the embargo on Argentina takes effect. Had this matter not been called to the personal attention of undersecretary Warren Christopher, Beech Corp. would have been stuck with contract penalties and 16 training aircraft for the Argentine navy valued at $8.9 million.

Propeller-driven target drones. Northrop Corp. has been supplying Argentina with remotely controlled, propeller-driven target drones since 1966. As early as six months ago, Northrop had a validated export license in hand, and was ready to ship target drones to replenish the Argentine naval commission's inventory. An informal request from the Office of Munitions Control in the Dept. of State to stop shipment was issued until further notice. As of today, Northrop's request for export authorization still has not been honored by the State Dept.

Sales of general aviation aircraft to South Africa. Early this year, over $6.5 million of small civilian aircraft were being held in the pipeline because a segment of Congress and the Administration disapproved of sales to South Africa. Validated licenses were issued only after an elaborate procedure was established to insure that the foreign buyer was not affiliated with a parliamentary organization. The point I make is that any delay automatically plays into the hands of foreign competition.

General aviation aircraft sales to Argentina. Since the inception of the policy allowing nonmilitary general aviation aircraft to be exported to most Free World destinations under general license, a practice has emerged in the export administration to routinely refer all validated export license requests to the State Dept. As of today, $22 million in export licenses are pending in the Dept. of Commerce awaiting approval from the State Dept. for Argentina alone. This is cash on the barrelhead, not economic aid. And while the licenses are being stalled, the aircraft manufacturer is absorbing production and finance costs.

Swearingen air ambulance sale to Argentina. Swearingen, a division of the Fairchild Corp., has had approval of an export license valued at $1.6 million pending in the Dept. of Commerce for two months for the sale of one Metro air ambulance to the Argentine army. This is not an FMS sale, and I would hardly classify a twin-turbo ambulance aircraft as a weapon of war, just the opposite. But, approval of that sale too, is languishing in the State Dept. The key to the contract, however, is that prior to July 24, 1978, Swearingen is obligated under contract to provide the Argentine army evidence that the U.S. government will approve the sale. If not, Argentina will turn to Mitsubishi of Japan for an MU-2, or to France for a Falcon Jet.

Argentine navy King Air Sale. Beech signed a contract with the Argentine naval commission in Washington for six King Air transport aircraft valued at $10 million. The Argentine navy has been a Beech customer for 46 years, and the current order, with spare parts, is equivalent to 10 percent of Beech's 1978 total export volume. Are we to allow the sale of these aircraft in which no military equipment is installed, and which contain no modifications for any type of military operation, to also languish in the State Dept?

The sale of Israeli Kfir aircraft to Ecuador. While this transaction did not involve a U.S. aircraft directly, it does reflect current State Dept. policy which, to me at least, appears questionable. Because the Kfir uses General Electric engines, the sale to Ecuador was disapproved. As a result, Ecuador bought French Mirage fighters. This not only opened the door to France for the sale of aircraft, both military and civil, but eventually many other lines of French products. The economic message in this should be clear.

Brazil wanted an aviation industry, for which several multinational corporations competed. Piper Aircraft won a competition to supply aircraft parts for assembly, and Pratt & Whitney to supply turboprop engines. When the industry got going, Brazil closed its border to U.S. general aviation imports. Yet Brazil is allowed to export its aircraft to the United States. . . .

President Carter recently declared exports a national priority, but I've seen no evidence that such a policy exists. In fact, when he took office, he dropped the Council for International Economic Policy. It's time, therefore, that Congress step forth vigorously and insure the pursuit of Free World trade, especially if we intend to see the balance of payments reduced.●

MAIL STRIKERS: THE LETTER OF THE LAW

HON. DEL CLAWSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 27, 1978

● Mr. DEL CLAWSON. Mr. Speaker, a recent informal discussion with postal workers at home in California provided some useful input regarding striking postal employees. I was interested to find their point of view supported in an editorial appearing in the Washington Post of July 26. I believe it would be hard to quarrel with the logic of the position in the editorial and commend it to the attention of my colleagues at this point in the RECORD:

MAIL STRIKERS: THE LETTER OF THE LAW

Perhaps some of you are having difficulty understanding why certain postal workers are striking when union members haven't even had a chance yet to vote on the tentative nationwide contract settlement that was reached with the U.S. Postal Service only last Friday. It is a trifle puzzling—especially if you believe in such things as union democracy, fair play, obeying the law and the public servant's responsibility to that public. But forget all that and consider instead the Gospel of Lawlessness According to one Moe Biller, who is a local president in New York who doesn't care about such niceties:

To begin with, Mr. Biller didn't like the proposed settlement, which would provide for wage increases, including cost-of-living benefits, totaling 19.5 percent over three years and which contains a no-layoff provision. Fair enough—he and anybody else in the union are entitled to that opinion, and to so vote. But then, without waiting for that vote, certain workers in California and New Jersey decided to take matters into their own hands by engaging in wildcat strikes. It happens that federal law prohibits strikes—wildcat or union sanctioned—by postal workers and other U.S. government employees. So the postal service announced the dismissal of more than 100 of the self-anointed strikers.

Enter Mr. Biller, who decides that his local should "authorize" a strike vote to support the wildcat strike. Thus, as he was quoted as assuming, "If New York votes to strike, the rest of the country will follow." Quite aside from the audacity of that remark, the question is where all the followers think they're going. Perhaps they think the U.S. Postal Service and the U.S. Government Taxpayer will go along, too—paying whatever any individual postal worker thinks is necessary to get a particular brand of workers back on the job.

Nonsense. Where followers of Mr. Biller should wind up is out of work. There should be no way in which the postal service abides such selfish disobedience of procedures on which the time-honored process of collective bargaining has rested. If the settlement proposal is deemed unsatisfactory by the majority of voting union members affected, there are procedures for either returning to the bargaining table or fact-finding/arbitration. Meanwhile, those postal workers who insist on defying the law by walking off the job should be given permanent walking papers.●

FLUORIDATION—PART 2

HON. TIM LEE CARTER

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 27, 1978

● Mr. CARTER. Mr. Speaker, on Wednesday, July 26, I entered into the RECORD the first half of a two-part article on fluoridation published in Consumer Reports. Fluoride in water supplies and therapeutic preparations has been proven highly effective in preventing dental disease. The safety of its use, however, has been questioned.

There is considerable interest at present in disease prevention. In light of the timely nature of the article in Consumer Reports I commend it to my colleagues for an objective discussion of all the issues surrounding fluoride safety:

THE ATTACK ON FLUORIDATION—PART 2

SIX WAYS TO MISLEAD THE PUBLIC

"There are three kinds of lies," remarked 19th-century British statesman Benjamin Disraeli, "lies, damned lies, and statistics." Probably every type of misrepresentation known to Disraeli, and some he may have overlooked, have been used to attack fluoridation. Misleading information about it appears regularly in a paper called the National Fluoridation News, and the entire gamut of hokum has recently been published in a 176-page issue of the Cancer Control Journal, a pro-Laetrile magazine based in Los Angeles.

In last month's issue of Consumer Reports, we examined the most prominent charge—that fluoridated water causes cancer—and reported it to be baseless. But fluoride is also accused of causing numerous other ills, ranging from brittle nails to birth defects. Since such claims are resurrected whenever fluoridation comes up for a vote, we'll discuss the most persistent ones and the evidence behind them.

CLAIM: FLUORIDE IS A POISON

Like iron, zinc, and several other minerals, fluorine (in the form of fluoride) is classified by the National Academy of Sciences as an essential trace element in human nutrition. And like many substances essential to life or good health—iron, vitamins A and D, oxygen, and even water itself—fluoride can be toxic in excessive quantities. At high concentrations, fluoride has been used as a poison for insects and rodents. However, at the level in fluoridated water—one part per million (ppm)—you'd have to drink at least several hundred gallons at one sitting to get a lethal dose. The water alone would kill you first.

But what about the possibility of slow poisoning—a little bit at a time over long periods? According to the National Academy of Sciences, the daily intake required to produce symptoms of chronic toxicity after years of consumption is 20 to 80 milligrams or more—far in excess of the average intake in the U.S. Such heavy doses are associated with water supplies that contain at least 10 ppm of natural fluoride, as in some parts of India. There is absolutely no danger of poisoning from imbibing water fluoridated to prevent dental cavities.

An occasional tactic in antifluoridation tracts is to run pictures of cattle or other animals harmed by fluoride poisoning. The photographs are authentic, but the impression conveyed is false. Years ago, steel mills and clay factories in England and Wales sometimes polluted nearby vegetation with tons of fluoride emissions. Similar incidents have also occurred in the U.S. Cattle and other animals that grazed on the vegetation would ingest enormous amounts of fluoride and develop bone fractures and lameness. Their pictures are the ones antifluoridationists use.

In contrast, a controlled experiment with cattle produced far different results. The cattle were fed various amounts of fluoride in their diets for nearly 7½ years. Even at fluoride levels as high as 27 ppm, the cattle did not experience fractures, lameness, or any adverse effects on soft tissues, fertility, or milk production. Nor were there any abnormal effects on their offspring through successive generations.

CLAIM: FLUORIDE CAUSES BIRTH DEFECTS

In the late 1950's, a French physician named Rapaport reported that mongolism occurred more frequently in some cities with fluoridated water than in some cities with little or no fluoride in their water. Experts who reviewed the study found it seriously flawed, however, especially in its method of locating cases. According to Dr. Rapaport's figures, the incidence of mongoloid births in both the fluoridated and unfluoridated cities was less than half the usual rate—a highly questionable finding in itself. Thus, there was a strong likelihood that Dr. Rapaport had failed to uncover the majority of mongoloid births in the cities he chose to study.

That conclusion was soon confirmed by a more carefully controlled study in England. Using more exacting methods of case-finding, the British researchers reported no difference in the incidence of mongolism whether the water was high or low in fluoride.
